Syph made it quite clear what he was about. He repeatedly said to friend and foe alike that he was going to drive the Moodys off the docks, that eventually only his relatives and friends would be working, and that he was doing so in order to "build me a union." He even criticized a marine foreman for hiring Moody supporters, because placing them on the payroll would undermine his ongoing effort to use company employment as patronage to build a political following and to secure his status and that of the ILA among Toledo dockworkers. The hiring of friends and relatives, most of whom could presumably be counted on to support Syph in any confrontation with the Moody faction, is direct evidence of an illegal motive since discriminations arising out of intraunion political activities are as violative of the Act as are discriminations based on animosity toward all union activity. Operating Engineers Local 675 (Multi-Craft), 271 NLRB 1227 (1984); Laborers Local 282 (Austin Co.), 271 NLRB 878 (1984), and cases cited at 883. Similarly, threats directed at a member's employment status arising out of intraunion friction, if uttered by an official who is in a position to carry out the threats, are a violation of the Act. Carpenters Local 1281 (Raber-Kief, Inc.), 152 NLRB 629 (1965).

If coercive or discriminatory deeds can be linked to intraunion animus, then a violation of the Act has also been made out. It is a violation of the Act for a union to retaliate against a member for filing a complaint concerning the manner in which his business agent handled a grievance,[57] for filing an intraunion charge or grievance,[58] or for filing an unfair labor practice charge with the Board.[59] It is also an unfair labor practice for an employer to threaten reprisal or take reprisal against employees for circulating a decertification petition or a showing of interest petition in support thereof, and there is no reason to believe that such reprisals are any the less coercive if uttered by union officials.[60] Union stewards enjoy the same protections from coercion or reprisal arising from intraunion rivalries that ordinary members do.[61]

3. Independent violations of Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(a)(1) of the Act

This record is replete with statements by Syph that constitute violations of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. Such statements are also a demonstration of deep and abiding animus on the part of the ILA toward dissident Local 1982 members and constitute compelling evidence of the motivation that prompted other substantive violations alleged in the amended consolidated complaint. The General Counsel did not see fit to allege in the complaint that such statements, when uttered within the 10(b) period, also amounted to a violation of the Act on the part of TWT, notwithstanding the fact that Syph was its supervisor and agent and that his statements are vicariously attributable to TWT as well. Accordingly, no violations on the part of TWT arising out of Syph's remarks will be found. His statements, however, constitute evidence of animus on the part of TWT toward Local 1982 dissidents, irrespective of whether the statements were made before or after the commencement of the 10(b) period, and they will be relied on to lay bare any putative unfair labor practices committed by TWT within the 10(b) period.[62]

I credit the testimony of Merrill that, sometime in the summer of 1983, he had occasion to talk with Marine Foreman Tefft concerning the filing of grievances. As noted above, Merrill had filed a number of grievances on forms provided by Moody and, in fact, continues to do so. Tefft, who regarded Merrill as an individual who is "easily led," told Merrill that he should not be hanging around the Moodys because they were a bad influence and might cause him to lose his job completely. Tefft also warned Merrill that he should not file any more grievances. Merrill rejected Tefft's warning, telling him that this was a free country and he would associate with whom he pleased. These warnings and threats on the part of Tefft constitute a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and are direct evidence of animus on the part of TWT.

I also find that the ILA violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by the following statements, outlined above, which were uttered by Syph to several members of Local 1982 on various occasions from late in 1981 until the time of the hearing in this case.

(a) Syph's tirade at the docks on taking over on November 3, 1983, directed toward R. Moody and Edwards, that "You—are done. You and the Moodys are done . . . . You're fired. You don't know how much power I got. . . . I'm a professional —. I know how to — a —. You're through. You're fired, you s.o.b."

(b) Syph's telephone statement to Tucker that, if Tucker did not sign a pledge card for a new local, he would be "left out," and his later direct statement to the same effect, namely that Syph was going to organize another local and that if Tucker did not sign a pledge card for it, was not going to work.

(c) Syph's statement to Levesque to "sign this card and you can work" and his further statement that "I'm going to see that nobody is working but my friends and family."

(d) Syph's statement to the foreman at the dock, when the latter had hired Boyd and other Moody partisans as casuals, that "If I had my way, none of those s.o.b.'s would be working."

(e) Syph's statement to Gaines, on requesting him to sign a pledge card for a new local, that "If you don't play ball with me, I'll get you off this dock if it's the last thing I do."

(f) Syph's statement to Howard that, if he did not sign a pledge card for a new local immediately, it would eventually cost him $600 to join.

(g) Syph's statement to Conley, after Conley had refused repeatedly to sign a pledge card, that "I can't hire you no more."

(h) Syph's statement to Merrill that, if Merrill did not sign a pledge card, he would never get another day's work.

(q) Syph's statement to Bradford that, if Bradford kept on filing grievances, he was not going to work.

(r) Syph's statement to Evans, on presentation of a grievance, that he (Syph) should have left Evans in prison.

(s) Syph's statement to Hampton, on presentation of a grievance, that Hampton, a Moody supporter, was a "dumb —"who would not get hired.

(t) Syph's refusal to permit Edwards to serve as a witness at a grievance meeting because Edwards was "one of those — who is trying to ruin things around here."

(u) Syph's statement to Gaines, a Moody supporter, that "you won't get no work down here so you might as well quit."

(v) Syph's statement to Foster that Foster's association with the Moodys was one of the reasons he was not being hired, and that it would be helpful to Foster if he stopped associating with the Moodys.

(w) Syph's statement to Howard, when the latter presented him with a complaint about not being hired, that Syph did not represent anyone from Local 1982.

(x) Syph's statement to Byrd that he was going to get rid of the Moodys and "all the guys who stuck with the Moodys."

(y) Syph's further statement to Byrd that, if a trusteeship over Local 1982 was imposed, he was going to kick out the Moodys and anyone who stuck with them.

(z) Syph's statement to Conley, on the presentation of a grievance, that Conley's grievance did not mean anything because he was on the wrong ball team, and his reiteration of this threat during the course of the same conversation.

(aa) Syph's statement to Shoecraft and McCully, on presentation of a grievance, that "If you hang around the Moodys you'll find yourself outdoors. They'll be making the money and you won't be making any money at all."

(ee) Syph's statement to Highsmith that anyone who files a grievance would be fired.

(ff) Syph's statement to Edwards at the end of the 1982 season regarding Edwards' hours, "Edwards, you're through."

(gg) Syph's statement in the presence of Howard that he was discriminating in employment against named Moody supporters and that some of them would not, in the absence of a miracle, have enough hours in 1983 to be hired in the future. His phrase was, "When it comes to — a — around, I'm an expert."

(hh) Syph's statement in the presence of Howard that he was taking steps to see to it that Robert Moody would not work sufficient hours in 1983 to remain on the "experienced" list for 1984, and that he was "watching (hours) like a hawk watching chickens" to make sure that his friends would be included and that Moody supporters would be left out.

(ii) Syph's statement that the Company was enlarging the ranks of "experienced" or "qualified" men in 1984 so that ratification of the new contract would be insured.

Shortly after the consolidated complaint issued in this case in the spring of 1984, Syph had occasion to discuss this case with Howard and to compare it with the U.S. district court proceeding before Judge Young, which had taken place in 1981 and 1982. Syph told Howard that District Judge Young would not have a "damn thing" to do with the forthcoming NLRB proceeding and that "I'm going to have my federal judge" hear the Board case. No authority has been presented to the effect that a statement reflecting on the impartiality of a forthcoming Board proceeding constitutes a violation of the Act, so I will not find a violation based on these remarks. However, Syph's statement is further evidence of animus and will be regarded as such.

4. The removal of Charles Moody as dock steward

On November 3, 1981, Charles Moody was removed as dock steward and became a rank-and-file employee enjoying "preferred" status in hire. He retains that position today. This action brought about a substantial change in Moody's employment situation and his annual earnings. There is no doubt why he was so treated.

Acting in response to a vote of the executive board and of the membership of Local 1982, Moody filed two representation petitions and an unfair labor practice charge on October 2. He followed up this action by filing two additional representation petitions on October 31. The ILA's response was swift and angry. Sullivan called Moody, asked him what he thought he was doing, and told him bluntly, "We can't stand for this." Sullivan then recommended to the ILA's general president that Moody be removed, and the general president agreed. A pro forma investigation ensued and an expected recommendation was returned to the ILA executive council recommending removal. Moody was removed. Shortly thereafter, he was summoned to face internal charges seeking to discipline him both for filing representation petitions and an unfair labor practice charge. The outcome of that effort was stymied only because Moody and others obtained a district court injunction, still in effect, which prevented the ILA from going any further.

Cases cited above make it abundantly clear that taking internal union action or causing the discharge or other adverse personnel action against a member because he seeks to vindicate his rights or the rights of others before the Board is an unfair labor practice. Shop stewards are not exempted from this protection. It is true that Moody, in addition to being a shop steward, was ipso facto a supervisor at the time of his removal. This does not exempt him from the protection of the Act. In a long line of cases beginning with Better Monkey Grip Co., 115 NLRB 1170, enfd. 243 F.2d 836 (5th Cir. 1957), the Board extended the mantle of the Act's protection to supervisors who are discharged for union activities, including but not limited to the filing of charges or petitions.[63] Recent revisions of the Act have not withdrawn that protection from supervisors who file charges and petitions or who testify before the Board, either in representation or in unfair labor practice proceedings. Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982); A & E Stores, 272 NLRB 737 (1984). Accordingly, by its action in removing Charles Moody as dock steward and causing TWT to effectuate a substantial change in Moody's employment status, Respondent ILA violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.[64]

5. The demotions of Edwards and Marsenburg

Both Edwards and Marsenburg, staunch Moody supporters, were "preferred" men in 1981. Edwards was and still is generally recognized as the number two man in the Moody faction. Both Edwards and Marsenburg worked well in excess of the 1000 qualifying hours demanded of experienced employees under the contract. There is no suggestion in the record that either was an unsatisfactory employee. Edwards was, during 1981, both the lines dispatcher and a laborer and forklift operator. On November 3 he lost his position as lines dispatcher and was thereby stripped of any indicia of supervisory authority. Marsenburg worked mostly as a checker, but was also assigned to work as a forklift operator and as a laborer. At the beginning of the 1982 season, they were replaced on the preferred list by two Syph supporters—Walter Sampsel and Joseph Victorian—who, in 1981, had worked 358 and 225 hours, respectively. To cushion this blow, Edwards and Marsenburg were both given preference in order of call among the 26 experienced employees, but this preference availed them little. Edwards worked 301 hours in 1982 and Marsenburg worked 243 hours. Neither received any compensated lines assignments, although Sampsel received 44 hours of lines and J. Victorian got 99. As a result, Edwards' total hours declined 74 percent, while Marsenburg's loss of hours was 81 percent, in a year when the overall decline in hours worked by stevedores was 26.7 percent.

Their preference in call as experienced men was short-lived. In 1983, both lost this standing at the beginning of the season and were assigned by Syph among the 26 experienced men in any order he saw fit. As a result, by the beginning of the 1984 season, Marsenburg lost all preferment and became a casual while Edwards came within 94 hours of losing his experienced rating. Edwards testified without contradiction that he never missed a shapeup. Marsenburg's 1980 operation and subsequent health difficulties accounted for only a few absences at shapeup.

The background of animosity toward all Moody supporters was, as outlined above, both deep and abiding. The day that Syph took over as dock steward he threatened to drive Edwards off the docks and told Edwards that he was fired. Syph's animus toward Marsenburg was also expressed on at least one occasion when he called Marsenburg a scab. As noted above, this animus on the part of Syph is attributable to both Respondents.

TWT justified its action in replacing Edwards and Marsenburg with Sampsel and Victorian on the basis that it needed more versatility. Sampsel was a checker and J. Victorian could operate a crane as well as other machinery. If it wanted to place J. Victorian and Sampsel or anyone else on the preferred list for any reason, TWT was contractually free to do so. What TWT never explained is why it felt called on to remove Edwards and Marsenburg from that list in 1982 in order to make room for two Syph supporters. TWT was contractually free to maintain a preferred list of any size. Early in the 1981 season, it started operations with a list of 13 and quickly increased that number to 16. In 1982, it was free to enlarge that list to any other number it chose. Instead of increasing the size of the list when it wished to add the names of J. Victorian and Sampsel, TWT opted to remove two men, and the two it chose to remove were the only Moody supporters on that list other than Charles Moody himself. It strains credulity to believe that this selection was mere coincidence.

Staler told Edwards that he had been removed from the preferred list because of politics. It is equally clear that Marsenburg was removed for the same reason. Davis admitted that he discussed the proposed revision with ILA officials before making it and they agreed. Their agreement indicates collusion with this action, although it suggests that TWT rather than the ILA was the moving party. However, the ILA cannot absolve itself from responsibility for what occurred. If the ILA was not the efficient cause of this substitution, its hostility toward Local 1982 and the Moody faction was at least the material cause for the selection of Edwards and Marsenburg, rather than 12 or 13 other preferred men, for demotion to make room for Sampsel and J. Victorian. Accordingly, its participation in the event was sufficient to constitute "an attempt to cause" TWT to discriminate on the basis of union considerations, in violation of Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

[63] See, e.g., VADA of Oklahoma, 216 NLRB 750 (1975); Donelson Packing Co., 220 NLRB 1043 (1975).

[64] The actions of the ILA directed against Moody cannot be excused, as the ILA argues in its brief, because Moody was a union official whose action in filing a decertification petition struck at the core of the Union's status as bargaining representative. Moody's removal as dock steward was not a mere internal union matter. It had a devastating effect on Moody's employment status and, over the years, it cost Moody many thousands of dollars in lost income. A union is not free under the Act to effectuate internal union policies by actions that detrimentally affect a member's employment status.

Because of limitations, TWT cannot be charged with a violation for the 1982 demotion of Edwards and Marsenburg from preferred status. At the beginning of the 1983 season, however, TWT discontinued their preference in order of call on the experienced list. On that occasion, it committed a further discrimination in employment based on union considerations, and it did so less than 6 months before the filing of the CA charge in August 1983. Accordingly, by removing the preference in order of call that Edwards and Marsenburg enjoyed up to the beginning of the 1983 season because of intraunion factional considerations, TWT violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[65]

6. Grievances

In Miranda Fuel Co.,[66] and its progeny, the Board took on itself the task of policing the relationship of labor organizations to their members to insure that members are not subjected to actions that, in a general sense, are taken or acquiesced in for reasons that are "irrelevant, unfair, or invidious." Such actions include adjustments of seniority, referral to jobs, and negotiation of contract terms. For the most part, this doctrine has been used to police the processing of grievances and the taking of grievances to arbitration. Because the processing of grievances, as well as many other aspects of union representation, involve nice questions of judgment and discretion, the Board has had to second-guess the judgment and discretion of business agents and union officers in many concrete situations to determine if their acts were performed in good faith or were marred by "irrelevant, unfair, or invidious" considerations.

The simple fact is that grievances lodged by individual union members can be frivolous or have questionable merit, and problems of proof can be difficult or impossible to overcome in cases that appear on their face to have merit. Unions have limited resources to devote to their responsibilities and cannot take every grievance to arbitration. Moreover, union officials are fallible and most lack legal training, so they sometimes make mistakes as they undertake the representation of a member. If the Board required every grievance to be processed to the highest step of the grievance procedure or beyond, employers would be inundated with complaints by union officials acting out a scenario in order to avoid liability for "irrelevant, unfair, or invidious" behavior. Moody testified that he felt it was a union official's responsibility to process every grievance filed by a member, regardless of whether the grievance had merit. As a statement of personal philosophy, his position is outside the realm of official comment. As a matter of law, it is simply untrue.[67]

The ILA seeks to escape liability for the mishandling of grievances filed by Local 1982 members and others on the basis that it was overwhelmed with a plethora of complaints that were filed for political purposes, that most grievances were taken to the third step and were denied, that most grievances were in fact without merit under the contract as the ILA construed that contract, and that repeated grievances on the same decided points were filed by grievants who knew their complaints were without foundation, but who filed them just to harass the dock steward and the Company. Respondent ILA seeks to come under the umbrella of several decisions in the Miranda Fuel line of cases to the effect that a union is under no obligation to process unmeritorious grievances or to take frivolous complaints to arbitration, and that most of the complaints filed by "Moody men" were just that—frivolous and unmeritorious.

Miranda Fuel and succeeding cases are of consequence only when a union's conduct or misconduct is unaffected by conventional union or intraunion considerations, thus forcing the Board to look to other factors to determine if a violation of the Act has taken place. Indeed, it was this fundamental distinction that the Second Circuit deemed to be controlling when it reversed the Board in Miranda Fuel. Where, as here, a respondent union's handling of grievances is permeated by factional considerations and animosity growing out of intraunion political considerations, the Miranda Fuel doctrine is simply inapplicable and it is unnecessary to inquire whether, in addition to its flagrantly discriminatory motivation, the actions of the ILA were also invidious, unfair, or irrelevant. If the grievance machinery is operated to the detriment of grievants because the union wishes to punish them or to dissipate the strength of political dissidents, then the correctness of the judgment and discretion of union agents who handled the grievances, or their diligence in pursuing them, is itself irrelevant.

Syph admitted that he never made any investigation into the merits of any grievance that had been filed with him, other than to consult the Company. He admitted that he never argued the merits of a grievance to the Company in the posture of an advocate. He never took a grievance to arbitration because he never disagreed with the company position regarding any of the 3700 grievances that were filed between 1981 and 1984. He never pursued the question of payment of a sum held in escrow as the result of the granting of a grievance by the Company in 1981, because he had faith that the Company would get around to paying when it felt like it. He made an effort to discourage grievants from filing grievances by telling them at one time that he would only be available to receive grievances after shapeup, and grievants would have to come to his office to file. Although the Company insisted that oral presentation of a grievance to the foreman was an essential first step in processing, Syph never took up any grievance with any foreman, other than on one or two occasions discussed in this decision. For that matter, the company president never took up the merits of any grievance with any of the foremen either. Foremen were simply out of the picture in processing grievances, although the contract indicates quite clearly that they should be an integral part of step one.

[65] TWT's insistence that it could not discriminate among its employees on the basis of union considerations because all of its employees were members of Local 1982 deserves only a short footnote. TWT was well aware of the factional fight between Moody and Syph supporters. Its marine foremen, Staler and Tefft, were old hands on the Toledo docks and were well aware of who was in which faction. Edwards' removal as lines dispatcher on the arrival of Syph as dock steward was a matter of prominent company and general knowledge on the Toledo waterfront, and Syph's intimate knowledge of who belonged to which camp is imputable to TWT because of Syph's status as a TWT supervisor.

[67] Auto Workers (North American Rockwell), 194 NLRB 1085 (1972); Retail Clerks Local 1357 (Lit Bros.), 192 NLRB 1171 (1971); Postal Workers Local 4193 (U.S. Postal Service), 226 NLRB 1000 (1976); Brewery Workers (Miller Brewing Co.), 195 NLRB 772 (1972); Teamsters Local 542 (Golden Hill), 223 NLRB 533 (1976).

Syph often referred to grievants as scabs, dummies, s.o.b.'s, and in other perjorative terms. On occasion, he told grievants that their written grievances had not been presented in proper form, but he did not bother to assist in writing them in an acceptable format. On occasion, Syph's contempt for grievants sounded a peculiarly insulting and demeaning note as he handed men whom he knew were illiterate blank sheets of paper and told them to write out their complaints in longhand instead of using forms provided to them by his arch rival.

However, his conduct need not be evaluated merely on the basis that it was unfair, invidious, or discriminatory in some general ethical sense. Syph behaved as he did for conventional discriminatory motives and he was not bashful about saying so. The 30 or more instances of 8(b)(1)(A) conduct found above are the proper measure of his attitude toward union dissidents, both in administering the grievance machinery and otherwise. Syph told Tefft on one occasion that he did not owe grievants anything, punctuating his comment by calling them s.o.b.'s. He told one grievant that he was "on the wrong team." He told another that he should have left him in prison. Syph threatened a grievant that he would not be hired at shapeup if he continued to file grievances. He told another to go see Moody because Moody was his steward. He told yet another that, if the grievant continued to hang around the Moodys, he would find himself outdoors. It would serve no purpose to reiterate any more of the other findings made above concerning Syph's illegal statements to and about grievants. Suffice it to say that they place beyond all prudent doubt the fact that Syph and the ILA operated the grievance machinery established by the ILA-TWT contract in a manner calculated to restrain and coerce union members in the exercise of rights guaranteed to them by Section 7 of the Act and, in so doing, violated Section 8(b)(1)(A). I so find and conclude.

7. Discrimination in employment

The question of discrimination in employment since November 3, 1981, is the core of this case and this issue is a vexing one, not because of any scarcity of evidence of animus, but because of the impact of shapeup procedure employed by TWT (and traditionally by most employers in the stevedoring business). In a factory or store setting, employment is a continuum that proceeds from day to day and week to week. Employees are not hired at the beginning of each day and laid off at the end of the day. If they are terminated, for discriminatory reasons or any reasons, an abrupt halt comes about in their relationship with their employer at a particular time, and the reason for the termination can be assessed on the basis of evidence available. As a result, when a backpay remedy for illegal conduct is appropriate, the beginning and end of the backpay period normally can be determined quite easily, although offsets and other defenses may cause a supplementary proceeding to be hotly litigated in a few instances.

In an industry employing a daily shapeup, no one is really hired until he is told, either at shapeup or at some other point in time, to go to work at a particular job on a particular day. Employees are essentially ongoing applicants whose prospects for a day's work may, in some instances, be quite good, but who are never wholly assured of working on any given day until their application is accepted in some manner and they are instructed what job to take for the day. If an individual does not show up at shapeup for any reason, he is normally not hired. With the exception of preferred men, there is usually no work between December 15 and April 15 of the following year. Regarding lines, the procedure in effect before May 23, 1984, was that every employee was essentially on call, but had no work until he was called. Although Edwards made some effort to equalize lines, the result of his effort was at best a rough approximation of a norm. Syph made no such effort at all.

Moody testified that Local 1982 now has 135 paid up members. In his view, most if not all of them are discriminatees. In his bill of particulars, the General Counsel narrowed this number to some 107 Local 1982 members who could properly be deemed "Moody men" and discriminatees. The problem with both of these contentions is that, in order to become a discriminatee, one must be an employee first. Long ago that term was construed broadly enough to include job applicants.[68] There are only about 50 regular or semiregular job slots at TWT, however. Only 90–110 different individuals are hired in the course of an entire shipping season, and this fact alone limits the number of those who can lay any claim to be bona fide applicants in any realistic sense. These factors pose problems in determining who is an employee. One cannot be deemed a discriminatee simply by being a member of Local 1982, while making no effort to apply for work. The question of how to compute backpay for such sporadic applicants further muddies the waters, as does the contention of the General Counsel that many Moody men simply stopped coming to shapeup because they knew that Syph would not hire them, arguing from this premise that their nonappearance should not be deemed a failure to seek daily employment under normal shapeup practice. This contention is well founded. Crawford Container, 234 NLRB 851 (1978).

One can hardly claim discrimination in employment on the basis of loyalty to Local 1982 or to the Moody faction if one did not acquire with TWT some kind of employment status in 1981 when Moody was doing the hiring, or if one's employment status in 1981 was limited to one or two calls for lines. The core of company employment is the loading and unloading of ships, for which shapeup appearances or status on the preferred list was a requisite. Lines simply provided a few extra hours of pay to supplement earnings derived from the principal part of a day's work.

If one worked at shapeup in 1981 and then worked fewer hours in 1982 there is a solid basis for claiming a discrimination in hire or tenure, within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. TWT's argument that stevedores got less work in 1982 because there was less work to do cuts little ice because some 20 TWT employees received more hours of employment that year than they did in 1981. There was in fact less work to do in 1982, but there was much less work to do for many individuals because working hours had been rearranged to suit political needs and desires of both respondents. The 63 individuals listed in Appendix A of this opinion were all Moody men. Moody acknowledged them as such and Syph did not contest his evaluations. Each of them signed one or more petitions that were forwarded to the ILA or the GLD in support of Moody positions taken in the factional fight that erupted anew in fall 1981. Accordingly, their sentiments were well known to ILA and GLD officials, including Syph.[69] Each of those 63 worked at shapeup (or on the preferred list) in 1981 and most worked on lines as well. A company record in the form of a printout indicates that all 63 were hired either on April 20, 1981, the first day of hire in the 1981 season, or at some later date during the 1981 season. Each received fewer hours of work in 1982 than in 1981. As a class all were the subject of the intense anti-Moody sentiment that has been detailed above. Many were personally disparaged and berated by Syph for their support of the Moodys. These factors taken together are sufficient to make them both TWT employees and men who suffered discrimination on the basis of intraunion factionalism. By discriminating or causing TWT to discriminate against them in hire or tenure on the basis of union considerations, Respondent ILA violated Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.[70]

Because of limitations contained in Section 10(b) of the Act, TWT may feel that a comparison of hours worked in 1981 against hours worked in 1982 cannot form a basis for a finding of discrimination on its part, since such a finding includes operative facts that predate the time in which TWT has any exposure under the Act. A similar comparison between the hours worked in 1981 by Moody supporters listed in Appendix A and the hours worked by those same individuals in 1983, after TWT's potential liability began, tells the same story. The 1983 shipping season was a better season than 1981. Employment opportunities, measured in total hours worked by all TWT employees in those 2 years, improved, in that there was 10.5 percent more work available in 1983 than in 1981. Notwithstanding this fact, 61 of the 63 Moody men listed in Appendix A worked fewer hours in 1983 than in 1981. For many of them, the decline in employment was precipitous. Only Merrill and Ben among all Moody supporters worked more hours in 1983 than in 1981. Merrill worked 10.5 percent more hours in 1983 than in 1981, less than the overall average, and Ben worked 17 percent more hours in 1983 than in 1981. Interestingly enough, both of these men were dropped from the ranks of experienced employees in the following year when TWT went about its evaluation procedure in May 1984, because TWT supervisors rated them as poor employees who could not do much of anything and who were too weak to perform any jobs that required exertion and heavy lifting. In short, the same enduring animus that TWT has exhibited toward Moody followers throughout its tenure on the docks resulted in the same discriminatory conduct in 1983 that took place in 1982, and thus forms a basis for finding an 8(a)(1) and (3) violation on the part of TWT in that year, as it did for an 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) finding against the ILA based on events in 1982.

Once an employee becomes a discriminatee, he remains a discriminatee until his discrimination is fully remedied. It is not necessary to follow his progress or decline into future seasons in order to have this status renewed. The question then becomes an issue of the quantum of backpay to be received, not of basic entitlement to an unfair labor practice remedy. As a matter of fact the discrimination practiced on the Toledo docks was such that it continued to bear bitter and continuing fruit during all ensuing shipping seasons. Those who failed to work 350 and then 200 hours because of discrimination practiced on them in a prior season thus became further disadvantaged in the following year. By failing to work the qualifying number of hours, an individual could lose his position on the experienced list and, having lost that preferment, would predictably work even less and have an even flimsier chance of qualifying for preferment a year later. In short, the discriminations practiced in this case had a snowballing effect. Syph's statement that he was watching hours of employment like a hawk so that his family and friends would prosper and Moody's followers would suffer, is a clear indication of ongoing discrimination, as is the fact that his plenary power to assign lines in 1982 and 1983 gave him the procedural device to carry out his announced intention.

Because of limitations discussed above, the exposure of TWT to unfair labor practice findings and a consequent financial liability can only extend back to February 12, 1983, some 6 months prior to the filing of the first CA charge. TWT's liability should begin promptly on that day. Within 6 weeks of the issuance of the first consolidated complaint in this case, Davis wrote a letter to three of his supervisors in which he told them that the Company was being forced to "change our entire approach to hiring to avoid being victimized by the long existing political history of various dock factions . . . . Therefore, it is our intention to assume total control of hiring practices, based upon qualifications of the individuals who, during our time as operators, have worked for TWT." This paper trail led to an evaluation by 3 foremen of some 63 individuals for 50 slots, 16 of which were preferred and the others of which were denominated as "qualifying." These evaluations established a permanent cadre of employees who then became eligible to gain "seniority" under a contract that took effect on May 22, 1984, and is still in operation.

[69] Most significant of these petitions was the one submitted by Moody to the ILA on January 22, 1982, well in advance of the 1982 season, in which Moody protested the effort of the Syph faction to form another local.

[70] Under well-established law, these 63 individuals, as discriminatees, would be eligible to vote in any representation election conducted by the Board among the ranks of TWT's stevedores. O'Keeffe Electric Co., 158 NLRB 434 (1966); *L. In fact, TWT was not a victim of a long-existing political history of political warfare between dock factions. TWT was and remains an active and knowing perpetrator of discriminatory practices on the Toledo docks, and the hiring system it established to replace the daily shapeup is as much a part of those practices as was the shapeup. TWT attempted to arrange for ILA recognition for its dock employees before it ever received a contract to operate on the docks. Arranging for an ILA contract, including ILA recognition, was as much a part of TWT's preliminary startup activity in 1981 as submitting a bid to the Toledo-Lucas County Port Authority. Seeing to it that neither Moody nor Local 1982 had any say in contract negotiations was equally a part of that effort.

TWT first negotiated an oral contract, then assisted in securing authorization cards that would permit the contract to take effect, and then memorialized its agreement with the ILA in a memorandum of understanding. The basis for its recognition of the ILA was 13 authorization cards in a unit that numbered more than 100 employees during the first season, but this formality relating to recognition was merely a technicality that was observed to insure that it would not be faced with a negotiator who might insist on contract terms that TWT regarded as undesirable. It is obvious that TWT looked to Sullivan and others in the ILA hierarchy to keep Moody under wraps during the first season, and their confidence was not misplaced.[71]

As discussed above, TWT cooperated with the ILA over the years by using ILA dock stewards as TWT hiring supervisors. As long as peace with the ILA meant tolerating Moody and the Local 1982 seniority list, TWT did so. When it meant doing business with the Syph faction, TWT had no difficulty whatsoever in changing its factional allegiance. Only after the consolidated complaint in this case issued did TWT take any steps at all to relieve a situation that it helped to create, and it did so then in such a manner as to insure that the political gains that the Syph faction had made over a period of 2-1/2 years remained intact. Because TWT used ILA stewards as its supervisors, it is not necessary to address the arguments raised by the General Counsel or TWT relating to liability for discrimination in union hiring hall operations arising out of employer acquiescence. There was no hiring hall in operation. TWT's liability for discrimination in employment arose directly out of the daily participation of its supervisor Syph in discriminatory favoritism toward his own supporters to the detriment of Moody followers.

When it took over the dock operation in 1981, TWT was under no legal obligation to recognize the TOT-ILA Local 1982 seniority list or to recognize seniority on any other basis. Moody and his followers presumed, in filing a multiplicity of grievances, that TWT somehow acquired the Local 1982 seniority list when it acquired the dock operation, but such is not the law. Seniority arises only by virtue of contract, and TWT took great pains to state in its memorandum of understanding with the ILA that it recognized no past practices.

Having made an express disclaimer in April 1981 of any obligation to recognize the Local 1982 list, TWT went on to give that list recognized status as its own hiring practice and procedure because its own supervisors, Moody and Syph, regularly used that list throughout the 1981 season to hire all nonpreferred stevedoring employees who appeared at shapeup. As a result, at the beginning of the 1982 season, the Syph faction outnumbered the Moody faction 23 to 19 among preferred and experienced men. Two years later, in May 1984, the score was 37 to 12.

The result of discontinuing the use of the Local 1982 list at the beginning of the 1982 season and substituting in its place a list of experienced men who would be hired after preferred slots were filled was to accommodate the building of the Syph "machine" and the systematic elimination of Moody followers from the hands of TWT employees. By agreeing to this revision in TWT's hiring practice, Respondent ILA agreed to a discriminatory contractual arrangement and thereby violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. I so find and conclude. The bar erected by Section 10(b) of the Act prevents a corollary finding of a violation on the part of TWT until 1983.

In 1982, TWT eliminated two of the three Moody supporters it had placed a year earlier on its preferred list. Before the beginning of the 1982 season, TWT created a new category of employees with hiring preferment and entered into an oral agreement with the ILA, in derogation of the written contract, which resulted in a selection criteria giving the Syph faction a slight edge among TWT's 42 permanent group of stevedores. TWT allowed Syph to manipulate hours in 1982 to increase the chances that Syph supporters would gain slots as experienced men in the following year. In 1983, TWT placed eight Syph supporters on that list while removing five Moody men. The same ball was still rolling during the 1983 season and, at the beginning of the 1984 season, three more Syph supporters were placed on the experienced list, while two more Moody men were dropped.

Then came the personnel evaluations that shortly predated the implementation of the new hiring system in May 1984. I place little weight on the General Counsel's argument that the selection was illegal because the pool from which selections were made was discriminatorily arranged. I place considerable weight on the fact that the employer who was making the selection had given long and constant support to the Syph faction and had allowed Syph to build up a political following by supplying him with political patronage in the form of employment on the docks. Moreover, the size of the permanent crew was enlarged from 42 to 50, and the only explanation in the record for this increase was TWT's desire to pack the bargaining unit with individuals who would be disposed to ratify the contract, an event that TWT also orchestrated.

[71] In light of Sullivan's well-corroborated statement that TWT and ILA had agreed on the basic terms and conditions of a contract, as well as the granting of recognition on the basis of 13 cards in a unit many times that size, it is difficult to understand why the Regional Office, and ultimately the Office of Appeals, dismissed Moody's timely filed charges against TWT alleging unlawful assistance to the ILA.

Davis, who arranged for the selection process and ultimately made the determinations regarding who would be selected, gave evidence of his personal animus toward Moody in an affidavit to the district court. In that statement he said that TWT would not have come to Toledo if that had meant doing business with Moody and Local 1982. Tefft and Staler were individuals whose relatives were being accommodated by Syph in the same manner that Syph's relatives were being accommodated. Tefft's animus toward the Moody faction was clearly displayed in his conversation with Merrill, recited previously, and by a gratuitous comment he uttered during the course of his testimony in which he referred to Local 1982 as the "damn union." Staler fairly bristled toward Local 1982 in his testimony. It was these three men, plus Hardwick and Lovicott, who evaluated the 1984 group of TWT employees in 1984. It is not surprising that, among those who did not make either list, Moody men outnumbered Syph supporters 11 to 2. Nor is it mere coincidence that the ultimate composition of the list contained 37 Syph supporters and only 12 Moody men, thus radically changing the political complexion of TWT's permanent work force in a short space of 2 years. The combination of biased evaluators and a discriminatory result is enough to make out a violation of the Act. In revising its hiring system, TWT perpetuated the discriminatory features of its previous one in order that it might enjoy the benefit of patsy negotiators across the bargaining table and a patsy steward on the docks. In so doing, it violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. I so find and conclude.

Consideration must be given to the 44 members or former members of Local 1982 whom the General Counsel believes to be discriminatees, but whom I find are not.[72] Ten of these individuals are dead[73] and one is listed as disabled (Fred Carswell). Most of them did not work at all during 1981 when Moody was running the shapeup and Edwards was dispatching lines. Accordingly, it is difficult to assert that the failure of TWT to hire them in future years was the result of discrimination based on membership in Local 1982 or adherence to the Moody faction. Cross signed Syph's petition to establish a new local and can hardly be deemed a Moody follower. Only 11 of this number worked at all in 1981 and, for the most part, this work consisted of one or two lines assignments of 4 hours' duration. This is hardly enough to establish their status as an employee of TWT. Of these 44 individuals, only 9—Brock, Coleman, Conley, Corggens, Green, Hardy (Sr.), Sampsel, Stollar, and Swayze—filed any grievances after Moody was removed as steward, a fact that clearly suggests that the rest were not even applicants for employment during the period of time for which grievances can be found in this record. Of these nine, only Coleman filed more than a handful. It might be argued that these nine had some standing as employees who suffered discrimination, in that they were applicants for employment who were not hired on the dates indicated in their grievances. In light of the vast surplus of applicants who frequently besieged TWT for jobs, however, it is hard to find a preponderance of evidence that supports the view that these nine applicants did not get jobs because they were Moody men rather than because there were no jobs to be had. Accordingly, I conclude that these 44 individuals were not denied employment for discriminatory reasons under any theory, and would dismiss the consolidated complaint regarding all of them.

On the foregoing findings of fact and on the entire record considered as a whole, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Toledo World Terminals, Inc. (TWT), is now and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) and International Longshoremen's Association, Local Union No. 1982 are, respectively, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By causing or attempting to cause Respondent TWT to discriminate against employees and job applicants whose names are listed in Appendix A of this decision or any other employees regarding the hire or tenure of their employment because of intraunion factional considerations; and by maintaining with TWT a discriminatory and unlawful hiring arrangement giving preference to employees and applicants for employment on the basis of intraunion factional considerations over those whose names are listed in Appendix A of this decision, Respondent ILA violated Section 8(b)(2) of the Act.

4. By the acts and conduct set forth above in Conclusion of Law 3; by threatening employees of TWT and prospective employees of TWT with loss of work and other reprisals if they continued to support the leadership of Local 1982; by threatening them with loss of work and other reprisals for filing intraunion charges, unfair

By discriminating against employees and applicants for employment whose names are listed in Appendix A to this decision because of their membership in and support for Local 1982; and by maintaining and giving effect to an agreement or arrangement with the ILA to discriminate in employment against employees and applicants for employment whose names are listed in Appendix A of this decision, because of their membership in and support for Local 1982, Respondent TWT, Inc., has violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that both Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I will recommend that they be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take other affirmative actions designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act. Because the unfair labor practices found demonstrate on the part of both Respondents a deep and abiding disregard for the fundamental rights of their employees and members, I will recommend to the Board broad 8(a)(1) and (b)(1)(A) remedies designed to suppress any and all violations of those sections of the Act. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). I will recommend that Respondent TWT be required to offer to the 63 individuals named in Appendix A of this decision full and immediate reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent employment and to make them whole for any loss of earnings that they may have suffered by reason of the discriminations found. In the case of Marsenburg and Edwards, a reinstatement remedy means restoring their preferment in order of call among all employees whose names are not on the preferred list. Because Section 10(b) of the Act precludes any finding that TWT violated the Act by removing Marsenburg and Edwards from the preferred list in 1982, the remedy relating to their status can only address the violation found, namely that TWT, in 1983, eliminated their order of call among experienced employees. Accordingly, I must decline the General Counsel's request to direct reinstatement of these individuals to the preferred list.

I will also recommend that Respondent ILA share jointly and severally in the payment of backpay due and owing since TWT's liability commenced on February 12, 1983, and that it bear full responsibility for any losses occasioned by its unlawful conduct before that date. I recommend that Respondent ILA bear full liability for compensating Charles Moody for any losses he may have sustained because of the discrimination in employment that was caused by his removal as dock steward. All backpay should be computed in accordance with the quarterly method set forth in F. W. Woolworth, 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest at the adjusted prime rate used by the Internal Revenue Service for assessing interest on tax payments. Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146 (1980); Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). This recommended remedy contains no cutoff date regarding backpay liability.

Having recited this almost ritual language governing remedies in discrimination cases, I feel that it is necessary to go further in this case. Normally the formula to be applied for computing backpay is a matter left to supplementary proceedings, but such is not always the case.[74] In the case of Charles Moody, the formula is a relatively simple one—the difference between what he would have earned as dock steward after November 3, 1981, less what he actually earned. In the case of Edwards and Marsenburg, who are the subjects of specific individual findings of discrimination, the formula is also relatively straightforward—the difference between what they would have earned from 1982 onward as preferred men, less what in fact they actually earned. An equitable number of lines assignments must also be cranked into this computation.

The other 60 individuals constitute a class of discriminatees whose individual members have been identified. Accordingly, it would both be equitable and in keeping with Board practice to provide them a remedy that has been designed for them as a class, rather than require the General Counsel to probe into each day's hiring over a period of 4 years to determine what money is due and owing on a daily basis to each of 60 persons. Such a probe would be particularly difficult in this case because of the failure of both Respondents to keep sign-in sheets or other records (at least until May 1984) showing who had appeared at shapeup, but had not been hired. Such a remedy would also avoid endless controversy concerning which Moody followers had failed to attend shapeups on which days because they had been discouraged from attending by previous discriminatory practices, who had been forced to seek other employment, and who stood on which side of the fence at the daily shapeup.[75]

[74] See, for instance, Iron Workers Local 373 (Building Contractors), 232 NLRB 504 (1977); Boilermakers Local 154 (Service Contractors), 253 NLRB 747 (1980), and cases cited at 758 fn. 17.

In fashioning a backpay remedy, it is well to heed the words of Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci in the above-cited Iron Workers Local 373 case:

> This case at bar brings to light still another instance of such widespread flouting of the law, such longstanding, repetitious, and pervasive violations of the statute that the normal or usual remedial Board techniques are pointless. In fact, the record, as a whole strongly suggests that these two local unions are counting upon standard procedural delays inevitably tied to the usual Board practices in order to continue right on with their now long-established practice of denying work to any hiring hall applications but their own members. It is for this reason that Respondents demand to be shown now each and every instance where they in fact prejudiced a man. That infinitessimal question alone, were it to be permitted to stall this proceeding, would mean months of detailed bookkeeping before a Board finding of any kind could issue—with Respondents all the while continuing the illegal practices of the past. This is why I think finding a few hundred separate violations suffices instead.
> But the same delay—reaching into years—is sought obliquely via the make-whole route. In the normal case, after the Board finds an unfair labor practice was committed, a check is made to ascertain how much the discriminatees lost in wages. The standard backpay specifications detail to the penny precisely how much Smith "would have earned" had the union not ignored his right to work. In this case it is not possible to restructure the past—i.e., it is not possible to determine with any rational degree of certainty how much each of the 22 . . . individuals named in the complaints—to say nothing of those in fact discriminated against but not yet identified!—would have earned had they been sent to work in proper rotation. The inquiry in each of maybe a thousand instances would become so ramified and speculative that in the wasted morass of time and energy the misconduct would simply remain unremedied. Counsel for the locals correctly said, at the hearing: "Neither of us are that young to do that." Supra at 517-518.

Judge Ricci went on to outline what he called "a guess—but a rational, educated, justified, and unavoidable guess." His guess was upheld by the Board. He found both the average yearly earnings of illegally treated nonmembers and the average yearly earnings of favored members who regularly received referrals, deriving those figures from union fringe benefit fund records. He then compared the average earnings of discriminatees with an average yearly earning of all employees—both favored and disfavored. The difference between the overall average yearly earnings and the average for discriminatees formed the basis for backpay calculations. To the claim that this formula was speculative and contained guesswork that would prejudice the respondents, the administrative law judge simply cited the holdings in several court and Board cases to the effect that the burden is on the wrongdoer to establish facts that would mitigate its liability and that, in case of doubt, it is the wrongdoer who should suffer because it is he who is responsible for the existence of any uncertainty involved in the computations. NLRB v. Brown & Root, Inc., 311 F.2d 447 (8th Cir. 1963); United Aircraft Corp., 204 NLRB 1068 (1973); J. H. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co., 194 NLRB 19 (1971).

The same general approach, prompted by the same factors and considerations, should be applied to the formulation of a backpay remedy for the 60 discriminatees who, as a class, were the victims of illegal conduct on the part of both Respondents. Record evidence contains the total number of hours that each of these individuals worked in 1981, when presumably they were hired at shapeup and called out on lines without discrimination based on factional considerations (except, perhaps, for the last month of that year). Those hours worked should constitute the base figure for each individual backpay computation. It was established that the Company suffered a decline in business in 1982, followed by increases in each of the following years. That decline and those increases, measured in terms of overall hours worked by all TWT employees during each season, has been set out in detailed percentage points in this decision. Based on these figures, each of the 60 discriminatees should be held to have worked, had he not been denied employment for illegal reasons, the same number of hours each season as he did in 1981, subject to a percentage reduction or increase for each ensuing season reflecting the annual business decline or improvement for that year. Individual offsets, such as interim earnings or time missed because of illness, can then be adjusted after these initial calculations are made. I recommend this formula to the Board as part of the remedy in this case.

A further remedial point must be addressed. Because violations of the Act tend to become stylized in Board decisions, remedies for those violations tend to become stereotyped. The Act does not require this result but years of practice have generated it. While reinstatement and backpay are the commonplace remedies for discrimination in employment, in proper cases the Board has issued a bargaining order to complement its finding of an 8(a)(3) violation, without ever finding that a refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) has occurred.[76] When such a remedy was challenged as inappropriate, the Third Circuit stated:

> The design of the Board's order in directing Piasecki to bargain is to deprive it of the advantage gained in violating the Act.
> We cannot agree with Piasecki that because the Board found no violation of Section 8(a)(5) it could

[75] Issues concerning earnings derived from other employment and loss of time due to injury and illness can be asserted as offsets against gross backpay. These and similar matters are traditional questions that are litigated in supplementary proceedings when they cannot be adjusted administratively.

not resort to this order as a remedy for the violation of Section 8(a)(3).[77]

More closely in point to the matters litigated in this case and to the remedy being recommended is the Board's recent decision in Longshoremen ILA Local 1814 (Jackson Engineering), 265 NLRB 1688 (1982). In that case the Board ordered the employer respondent to cease and desist from recognizing the union that represented its bargaining unit employees, although there was no evidence in that case that the union failed to represent the majority of the employees in question or that the unlawful assistance found had any bearing on the union's majority status. When this remedy was challenged as punitive, the District of Columbia Circuit upheld the Board with the following comments:

> This Court recognizes . . . that the fashioning of remedies in the field of labor relations frequently calls for flexible application of familiar statutory policies to novel factual situations, and that the Board possesses broad discretion in the matching of remedies to wrongs. Cognizant of such administrative discretion, and attentive to the central policy of the NLRA—to allow workers free exercise of their rights to bargain collectively—we rule that the remedies ordered by the Board bear a reasonable relation to the violations found. Where corruption is endemic to the relations between an employer and union, the Board is justified in requiring a fresh start under which employees may freely designate a collective bargaining representative of their choice.
> The Board has the remedial authority and responsibility to apply its discretion to all factual configurations that come before it; issuance of certain remedies is not limited to standard factual situations. Longshoremen's Local 1814 v. NLRB, 735 F.2d 1384, at 1387, 1388, 1402 (1984).

In this case, the General Counsel did not allege that TWT had, over the years, given unlawful assistance and unlawful recognition to the ILA in violation of Section 8(a)(2) of the Act. Evidence adduced in support of the 8(a)(3) violation, however, clearly points to such unlawful assistance and continued recognition. A "fresh start" remedy has a stronger basis in this record than it did in the Jackson Engineering case, for there is considerable doubt that the ILA obtained sufficient cards to acquire majority status among all stevedoring employees to support its original demand for recognition, and there is an abundance of evidence demonstrating a refusal by the ILA to fulfill its duty to represent fairly all the members of the TWT bargaining unit.

TWT began to operate in Toledo in 1981 with the fixed intention of avoiding the institutionalized boondoggling that had spelled ruin for its predecessors. Having avoided certain mistakes of earlier stevedoring companies, TWT then went on to make some of its own. Principal among TWT's own mistakes was an equally determined effort to choose a bargaining agent for its employees and to maintain that bargaining agent in power. As noted before, TWT arranged its hiring pattern to favor the Syph faction. Over the years, it supplied Syph with the patronage to build his political faction. Davis stated categorically that TWT would not have come to Toledo if doing business on that port meant recognizing Local 1982 and bargaining with Charles Moody. TWT enlarged its bargaining unit in 1984 to make sure that the current contract would be ratified by the Syph followers, whom it added to its payroll just before the contract ratification date. To permit TWT to continue to discriminate in this manner, for its own advantage and to the detriment of many Local 1982 members, and then to allow the passage of time to cement in the Syph faction as the dominant faction on the docks, would be nothing less than a reward both for violating the Act and for longterm persistence in doing so. Accordingly, I will recommend to the Board that TWT be required to put an end to its collusive relationship with the ILA and to the Syph faction and to withdraw recognition from the ILA as the bargaining agent for its stevedoring employees, unless and until the ILA becomes certified as the result of a Board-conducted election. In no other way can any semblance of industrial democracy be restored to the Port of Toledo.

I will also recommend that the respondents be required to post the usual notices, advising their members and employees of their rights and of the remedy in this case. Because Respondent ILA has no office or hiring hall in the Toledo area, I would direct it to mail a copy of its notice to every living person whose name appears on the Local 1982 seniority list. The General Counsel has requested that the remedy include a so-called visitatorial clause permitting the use of court-supervised discovery to determine whether the parties have complied with the terms and conditions of this remedy. Because of the complicated and detailed nature of this case and the obdurate behavior of both respondents, I will recommend this remedy to the Board. See NLRB v. Steinerfilm, 702 F.2d 14 (1st Cir. 1983).

Appendix A Explanation

A. Place on old Local 1982 seniority list, as the entry suggests, the order in which the discriminatee's name was found on the seniority list that was used in 1981 by Moody to call off the names of all nonpreferred TWT employees at shapeup. (G.C. Exh. 3.)

B. The date of hire noted under the names of the discriminatees was taken from a printout prepared by TWT from its records. (C.P. Exh. 3).

C. Summary of anti-Syph or anti-ILA activity is as follows, all in 1982:

1. Indicates that the individual was the signer of a petition submitted to the ILA by Moody about January 22, 1982, in opposition to the effort then underway to charter another ILA general cargo local in the Port of Toledo. (G.C. Exh. 105.)

2. Indicates that the individual was a signer of an internal union charge submitted to the ILA alleging that

Syph, as ILA dock steward, refused to process grievances. (G.C. Exh. 118(b).)

3. Indicates that the individual was a signer of a petition submitted to the ILA alleging that Syph, as dock steward, was derelict in enforcing the hiring provisions in the TWT-ILA contract. (G.C. Exh. 118(c).)

4. Indicates that the individual was a signer of a petition submitted to the ILA allegedly protesting a policy inaugurated by the ILA, at the International level, in refusing to load ships to or from the Soviet Union in order to protest the Russian invasion of Afghanistan.

5. Indicates that the individual was the signer of a petition submitted to the ILA alleging that it had failed to collect and remit to TWT employees certain tonnage incentive and container royalties that were levied under the TWT-ILA contract as part of the compensation of TWT employees. (G.C. Exh. 118(a).)

6. Indicates that the individual was a signer of a petition submitted to the ILA and was refusing to ensure that the elected dispatcher (Edwards) was given recognition by TWT and allowed to function under Local 1982 bylaws. (G.C. Exh. 118(e).)

D. The hours of work set forth for each year by each named employee are taken from a list prepared by TWT from its records and submitted by TWT. (R. Exh. 25.)

E. The number of hours worked on lines in 1981 and set forth in parentheses () after the number of hours worked in 1981 up to November 3, 1981, is taken from a summary prepared by Edwards, who was lines dispatcher in 1981. (G.C. Exh. 149.)

P - Indicates that the employee in question was on the TWT list of preferred employees for that season.

E - Indicates that the employee in question was on the TWT list of experienced employees for that season. An asterisk * after the name indicates that the employee in question had preference among experienced employees in order of call.

Q - Indicates that the employee in question was on the TWT's 1984 list of 50 qualified employees who were selected and named in the 1984 contract. The notation (added) or (dropped) indicates his status was changed from the preceding list of experienced employees that was utilized during the first 6 weeks of the 1984 season under the old hiring arrangement.

The designations P, E, and Q are also used in the summary of activities of Syph supporters found in Appendix B.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by the Union December 17, 1987, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint against Biltmore Construction Company, Inc., the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. Although properly served copies of the charge and complaint, the Respondent has failed to file an answer.[1]

On February 22, 1988, the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On February 29, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Respondent filed no response. The allegations in the motion are therefore undisputed.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 14 days from service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 14 days of service, "all of the allegations in the Complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board." Further, the undisputed allegations in the Motion for Summary Judgment disclose that counsel for the General Counsel, by letter dated February 12, 1988, notified the Respondent that unless an answer was received by February 16, 1988, a Motion for Summary Judgment would be filed.

In the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely answer, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a Missouri corporation, is engaged in the construction industry and has an office and place of business in Sedalia, Missouri. Based on a projection of its operations since about October 1, 1987, at which time the Respondent commenced its operations, the Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, will annually perform services valued in excess of $50,000 in States other than the State of Missouri and will annually provide services valued in excess of $50,000 to other enterprises located within the State of Missouri, which meet the Board's jurisdictional standards. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Since about December 1987, the Union has been recognized by the Respondent as the designated collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate bargaining unit:

> All employees of Respondent performing all types of construction work within the established craft jurisdiction of the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, and in the following counties in Missouri: Andrew, Atchison, Barton, Bates, Benton, Buchanan, Caldwell, Carrol, Cass, Cedar, Chariton, Christian, Clay, Clinton, Cooper, Dade, Dallas, Daviess, Dekalb, Gentry, Greene, Grundy, Harrison, Henry, Hickory, Holt, Howard, Jackson, Johnson, Lafayette, Linn, Livingston, Mercer, Moniteau, Morgan, Nodaway, Ozark, Pettis, Platte, Polk, Randolph, Ray, St. Clair, Saline, Sullivan, Taney, Vernon, Webster, Worth, Wright and portions of Boone, Camden, Douglas, Laclede and Miller; and the following counties in Kansas: Allen, Anderson, Atchison, Bourbon, Brown, Coffey, Doniphan, Douglas, Franklin, Jackson, Jefferson, Johnson, Leavenworth, Linn, Lyon, Marshall, Miami, Nemaha, Osage, Pottawatomie, Riley, Shawnee, Wabaunsee, Wyandotte, and portions of Neosho and Crawford counties, but excluding supervisors within the meaning of the Act, and all other employees.

[1] On January 26, 1988, the Regional Director for Region 17 issued a complaint and notice of hearing in this proceeding, pursuant to Sec. 102.15 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. A copy was sent to the Respondent by first class mail and was served on counsel for the Respondent by certified mail on the same date. By letter dated February 12, 1988, counsel for the Respondent withdrew as the Respondent's representative in this proceeding. Thereafter, the General Counsel sent to the Respondent a copy of the Motion for Summary Judgment by certified mail with a copy of the complaint attached, but these documents were returned "unclaimed." The Respondent was thereafter served with a copy of the order transferring proceeding to the Board and Notice to Show Cause, by certified mail, on March 11, 1988. The record indicates no attempt was made by the Respondent to respond to this Notice to Show Cause.

About December 3, 1987, the Union and the Respondent reached full and complete agreement regarding terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the agreed-on unit to be incorporated in a collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Respondent, and executed a contract stipulation binding the Respondent to the current collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Builders' Association of Missouri, effective by its terms for the period April 1, 1987, until March 31, 1990. Since December 10, 1987, the Respondent has failed and refused to recognize and bargain with the Union and has refused to abide by and adhere to the collective-bargaining agreement.

We find that by the acts and conduct described above the Respondent has failed and refused to bargain collectively and is failing and refusing to bargain collectively with the representative of its employees, and the Respondent has been engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(5) and (1) and 8(d) of the Act.

About December 10, 1987, the Respondent, acting through Foreman Robert Cecil, at a jobsite located at 49th and Parallel in Kansas City, Kansas, informed prospective employees that they would not be hired because of their affiliation with a labor organization. We find that by such conduct the Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, and that the Respondent thereby has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

About December 10, 1987, the Respondent refused to hire job applicants Edward Anderson, William Billings, and Robert Williams because these applicants joined, supported, or assisted the Union and engaged in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection and in order to discourage employees from engaging in such activities or other concerted activities. We find that by these acts the Respondent has discriminated, and is discriminating, regarding the hire or tenure or terms or conditions of employment of its employees, thereby discouraging membership in a labor organization, and the Respondent thereby has been engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act by failing and refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union and failing and refusing to adhere to the contract stipulation executed about December 3, 1987.

2. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act by informing prospective employees that they would not be hired because of their affiliation with a labor organization.

3. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act by refusing to hire applicants because they joined, supported, or assisted the Union and engaged in protected concerted activities.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.[2]

Having found that the Respondent failed to hire Edward Anderson, William Billings, and Robert Williams in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that the Respondent offer them employment[3] and make them whole for any loss of wages and other benefits resulting from its failure to hire them starting December 10, 1987, by payment to them of a sum of money equal to the amount they would have earned in wages and other benefits from that date to the date on which employment is offered, less net earnings. The amount of backpay shall be calculated in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[4]

Having further found that the Respondent unlawfully refused to abide by and adhere to the terms and conditions of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, we shall order the Respondent to make its employees whole for any loss in wages or other benefits due to the Respondent's refusal to apply the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, as prescribed in Ogle Protection

[2] The General Counsel requested a visitatorial clause. In the circumstances of this case, that clause is unwarranted. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[3] The complaint does not state the specific type of employment the applicants were seeking. We shall leave to compliance the factual inquiry into the specific jobs sought and wages and other benefits. See, e.g., Dean General Contractors, 285 NLRB 573 (1987).

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On September 30, 1982, Administrative Law Judge Timothy D. Nelson issued the attached Decision in this proceeding. The Respondent filed exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions,[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified[3] and set out in full below.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, System 99, Oakland, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to allow an employee, on his request, the right to consult privately with an employee representative before submitting to an investigatory interview or meeting, which the employee reasonably believes may result in disciplinary action.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its Oakland, California freight terminal copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[1] In agreeing with the judge's findings that deferral to the arbitration award upholding Manning's discharge is not appropriate, we have applied the principles enunciated in Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), and affirmed in Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984). In this regard, the General Counsel demonstrated that deferral is unwarranted because the facts relevant to resolving the statutory issue relating to Manning's Weingarten rights were not presented to or decided by the arbitrator, and the contractual question decided by the arbitrator is not factually parallel to the Weingarten issue presented here.

[2] The judge correctly concluded that the interview at issue here was investigatory in nature, and we note that this case does not involve merely a physical examination or a "fitness for duty" examination, which is not within the purview of NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975). See, e.g., Postal Service, 252 NLRB 61 (1980).

[3] On our review of the record, we find that Manning was terminated because of the Respondent's belief that he had arrived to work intoxicated, and the Respondent's interpretation of Manning's conduct as a refusal to take the sobriety test. Thus, Manning's request for the right to consult with Pinkston did not form a basis for Manning's termination. In accord with Taracorp, 273 NLRB 221 (1984), which issued subsequent to the judge's decision, we find that the recommended remedy of reinstatement and backpay is inappropriate here because the Respondent discharged Walter Manning for cause. We shall modify the recommended Order by deleting provisions for make-whole relief and we will substitute a notice reflecting these modifications.

Member Johansen concurs in finding that a make-whole remedy is not appropriate where an employee has been disciplined for lawful reasons.

[4] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

TIMOTHY D. NELSON, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to timely unfair labor practice charges filed by Walter Manning, an Individual, on November 10, 1981,[1] against System 99 (Respondent), the Regional Director for Region 32 of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) issued a complaint and notice of hearing against Respondent on December 28. The complaint alleged in substance that Respondent had discharged Manning in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) as a result of a disciplinary interview between Manning and Respondent's agents during which Respondent refused—also allegedly in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act—Manning's request for a private consultation with a union representative.

Respondent answered the complaint, admitting that its operations were subject to the Board's jurisdiction, but denying all wrongdoing.

I heard the matter in trial at Oakland, California, on June 17, 1982. At the trial, Respondent asserted as a separate affirmative defense to potential liability that the Board should defer to the results of an arbitration decision in its favor, pursuant to the policy enunciated in Spielberg.[2] This defense was litigated.

The parties filed timely posttrial briefs, which I have carefully considered.

On the entire record, I make these

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. BACKGROUND

Respondent is a California corporation providing interstate freight-hauling services by truck.[3] It has a freight terminal at Oakland, California, where Charging Party Walter Manning had been employed for about 5 years before he was fired on August 21.

The facts are disputed among the witnesses only at their marginally relevant fringes. Blending the most deliberate recollections of the witnesses and ignoring contrary testimony, which was improbable and/or incredibly uttered, I find that the essential facts bearing on the lawfulness of Respondent's actions are as follows:

Shortly after Manning had arrived at the Oakland terminal on the evening of August 21 to begin a swingshift of dockwork, Respondent's terminal manager, Daniel Maher, formed the impression that Manning was intoxicated. Maher conferred with George Gallioto, Respondent's assistant vice president for operations, and then summoned Manning to a meeting in Maher's office. Maher's admitted intention was to ask Manning whether he would submit to a sobriety test and, if Manning refused, to fire Manning, treating his refusal as presumptive evidence of intoxication. Respondent's agents believed that the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and Teamsters Local 70, Manning's bargaining agent, authorized summary dismissal of a worker in the bargaining unit for intoxication, that it permitted the employer to request a worker to take a sobriety test, and, if the worker refused to take the proposed test, that it permitted the employer to treat such refusal as presumptive evidence of intoxication warranting the worker's termination.[4] Similarly, Respondent's agents believed that they would not be able to sustain a discharge decision, if it were challenged and brought to arbitration, based simply on the testimony of management witnesses that a worker appeared to be intoxicated. Rather, there were only two practical means of sustaining an "intoxication" discharge, so Respondent's agents believed; either that the worker submit to and fail some scientifically respectable sobriety test, or that he refuse to submit to it, thereby creating a presumption that management would be sustained in acting on.

Maher arranged for the presence of witnesses in the meeting room to avoid any question about the adequacy of Respondent's warning and/or the nature of Manning's reply. In addition to Maher and Manning, the meeting was also attended by Terminal Operations Manager Ron Bruno and by two employees, Gordon Pinkston and Larry Dietrich. Maher explained that Pinkston and Dietrich were intended to function merely as nonparticipating "witnesses for Manning" and that the others would be witnesses for management. According to Maher, Pinkston and Dietrich were selected, rather than Chief Steward Bailey or the swingshift steward Redding, because neither steward was then available.[5] Pinkston, says Maher, had served in a kind of "acting steward" capacity in the past when regular stewards were not available.[6]

When the meeting began, Gallioto explained to Manning that management believed that he was intoxicated, that he was being requested to take a sobriety test, and that he would be fired if he refused to do so because his refusal would cause management to presume that he was intoxicated. Manning admittedly at least dodged—if not refused—the initial request that he submit to the test, protesting that he saw no need to and that he had been on medication for a recent injury.[7] The matter did not end, here, however. Rather, for at least another 30 minutes, by all accounts,[8] Respondent's agents (mostly Gallioto) continued to ask Manning to take the sobriety test, warning of the consequences if he refused, and urging him that it was in his best interests that he do so. All parties agree, moreover, that Manning neither directly refused nor assented to these latter requests.[9]

[2] Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955).

[3] In the year before the complaint issued, Respondent performed more than $50,000 worth of services in States other than California.

[4] The union contract was not put in evidence. All parties agree, however, that the contract is not explicit, but that Respondent's agents' beliefs are well supported by the history of practice and arbitration rulings under the pertinent contract clause.

[5] Bailey was then on a driving run. Redding was not working that evening.

[7] The record is not as clear as it might be whether Manning initially expressed a clear refusal to submit to the sobriety test. Respondent's witnesses use conclusionary language in so testifying. Manning's testimony does not expressly deny this, but it also suggests that he implicitly declined the request by dodging the subject. The General Counsel concedes on brief (at Br. 2) that Manning "refused" at this juncture. I assume hereafter that Manning did so, although it is clear, as detailed below, that Respondent's agents were not content with this preliminary indication of refusal.

[8] I accept this unanimous minimum estimate, although with reservations, because it is difficult on this record to envision how the limited amount of conversation that has been described by the witnesses would require 30 or more minutes to conclude.

At some point, unnecessary to determine with precision, Gordon Pinkston made some remark to Manning tending to echo Maher's warnings that Manning could be fired for not taking the test and that taking the test might well vindicate Manning in his implicit claim that it was his recent use of a medication that accounted for management's misperception that he was intoxicated. At some neighboring point, Manning stated that he would like to talk to Chief Steward Martin Bailey, making some additional complaint to the effect that Pinkston and Dietrich were not providing him with much representation. Maher or Gallioto turned down Manning's request to see Chief Steward Bailey. Maher recalls, consistent with Manning's recollection, and I find, that either Maher or Gallioto explained to Manning that "we couldn't do that for two reasons. Number 1, that we didn't really know when Martin [Bailey] would be in, it could be another hour, it could be longer. And the second reason was that Martin couldn't do anything further than what Mr. Pinkston and Mr. Dietrich could do simply because we weren't asking [Manning] to do something that was unreasonable or out of the contract."[10]

Eventually, and after he had been denied his request to confer with Chief Steward Bailey, Mainning asked if he could step outside the office to confer with Pinkston.[11] Pinkston agreed that he would be willing to do this, but Gallioto turned down this request, as well, insisting that whatever could be said could just as well be said in front of everyone in the office.[12]

Maher or Gallioto asked Manning at least once more after the foregoing whether Manning would take the test. When Manning was again silent, he was informed by Maher or Gallioto that his initial refusal would be treated as his last word on the subject. He was then informed that he was discharged.

Respondent subsequently issued this termination memorandum to Manning:

> On August 21, 1981, you came into the terminal at 5:00 p.m., behaving in an incoherent manner, slurring your speech and smelling of alcohol. Further, after questioning you, it was management's opinion that you were unable to perform the functions of your job and could have possibly injured yourself or someone else in the workplace if allowed to continue to work.
> While still on duty, you were requested to take a sobriety test to determine if you were under the influence of alcohol. Even though it was fully explained to you that refusal to take this test would result in discharge, you refused to do so in the presence of two Local Union employees. Your refusal to take a sobriety test constitutes a presumption of drunkeness under Article 44.
> Therefore, you are hereby discharged accordingly under Articles 42 and 44 of the Joint Council Seven Local 70 Local Pick-up and Delivery Supplemental Agreement.
> All monies due you are enclosed on check numbers 081354 and 081555.

Manning's discharge was grieved by his Union. After deadlock at an intermediate stage, the matter was referred for arbitration, and an arbitration hearing was held on October 24. The details of the presentation to the arbitrator are not part of this record. The two witnesses who testified about that hearing, Gallioto and Union Representative Bud Pratt, each tended to be impressionistic in their accounts. Pratt's account was somewhat more detailed, though still summary in tone. He testified that three basic arguments were presented to the arbitrator on Manning's behalf: That the company did not advise Manning what type of sobriety test it wanted him to take; that the company did not take into account Manning's "medication" excuse and failed similarly to give weight to the fact that Manning was "still on disability" on the day he was fired; and that Manning had not received proper union representation—with the emphasis here being on the assertion that Gordon Pinkston was not an authorized steward or representative of the Union for such purposes.

The arbitrator issued a brief, handwritten decision, stating as follows:

> The company is entitled, when it has reasonable cause to believe that an employee is intoxicated, to require him to take a sobriety test. If the employee refuses, in the teeth of a warning and with proper union representation, he may be discharged. Applying these principles to this case, I find that the termination of Walter Manning was proper.

II. ANALYIS AND CONCLUSIONS

This case raises questions under Weingarten[13] concerning Respondent's right to insist that Manning answer the implicit question, "Will you submit to a sobriety test?" without allowing Manning to consult privately with either his designated union steward or with fellow employee Gordon Pinkston, the employee whom Respondent brought to the interview to play a "witness" role "for" Manning. The General Counsel makes several related claims. Initially, the General Counsel asserts that the meeting in Maher's office was "investigative" in character, carrying with it the clear potential for disciplinary action against Manning, and that, accordingly, it was not merely for the ministerial purpose of communicating a disciplinary decision already decided. Cf. Baton Rouge Water Works Co., 246 NLRB 995 (1979). Thus, argues the General Counsel, it was a classic situation in which Manning's Weingarten-established right under Section 7 of the Act to the assistance of an employee representative was triggered. The General Counsel makes two alternative Weingarten-related contentions in this regard: First, that Manning had a right to the assistance of authorized Union Representative Martin Bailey even if it might require a delay in the proceedings while awaiting Bailey's return from a driving run. Alternatively, the General Counsel contends that Manning was entitled to a private consultation with coemployee Pinkston before replying with finality to Respondent's attempt to get an answer regarding Manning's willingness to take a sobriety test. Pursuing these points, the General Counsel argues that Manning was privileged in refusing to answer the question with finality after being denied the right to consult; and that Respondent could not, under Weingarten, treat his refusal to answer as itself constituting grounds for disciplinary action. Finally, the General Counsel argues under Kraft Foods,[14] that Respondent must remedy its denial to Manning of Weingarten rights by reinstating Manning and making him whole with backpay.

[9] Maher explained that management went to great lengths to repeat its warnings and requests so that it would be "very obvious and apparent that [Manning] was given a number of choices and opportunities to comply with that request."

[10] Gallioto testified that his reason for denying this request was because he viewed Manning's request as a stalling tactic, calculated to allow the passage of enough time so that his body would have metabolized any excess alcohol in his blood. Crediting Maher, and treating Gallioto's statement of his subjective intentions on the subject as just that, I find that no such reason as Gallioto described was, in fact, given to Manning as a basis for denying him a conference with Bailey.

[12] Respondent's agents contradict themselves and one another on the precise reasons, if any, that were given by Gallioto when he turned down the request for consultation between Manning and Pinkston. There is some suggestion that Gallioto made reference to the request as a stalling tactic. Elsewhere, however, Maher implied that no reason was given and that the denial of this request was because management did not think that such consultation was appropriate to the "witness" function, which it had predetermined that Pinkston would fulfill. I conclude and find on equivocal evidence that Gallioto's suspicion that Manning was stalling was not expressed as a reason for denying the consultation request.

A. The Question of Deferral Under Spielberg

Under Spielberg, supra, the Board will refrain from deciding the statutory merits of an alleged unfair labor practice and will defer to an arbitration decision that effectively decides the same issue, provided that the arbitration proceedings were conducted in a "fair and regular" manner and that the result reached by the arbitrator was not "repugnant" to the Act. And, as the Board has subsequently made clear, a necessary condition to deferral under Spielberg is that the "statutory" or "unfair labor practice" issue be "both presented to and considered by the arbitrator," the burden being on the party urging deferral to "prove that the [statutory] issue . . . was litigated before the arbitrator."[15]

I conclude that deferral to the October 24 arbitration decision would not be appropriate since it has not been shown that the statutory issue under Weingarten was either presented to or decided by the arbitrator. Respondent's showing on these points was simply too vague about what, precisely, was presented to and considered by the arbitrator.[16] Neither does the arbitrator's decision itself reveal that he considered or decided any statutory question, let alone the many-faceted questions presented relating to Manning's Weingarten rights. Granted, the arbitrator used the expression "proper union representation" within his decision; and, implicitly, it appears that in sustaining Manning's discharge, the arbitrator concluded that Manning had somehow been accorded "proper union representation." What is missing from the record, however, is any indication that the arbitrator intended the quoted expression to refer to the statutory propriety of the "representation" that Respondent allowed Manning to have. To the contrary, if the record reveals anything of substance on the question, it is that the issue of the "propriety" of Pinskton's "representation" was cast and decided in terms of whether Pinkston had any "official" status as a steward. This is not the central issue raised by the complaint, nor is it the one I decide below. Accordingly, I would not defer to the arbitration decision.

B. The Merits

So far as my own research and the parties' briefing efforts have revealed, there are no factual precedents for this case. It may therefore be said to present another unique twist to the interpretation and application of employees' Weingarten rights. In essential agreement with the General Counsel, however, and for reasons explicated below, I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act at least by refusing Manning's request to consult privately with Pinkston before responding finally to the implicit question: "Will you submit to a sobriety test?" I further conclude that a make-whole remedy under Kraft Foods, supra, is appropriate.

It is necessary to my ultimate conclusions that Respondent's attempts to get Manning to answer the question whether he would take a sobriety test be interpreted as having an "investigative" quality to them. In this regard, it must be borne firmly in mind that Respondent did not believe itself privileged in firing Manning based simply on the perceptions of its own agents that he was intoxicated. The right of an employer to take such action for that reason is unquestioned, but Respondent's reservations were practical in character. It wanted any such decision to "stick"; and it believed, justifiably on this record, that it needed either proof in the form of test results or "constructive proof" in the form of Manning's refusal to submit to a test, creating a recognized presumption of intoxication. In these circumstances, Manning's answer to the question posed at the meeting in Maher's office was fraught with significance. Respondent's agents knew it and went to extraordinary and formal lengths to ensure that there would be no doubt about what had happened in the meeting. The meeting was therefore confrontative in character, and Manning's refusal to accept the invitation to take the sobriety test would be an "admission" for disciplinary purposes equal in strength to an employee's outright admission of misconduct in a meeting called to investigate whether the employee had engaged in misconduct.[17]

[15] Suburban Motor Freight, 247 NLRB 146, 147 (1980).

[16] This conclusion obtains even if one considers the testimony of Union Representative Bud Pratt, who was called by the General Counsel—not Respondent—regarding the details of the arbitration session.

Accepting these interpretations makes it simpler to conclude under Weingarten that Manning was entitled to the assistance of an employee representative. Weingarten makes clear that an employee who is asked to answer questions in an interview about his suspected misconduct is entitled to insist on union representation at such a meeting and that he is further insulated from discipline for refusing to participate if the employer refuses his demand for such representation. Where, as here, an employee is advised by his employer—and therefore he "reasonably believe"—that he may be disciplined if he refuses to submit to a proposed set of tests, there appears to be no reason for concluding that he should not be entitled to the services of representative before deciding what he will do. Indeed, it is commonplace for employers to tell employees that their "rights" in a given situation are limited to a single set of alternatives. And it is equally a phenomenon common to industrial life that employees will mistrust such "either/or" statements as correctly expressing their legal or contractual options. It is therefore evident that, as an exercise of the Section 7 right of employees to engage in mutual aid and protection, an employee may wish to consult with an employee representative before accepting an employer's ultimatum; and, being denied that request, that he may wish to "dummy up" in the face of further attempts by his employer to question him. Viewed this way, there is no apparent basis for distinguishing Manning's interest in representation from the interests under Section 7 that Weingarten recognizes. I therefore conclude that under these circumstances, Manning enjoyed the panoply of Weingarten protections during the meeting in Maher's office. The remaining question is whether those protections included the right to consult, and if so, with whom.

Whether Manning had a Weingarten right to delay the interview until Chief Steward Bailey returned, the question is doubtful, considering that Bailey was not expected back for perhaps an hour, so far as this record shows;[18] and the passage of that much time has made the results of any sobriety test to which Manning might ultimately agree to submit largely useless (although no record was made on this question). See, e.g., Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 227 NLRB 1276 (1977). I need not decide this question, however, because I conclude that Respondent was obligated to provide Manning with an opportunity to consult with Pinkston once Manning requested that right.

I note first in this regard that Respondent has insisted throughout these proceedings that Pinkston was a suitable "alternate" union representative. It is equally clear from Maher's testimony on cross-examination, however, that Respondent was not prepared to allow even Pinkston to play any truly "representative" role in the interview. Rather, Maher's avowed intention was simply that Pinkston would be a "witness for" Manning.

Respondent had no right to impose such limits on the function of the employee "representative" for Manning, however. Rather, it is now settled that an employee has the right to consult with an employee representative before undergoing an interview when Weingarten protections apply. Climax Molybdenum Co., 227 NLRB 1189, 1190 (1977), enf. denied 584 F.2d 360 (10th Cir. 1978); Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 262 NLRB 1048 (1982).

It was evidently the view of Respondent's agents Gallioto and Maher[19] that no amount of "consultation" between Manning and any representative could have changed the picture or altered the alternatives open to Manning as Respondent had presented them, and that any such consultation would therefore have been a waste of time.[20] This is not a judgment for Respondent to make, however. Rather, it is an employee's right under Section 7 of the Act to act in concert with fellow employees, which is the source of Weingarten protections, and, like other Section 7 rights, an employee's exercise of them is not subject to the employer's agreement that the exercise would be worthwhile. Clearly, in any case, Manning was on the spot; and it was hardly unreasonable of him to believe that a private, candid conference with an employee representative might give him a more reliable basis for deciding how to answer Respondent's question than would the statements made by the managers who had declared their inclination to fire him. The cited cases appear to contemplate exactly this kind of consultation; and it should be recalled that Respondent had the right, acknowledged by Weingarten, to proceed on the basis of information it could obtain through other means, if it did not wish to accord Manning the right to consult.

Respondent would probably argue here that there were no other means by which it could sustain Manning's discharge if he refused to take a sobriety test. But, if true, this was a dilemma of Respondent's own creation. First, if Respondent indeed has no contractual right to fire employees for perceived intoxication, it is because it has waived the right, either expressly, or by its failure to obtain more favorable contract language at the bargaining table after arbitration rulings interpreted the contract as a waiver of such rights. Second, Respondent could have accorded to Manning the right to consult an employee reprenstative, and, having done so, could have acted on the postconsultation response of Manning. I find no suggestion in Weingarten nor in the construing cases that would permit an employer to ignore an employee's Weingarten rights simply because it has waived the right at the bargaining table to act on other evidence available to it (presumably doing so to obtain some balancing concession). Rather, having made such a waiver, it is not our concern that Respondent may find it difficult to sustain an intoxication discharge unless it accords Weingarten rights of consultation before requiring an employee to make an election whether to take the sobriety test.

[17] Respondent nowhere argues that Manning's refusal to take a sobriety test would be treated as punishable "insurbordination" and it is clear on this record that Manning was not fired because of his failure to follow an order. Rather, it bears repeating that Respondent's agents were looking for proof that Manning was intoxicated, which "proof" could be supplied by his refusal to take the test.

[18] Company testimony to this effect is not impeached by Manning's testimony that he met Bailey at the terminal about 15 or 20 minutes after he was discharged. By any account of the timing, this was at least 20 or 30 minutes after Manning requested Bailey's services.

[20] I have concluded above that Respondent's agents did not express any particular concern—at least in the case of the request to "step outside" to talk to Pinkston—about the delay that granting that request might entail. Equivocal testimony by Respondent's agents supports this conclusion. I conclude here that Respondent's agents were not, in fact, particularly concerned that the request to step outside to talk with Pinkston was intended as a stall or would undermine any ultimate test results. Equivocal testimony by Respondent's agents likewise supports this conclusion. This conclusion is buttressed, moreover, by the fact that Respondent, for tactical reasons of its own, was willing to spend at least 30 minutes in attempting to extract from Manning an unequivocal refusal to submit to a sobriety test.

It is clear that Respondent chose not to fire Manning based on any impressions formed by its agents that he was intoxicated. Rather, it treated his very refusal to say whether he would take the test as tantamount to a refusal to take the test and relied on that constructive refusal as proof of intoxication, independent of its suspicions. This may, in itself, render its discharge decision unlawful as constituting, in effect, punishment for his privileged silence after being denied Weingarten rights to consult.[21] This question need not be decided, however, because the remedy would be the same in these circumstances even if Manning's discharge was for alleged misconduct, which was the subject of the August 21 meeting. Kraft Foods, supra. There, the Board held that a traditional make-whole remedy is presumptively appropriate once the General Counsel has "prov[ed] that respondent conducted an investigatory interview in violation of Weingarten and that the employee whose rights were violated was subsequently disciplined for the conduct which was the subject of the unlawful interview." On such a showing, the Board noted, "the burden shifts to the respondent . . . [who] must demonstrate that its decision to discipline the employee . . . was not based on information obtained at the unlawful interview." 251 NLRB at 598.

The prima facie basis for a make-whole order is found in the conclusion above that Respondent owed a duty to permit Manning the right to consult with Pinkston before he decided how to answer management's question, coupled with the undisputed evidence that Manning was "subsequently disciplined for the conduct [intoxication] which was the subject of the unlawful interview." Respondent came forward with no evidence in support of its own burden. To the contrary, everyone agrees that it was Manning's construed refusal to take the test that was the effective basis for his discharge. This, clearly, was "information obtained at the unlawful interview." See, especially in this regard, L. A. Water Treatment, supra at 245 fn. 9.

Respondent has also claimed—and it is tempting to conclude—that Manning's initial "refusal" to submit to the test, expressed before he made any Weingarten request, was the "independent" and real reason it relied on in firing him, and that the reason was not a product of the succeeding, unlawful portion of the interview. Whatever might have been management's right at that preliminary stage is, however, an academic question; for it is equally clear—and Maher expressly acknowledges it—that if Manning had, at any subsequent stage, indicated a willingness to take the test, he would not have been fired unless and until he failed the test. It must be recalled in this regard that if Manning had been permitted to consult with Pinkston, the latter might well have pointed out that, under the circumstances, Manning had nothing to lose by taking the test. Hearing this from a fellow employee in a candid, private setting might well have caused Manning to agree to the test, rather than remaining silent on the question. And if he had so agreed, he might have passed the test. Respondent's refusal to accord Manning those consultation rights has therefore made it impossible to know whether Manning would have been fired based on evidence other than that "evidence" which it obtained through Manning's silence—evidence that was itself tainted by its unlawful conduct. In such circumstances, under Kraft Foods, supra, Respondent has not carried the burden that shifted to it.

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By denying to Walter Manning the right to consult privately with a fellow employee before deciding how to respond to Respondent's request that he take a sobriety test, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced an employee in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act and thereby has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

June 30, 1988

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Cracraft

On December 16, 1986, the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order[1] in which it directed, inter alia, that the Respondent make whole unit employees for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. On May 14, 1987, the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit issued its judgment enforcing, among other things, the backpay provisions of the Board's Order.[2] A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay due under the Order, the Regional Director for Region 9, on January 5, 1988, issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing and on February 23, 1988, issued an amended backpay specification and an order rescheduling hearing setting forth allegations with respect to the amounts of backpay due. The Respondent was duly served with copies of each specification. The Respondent has not filed an answer to either specification and the allegations in the backpay specification, as amended, therefore stand uncontroverted.

On April 7, 1988, the General Counsel filed directly with the Board a motion to transfer proceeding to the Board and Motion for Summary Judgment with exhibits attached. Subsequently, on April 8, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring proceeding to the Board and a Notice To Show Cause why the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted, which were served by certified mail on the Respondent. The Respondent has failed to file a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On the entire record in this proceeding, the Board makes the following

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.54 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides in relevant part with respect to a backpay specification:

> (c) . . . If the respondent fails to file an answer to the specification within the time prescribed by this section, the Board may, either with or without taking evidence in support of the allegations of the specification and without notice to the respondent, find the specification to be true and enter such order as may be appropriate . . . .

The amended backpay specification specifically states that, pursuant to Section 102.54 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Respondent shall file an answer with the Regional Director and to the extent that such answer fails to deny allegations of the specification in the manner required under the Board's Rules and Regulations, and the failure to do so is not adequately explained, such allegations shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and the Respondent shall be precluded from introducing any evidence controverting them. According to the uncontroverted allegation of the Motion for Summary Judgment, counsel for the General Counsel informed the Respondent, by letter dated March 22, 1988, of the requirement to file an answer to the specification and of the General Counsel's intention to move for summary judgment in the above-styled case if no answer was filed. The letter was sent to the Respondent on the same date by certified mail. To date, Respondent has not filed an answer to the amended backpay specification, nor a response to the Notice To Show Cause.

Because the Respondent has not filed an answer to the amended backpay specification or offered any explanation for its failure to do so, in accordance with the rules set forth above the Board deems the Respondent to have admitted all allegations of the specification to be true and that there are no matters in issue requiring a hearing. Accordingly, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, B and R Coal Co., Inc., Weeksbury, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, make whole the discriminatees named below, by payment to them of the amounts following their names plus interest accrued to the date of payment to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded,[4] until payment of all backpay due is made, less tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws:

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD H. BEDDOW JR., Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard in Williamson, West Virginia, on 20 October 1987. Briefs subsequently were filed by both parties. The proceeding is based on a charge filed 24

[1] In affirming the judge's conclusion that Smith's termination violated the Act, we do not rely on the judge's finding that the Respondent allowed Preece, a truckdriver who had been convicted of vehicular homicide, to continue working for the Company as a contract hauler was evidence of disparate treatment. One of the Respondent's contentions was that its insurance company would not insure Smith because of his DWI conviction. As the record fails to show that contract haulers are covered under the Company's insurance policy, we cannot find that Respondent's treatment of Preece is relevant to the inquiry of how Smith's situation was handled.

[2] We shall modify par. 2(a) of the judge's recommended Order to conform his reinstatement language to that customarily used by the Board. We shall also modify par. 2(e) to correct an inadvertent error.

April 1987,[1] by District 30 United Mine Workers of America. The Regional Director's complaint, dated 12 June, alleges that Respondent Preece Coal Company of Turkey Creek, Kentucky, violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act by discharging employee James David Smith, by bypassing the Union, and by dealing directly with its employees concerning wage and benefit reductions.

On a review of the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Kentucky corporation engaged in the mining and sale of coal under contract with Island Creek Coal Company. During the past 12 months Respondent provided services valued in excess of $50,000 for Island Creek, an Illinois corporation that annually sells and ships coal valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside Kentucky. Respondent admits that at all times material it has been an employer engaged in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

Island Creek holds a lease on coal located in Hatfield, Kentucky. Respondent has a contract to mines and delivers this coal for Island Creek, and to conduct no other operations. Since June 1975, Respondent has recognized District 30 United Mine Workers of America as the collective-bargaining representative of all of its employees working at the Hatfield mine location.

Under its January 1985 contract with Island Creek, Respondent was paid $23 per ton of clean coal, however, effective November 1985 Respondent's payment was reduced to $22 per ton, effective August 1986 to $20 per ton, and effective December 1986 to $19.50 per ton. Its latest contractual arrangement, effective in March 1987, provides $18.50 per ton of clean coal for the first 5000 tons monthly, and a 50-cent reduction for each 5000 tons produced thereafter.

James David Smith began working for Respondent in October 1978 and worked at varying times as either a truckdriver or loader operator. Since 1979, Smith has been the union mine committeeman at Respondent's facility. He also has been the president of Local 1532 since June 1984. In 1986 Smith was employed as a truckdriver but was discharged in November 1986. Pursuant to an arbitration award dated 8 December 1986, Smith was reinstated as a truckdriver. Thereafter, in mid-January 1987, Respondent assigned Smith to operate the loader. Smith continued as a loader operator until he was discharged in April (he previously had performed the loader operator job for approximately 6 months in 1984 and 1985).

In late March, Paul Lawson, Respondent's accountant, came to the mine, met with the day-shift employees, and told them that Respondent was having financial problems and they needed to try to find a solution. Lawson explained that the problem was not a pressing one at the time, but Island Creek Coal Company was reducing the amount it paid per ton of coal and he suggested that the employees consider purchasing Respondent's stock. Lawson did not discuss the financial problems or his suggested stock purchase plan with any authorized union official prior to meeting with the employees.

Between 27 and 30 March, Mine Superintendent Jimmy Webb called Smith to the office and told him he wanted a meeting with the employees to discuss their taking a pay cut. Smith replied that it was a contract violation and he could not and would not discuss it. Webb then told Smith he had an insurance company letter saying he could not be a truckdriver. Smith replied he was not a truckdriver but a loader operator and walked away.

On Friday, 3 April, Webb met with the employees at the end of the day shift and told eight or nine day-shift and four second-shift employees that Respondent had been having financial problems and could not afford to buy supplies. He said that Respondent would close its mine if the employees did not reduce their daily wage rate to $100 per day and freeze all of their sick and personal days (daily wage rates were all more than $100 prior to this time). The discussion between Webb and the employees was underway when Smith, who had not been at work that day, joined the meeting. Smith told the other employees that Webb was violating the contract by making such a proposal, and it was a violation for Respondent to negotiate outside of the contract. Some employees suggested accepting Webb's proposal for a 30-day period, under certain conditions. This was conveyed to Webb, who refused this offer. The employees told Webb that they would not agree to a wage reduction and he responded by saying that there would be no more work. Smith instructed the men to report to work as usual on Monday, 6 April, to cover themselves, and to verify whether Respondent was going to close its operations. On Sunday evening, Respondent notified some employees to report to work the next day. On Monday, Webb also telephoned roof bolt operator Roger Stepp and told him to return to work the following day. Smith was not called to report back to work, but reported to the mine on 6 April on his own. When he went to his loader he was told to wait, and that Webb wanted to talk to him. Smith testified that Webb said, "David, I told you in the meeting the other day, if you'd stay out of this meeting and kept quiet that you'd be working. The other men are working and you're not." Smith again reported to work the following day, but was not allowed to work. Later that day Smith filed two grievances. A third grievance was filed on Friday, 10 April. Webb disagreed with each grievance on behalf of the Employer. Smith asked Webb why he would not let him work, and Webb grinned, and said that there was just no work for him and walked out.

On 15 April, Union Field Representative Vernon Adkins held a third-step grievance meeting with Webb. Smith and Lawson also were present. Adkins and Smith both testified that Adkins asked if there could be a settlement to get Smith back to work. Adkins testified that Webb said "There's no way. David would have been working, if he had kept quiet." Smith recalled that Webb replied "No, if he would have kept his mouth shut, this all could have been avoided," and that Adkins looked at him a little bewildered and asked what he had said, and Webb again said, "If they would have kept quiet, this all could have been avoided and we'd all be working now." Adkins said Webb made a similar statement three times during this discussion. One time saying "David would have been okay if he had kept quiet," and "If he would have kept his mouth shut, he would have been okay." During this meeting, Webb commented that Respondent had received a letter from its insurance company stating that they could no longer insure Smith as a truckdriver because he had been arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol and, therefore, he could not be returned to work. Adkins argued that Smith was not a truckdriver but a loader operator. Webb responded, "That makes no difference."

Smith testified that he was convicted of driving his own vehicle under the influence of alcohol on 10 February 1986. The subject was published in the local paper and the Company was aware of it. He attended school, had the points removed, and did not lose his license. He continued driving a truck for Respondent under a lease-purchase arrangement, in which he reimbursed Respondent for insurance cost for a policy through Respondent's insurer, Justice and Stamper Insurance Agency, until 15 November 1986. When the lease- purchase arrangement was ended, he apparently was laid off but after an arbitration proceeding in November he was returned to work on 8 December 1986. He was employed as a driver of one of Respondent's trucks until his January assignment as a loader operator.

On 11 March, the insurance agency notified Respondent that it would not reinsure Respondent unless Smith was deleted from the policy. Respondent promptly signed a waiver to that effect.

Respondent asserts that because of lower production under the sales contract, which became effective in March, it no longer required a full-time loader operator, and it resumed the practice of having truckdrivers load their own vehicles.

Mackey Preece is a truckdriver for the Company and continues to work as a contract hauler (along with one other driver with a similar arrangement), even though he was convicted of vehicular homicide in 1985. Preece Coal currently owns 4 trucks but owned as many as 17 in 1983 and 1984. It currently considers Smith to be on layoff status.

III. DISCUSSION

The issues in this case arose after the Respondent sought wage and benefit concessions from its employees, and thereafter laid off the union mine committeeman who opposed this action.

First, it is undisputed that both the mine superintendent and Respondent's accountant met directly with employees, discussed the Company's financial problems, and promoted changes (reductions in pay and leave benefits and a proposal for a new stock purchase program) in terms and conditions of employment. It appears that Superintendent Webb mentioned Respondent's plan to meet directly with the men to Smith, who promptly informed him that it would be contrary to the contract. Otherwise, it is shown that Smith had no authority to negotiate a change in the existing collective-bargaining agreement on behalf of the Union and, accordingly, I find that it is irrelevant that Smith was aware of or present during Respondent's meeting with the employees.

The clear purpose and effect of the meetings were to obtain changes in wages and benefits directly from the employees, regardless of the contract and bargaining agreement with the Union. It is well established that direct dealings with employees tend to undermine a union's status as exclusive representative and to inhibit parties from reaching agreement. See Tralas Meat Co., 239 NLRB 1400 (1979). Although the Respondent asserts that its conduct was mandated by severe economic conditions, this factor does not allow an employer to repudiate or modify an existing collective-bargaining agreement, and bypass the process of negotiation with the designated bargaining representative.

Under these circumstances, I find that Respondent met and bargained directly with the employees concerning changes in terms and conditions of employment at a time when it was bound by an existing union contract and bargaining agreement and, accordingly, I conclude that Respondent is shown to have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, as alleged.

At the end of Webb's meeting the employees made a counteroffer; however, Webb refused to accept their conditions and told them there would be no more work, thereby effectively laying off all the employees on Friday, 3 April. The following Sunday and Monday Respondent called most employees back to work. However, when Smith made repeated attempts to report to his usual job, he was specifically told by Webb that there was no work for him because he had interjected himself into the meeting on Friday.

In a discharge or layoff case of this nature, applicable law requires that the General Counsel meet an initial burden of presenting sufficient evidence to support an inference that the employee's union or other protected concerted activities were the motivating factor in the employer's decision to lay off and not recall the employee. Here, the record shows that Smith was the minesite union committeeman, that he objected to the Company's direct negotiations with the employees, and that he was told by the mine superintendent that he would be working if he would have kept quiet and stayed out of the meeting with employees. Under these circumstances, I find that the General Counsel has met his initial burden by presenting a prima facie showing sufficient to support an inference that Smith's union activities were the motivating factor in Respondent's decision to terminate him. Accordingly, the testimony will be discussed and the record evaluated in keeping with the criteria set forth in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), see NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), to consider Respondent's defense, and to consider whether the General Counsel has carried her overall burden.

Respondent rests its defense on a claim that a reduction in its work force was required because of a decline in both the price it was paid for its coal and in its apparent level of production. It further asserts that Smith's job as a loader operator was not a regular job, and that because of the decreased volume of production, truckdrivers could do their own loading without the help of a full-time loader operator.

Although it is apparent that the Respondent did have financial difficulties, and subsequently experienced a decline in production, it is equally apparent that these concerns were not the primary reason for its decision on 6 April and thereafter to keep Smith from coming back to work.

The unrebutted,[2] credible testimony of both Smith and Union Field Representative Adkins shows that during the course of a grievance proceeding on 15 April Superintendent Webb repeatedly said that if Smith had "kept quiet" and had "kept his mouth shut" he would have been okay and would be working. Although Respondent asserts that Smith was laid off because there was no need for a loader operator, and because he could not be used as a truckdriver because of an insurance problem, there is no indication that Smith was ever given any formal notification of his layoff or that he was notified of this rationale for his layoff until the close of the grievance proceeding when his DWI conviction was mentioned. The facts surrounding the conviction show that it had occurred over a year earlier and that Smith had been employed as a truckdriver of Respondent's equipment during December 1986 and January 1987, and that Smith had cleared his record by attending traffic school. No effort was made by Respondent to investigate whether Smith's insurance status could be reconsidered, and no attempt was made to discuss the possibility of offering Smith other work or the opportunity to drive a truck as a contract hauler, as he previously did and as driver Macky Preece continued to do, despite a conviction for vehicular homicide. Moreover, an employee with 14 years' experience testified that immediately after Smith's layoff there continued to be enough coal being run to keep a full-time loader operator busy, as the operator also usually performs other maintenance type tasks around the minesite. Under these circumstances, I find that the reasons offered as justification for Smith's layoff, especially its opportunistic reliance on the action of its insurance company, clearly are inconsistent with the unrefuted reasons stated by its mine superintendent, and I conclude that Respondent's reasons are pretextual.

Respondent clearly knew of Smith's union position as mine committeeman, and his opposition to its attempt to bargain directly with the employees. It is well settled that an employee who invokes the provisions of a collective-bargaining agreement or otherwise engages in activities on behalf of a labor organization is engaged in protected concerted activity. The Company responded to the employees' refusal to accept concessions by announcing that there would be no more work but it then recalled all employees except Smith.[3] As discussed above, it is clear that the motivating factor behind Respondent's action was Smith's affrontary in opposing the Company's attempt to bypass the Union and obtain concessions directly from the employees.

Under all these circumstances, I conclude that Respondent has not met its burden of showing that Smith would have been laid off and not recalled, absent his union and protected concerted activity. The General Counsel otherwise has met its overall burden of proof, see Chestnut Ridge Mining Corp., 268 NLRB 374 (1983), and I further conclude that Respondent is shown to have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, as alleged.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By bargaining directly and unilaterally with employees in regard to wages and benefits, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

4. By laying off employee James David Smith on 3 April 1987, the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in an unfair labor practice, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take the affirmative action described below, which is designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

With respect to the necessary affirmative action, I recommend that Respondent be ordered to reinstate James David Smith to his former job or to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered because of the discrimination practiced against him by payment to him of a sum of money equal to that which he normally would have earned from the date of the discrimination to the date of reinstatement, in accordance with the method set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987),[4] and that

[2] Webb did not testify. However, accountant Lawson, who also was present during the grievance proceeding, did testify but did not address or rebut the testimony of Smith and Adkins on this subject.

[3] Contrary to Respondent's assertion, the Company did make a threat of reprisal when Webb told the employees there would be no more work if they did not agree to a wage reduction and that this threat in fact was carried out against Smith when he was singled out to be omitted from the general recall back to work.

[4] Under New Horizons, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest accrued before 1 January 1987 (the effective date of the amendment) shall be computed as in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Respondent remove from its files any reference to the layoff and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful layoff will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against him.

Otherwise, it is not considered to be necessary that a broad order be issued.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, Preece Coal Company, Hatfield, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Bargaining directly with any employee in the bargaining unit.

(b) Discharging or laying off any employee for activity protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed to them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action neccessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer James David Smith immediate and full reinstatement and make him whole for the losses he incurred as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner specified in the remedy section of this decision

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the layoff or discharge of James David Smith on 3 April 1987, and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful layoff will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all records, reports, and other documents necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this decision.

(d) Post at its Hatfield, Kentucky facility, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately on receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered objections to an election held May 22, 1987, and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The revised tally of ballots shows 28 for and 26 against the Union.[2]

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has adopted the hearing officer's findings and recommendations only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Direction of Second Election. The Board finds that the election must be set aside and a new election held.

The Employer filed the following objection:

> During the day before the election, the Union, through its agents and supporters, gathered in front of the Employer's facility and engaged in and created the impression of intimidating surveillance with the use of a video camera in front of employees. By this and other conduct, the Union intimidated employees, interfered with the employees' free choice, and made a free and fair election impossible.

The hearing officer recommended that the Employer's objection be overruled and that a Certification of Representative be issued. We disagree.

On the day before the election, representatives of the Union and other Teamsters' locals staged a rally for approximately 2 hours in front of the Employer's premises. Lenny Moore, the Union's vice president, business agent, and organizer, testified that he organized the rally at which there were 11 union representatives present. Jim Santangelo, secretary-treasurer of another local and trustee of the Joint Council of Teamsters, brought and operated a video camera. Santangelo did not testify, and no other union official offered any legitimate justification for having the video camera at the rally.

Four drivers in the bargaining unit testified that they saw a group outside the plant the day before the election. The drivers' testimonies reveal that several of the individuals in the group were wearing Teamsters jackets, that the drivers recognized Lenny Moore and Bob Isbell as union representatives but did not know the rest of the group, and that individuals handed out leaflets urging the drivers to support the Union.

Two drivers specifically testified that they thought they were videotaped. According to their testimony, as they were exiting the Employer's premises, individuals approached their vehicles and handed them union leaflets. At the same time, the video camera appeared to have been pointed in their direction.

Three drivers testified that they discussed the incident with other employees. Some drivers told other employees that their pictures had been taken. The Union had not provided the employees with any explanation for the videotaping, and the employees questioned whether the purpose of the picture taking was for future retaliation.

Tom Murphy, a supervisor, testified that when he saw the union officials outside, he went out and spoke to them and observed someone videotaping him along with Moore and other union officials. Murphy also testified that he did not see any threatening or violent behavior.

Summarizing the testimony, the hearing officer found that "it is undisputed that a Teamsters representative had a video camera at the Union rally." The hearing officer further found that because the camera appeared to be aimed at drivers, "at least two . . . drivers who testified at the hearing" believed that they had been taped.

The hearing officer concluded that the election need not be set aside because the videotaping did not create "an atmosphere of fear and coercion." The standard enunciated by the hearing officer is the standard applicable to conduct by employees or other third parties. When, as here, the allegedly objectionable conduct is attributable directly to union officials, the proper test is whether the "conduct reasonably tends to interfere with the employees' free and uncoerced choice in the election."[3]

Applying the proper standard, we find that the election must be set aside. Here, it is undisputed that on the day before the election a union representative appeared to videotape at least two employees as they exited the Employer's premises and were handed union leaflets. No legitimate explanation for the videotaping was offered to the employees at the rally, and none was proffered at the hearing. Under these circumstances, we find that the videotaping intruded on the employees' Section 7 right to refrain from any or all union activities, including the union rally then in progress. Absent any legitimate explanation from the Union, we find that employees could reasonably believe that the Union was contemplating some future reprisals against them. Clearly, such conduct would be intimidating and would reasonably tend to interfere with employee free choice in the election. Furthermore, the conduct cannot be dismissed as isolated or de minimis.[4] The incident was disseminated among employees in the unit, and a change in only one vote would have altered the election's outcome. Accordingly, we find that the election held May 22, 1987, must be set aside and a new election held.

[1] On November 2, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] Of the 57 eligible voters, 54 cast ballots. The original tally of ballots showed 27 for and 26 against the Union with 1 determinative challenged ballot. The parties then stipulated that the challenged voter was eligible and the challenge to his ballot should be overruled. The challenged ballot was opened and counted and a revised tally issued June 18, 1987.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On September 1, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Richard D. Taplitz issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions, a supporting brief, and a motion to reopen the hearing; and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision and an opposition to the motion to reopen.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, David Vainio, H. Marie Vainio, Kevin Vainio and Leonard Vainio, d/b/a Professional Eye Care and d/b/a Eye Care, Butte and Missoula, Montana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Eduardo Escamilla, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Kevin Vainio, Esq., of Butte, Montana, pro se.
Gary A. Taylor, of Butte, Montana, for the Charging Parties.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD D. TAPLITZ, Administrative Law Judge. These cases were tried in Butte, Montana, on March 26, April 7 and 8, and June 30, 1987. The charge in Case 19-CA-18510 was filed on August 4, 1986, by Local Lodge 88, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers (Lodge 88). A complaint issued in that case on September 10, 1986, alleging that David Vainio d/b/a Professional Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The charge in Case 19-CA-18646 was filed on September 29, 1986, by District Lodge 85, Local Lodge 88, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers (the Charging Parties). An order consolidating those two cases and an amended complaint issued on November 5, 1986. That amended complaint was further amended on December 19, 1986. The charge in Case 19-CA-18646 was amended on January 2, 1987, and a second order consolidating cases and second amended consolidated complaint issued on March 9, 1987, against David Vainio, H. Marie Vainio, Kevin Vainio and Leonard Vainio, d/b/a Professional Eye Care and d/b/a Eye Care (Respondents). The charge in Case 19-CA-19043 was filed by the Charging Parties on April 7, 1987, after the hearing on the other cases had begun. On April 7, 1987, a motion to consolidate all three cases and to amend the consolidated complaint was granted. The complaint as then amended alleged violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), (4), and (5) of the Act. After the hearing on those cases had closed the General Counsel moved to reopen the hearing in Cases 19-CA-18510, 19-CA-18646, and 19-CA-19043 and to consolidate the complaint in those cases with a new complaint that had issued on May 12, 1987, in Case 19-CA-19067. The complaint in Case 19-CA-19067, which was based on a charge filed by the Charging Parties on April 15, 1987, against David Vainio, H. Marie Vainio, Kevin Vainio and Leonard Vainio, d/b/a Professional Eye Care (Professional Eye Care) alleged an additional violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act. On May 15, 1987, I issued an order to show cause why the motion should not be granted. No opposition to the motion was heard and the General Counsel's motion was granted by order dated June 1, 1987. The hearing resumed and was completed on June 30, 1987.

Issues

The primary issues are

1. Whether Professional Eye Care (which is located in Butte as well as a number of other places in Montana) is

[1] The Respondent has moved to reopen the hearing to introduce into evidence the final decision of the State of Montana Department of Labor and Industry, Unemployment Insurance Board, regarding the unemployment claim of Leonard Dalasera. We grant the Respondent's motion to the extent that we take notice that the unemployment decision (already entered into the record) is now final. There is nothing in the Respondent's motion that requires reopening the hearing or adds probative value to the unemployment compensation decision already considered by the judge. See Supreme Dyeing & Finishing Corp., 147 NLRB 1094, 1095 fn. 1 (1964).

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent alleges in its exceptions that the judge was biased against the Respondent. After carefully reviewing the record, we find no basis to support this claim.

a single employer with Eye Care (which is located in Missoula, Montana).

2. Whether the laboratory employees at Eye Care in Missoula comprise an independent bargaining unit or whether the bargaining unit for the laboratory employees of Professional Eye Care in Butte should be extended to cover the Eye Care laboratory employees.

3. Whether Professional Eye Care discharged and Eye Care refused to hire Matt Grigsby because of his union activity.

4. Whether David Vainio, one of the owners of Professional Eye Care and Eye Care, assaulted John Flynn because he testified in these proceedings.

5. Whether Professional Eye Care discharged Leonard Dalasera because of his union activity and because he gave testimony in Board and Board-related proceedings.

6. Whether Professional Eye Care reduced the number of hours that employees worked without bargaining with the Union.

7. Whether Professional Eye Care bargained with the Union concerning a decision to move certain operations to Billings, Montana.

8. Whether Professional Eye Care bargained with the Union about a decision to lease or close its Butte lab.

9. Whether Professional Eye Care refused to give the Union information necessary for bargaining.

10. Whether Professional Eye Care refused to bargain in good faith with the Union.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Respondents.

On the entire record of the case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Professional Eye Care is an optical business with an office and place of business in Butte, Montana. It is owned and operated by David Vainio, H. Marie Vainio, Kevin Vainio, and Leonard Vainio (the Vainio family) and is engaged in the business of preparing, repairing, and selling eyeglass lenses and contact lenses. The Vainio family has operated Professional Eye Care and other affiliated business enterprises, with common ownership, directors, management, and supervision; has formulated and administered a common labor policy affecting employees in such enterprises; has common bank accounts and purchasing accounts; has shared common premises and facilities; has provided services for and made sales to each other; has interchanged personnel with each other; and has held themselves out to the public as a single, integrated business enterprise. Professional Eye Care and its affiliated enterprises constitute a single, integrated business enterprise and a single employer within the meaning of the Act. During the 12 months immediately preceding issuance of complaint, Professional Eye Care and its affiliated enterprises collectively had gross sales of goods and services valued in excess of $500,000 and sold and shipped goods and provided services to customers outside of Montana or to customers within Montana who were themselves engaged in interstate commerce by other than indirect means, of a total value in excess of $50,000. Professional Eye Care and its affiliated enterprises also meet the Board's jurisdictional standards regarding the inflow of goods and materials into Montana. Professional Eye Care is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The above findings are based on allegations of the complaint in Case 19-CA-19067 which were admitted by Professional Eye Care. Respondents acknowledge that Professional Eye Care, as well as a number of affiliated enterprises owned by the Vainio family, constitute a single employer and are subject to the Board's jurisdiction. However, Respondents consistently maintained that Eye Care in Missoula is not such an affiliated concern and is not a single employer with or successor or alter ego of Professional Eye Care. The General Counsel has introduced no evidence to indicate whether Eye Care independently meets the Board's discretionary jurisdictional standards. Therefore, jurisdiction depends solely on whether the General Counsel had established a sufficient nexus between Eye Care and Professional Eye Care to demonstrate that jurisdiction should be taken over Eye Care because of Professional Eye Care's impact on interstate commerce. For the reasons set forth in detail below, I find that Eye Care is a single employer with Professional Eye Care and jurisdiction must therefore be asserted over both.

Local Lodge 88, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

On April 24, 1985, after an election held by the National Labor Relations Board in Case 19-RC-11136, the Board certified the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees of David Vainio d/b/a Professional Eye Care in the following bargaining unit:

> All laboratory employees employed by David Vainio d/b/a Professional Eye Care at the facility located at 225 South Idaho, Butte, Montana; but excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Union's organizational drive led not only to the certification but to a plethora of litigation. On May 13, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Clifford H. Anderson issued his decision in David Vainio, H. Marie Vainio, Kevin Vainio and Leonard Vainio, d/b/a Professional Eye Care, Cases 19-CA-17267, 19-CA-17445, 19-CA-17511, 19-CA-17569, 19-CA-17570, 19-CA-17833, and 19-CA-17913 (JD-(SF)-52-86, Butte, Montana). Judge Anderson found that Professional Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act "by interrogating employees about their union activities and sympathies and the sympathies of other employees, by soliciting employee complaints and grievances and promising to remedy such grievances, by threatening employees with closure of the facility or the subcontracting out of work if employees selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, by harassing employees because of the employees' union activities or because of their testimony in Board representation hearings, by informing its employees that it would be futile to choose the Union as [their] collective-bargaining representative, by threatening to bargain in bad faith, and by changing the shifts and holiday pay of employees because of their support for the Union." He found that Professional Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employees Beverly Riley and Leonard Dalasera because of their union activities or because of the union activities of other employees.[1] Judge Anderson further found that Professional Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(5) and (l) of the Act:

> a. By transferring personnel and work from its Butte, Montana lab to its Idaho Falls, Idaho facility without notice to the Union and without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain concerning the decision and the effects of such removal.
> b. By unilaterally changing employees' terms and conditions of employment without first bargaining with the Union in good faith regarding those changes.
> c. By engaging in a course of conduct designed to undermine the Union and to avoid reaching agreement with the Union, including dilatory communication and scheduling of meetings with the Union, failure to conduct bargaining in a businesslike fashion, making regressive proposals while failing and refusing to supply specific information concerning those proposals or current conditions of employment of unit employees.

Judge Anderson recommended that the Board issue a broad order that would prohibit Professional Eye Care from in any manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

In addition, Judge Anderson found that Professional Eye Care did not violate the Act as alleged in certain allegations of the complaint. One of those allegations was that Matt Grigsby was discharged because of his union or protected activity. Professional Eye Care reinstated Grigsby as part of a settlement agreement, after further litigation in the United States District Court and the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. The reinstatement preceded the issuance of Judge Anderson's decision and it was the understanding of Professional Eye Care that Grigsby was to be reinstated pending that decision. However, Professional Eye Care kept Grigsby in its employ after Judge Anderson's decision issued. Gary Taylor, business representative for the Union, credibly testified that in July 1986 he had a conversation with David Vainio in which Vainio said that he had no more trouble with Grigsby since he came back to work but that Grigsby's job would be phased out when the lab in Missoula started. Subsequently Grigsby was discharged from Professional Eye Care. The complaint in the instant case alleges that Professional Eye Care discharged him and Eye Care in Missoula refused to hire him because of his union activity.

Exceptions were filed to Judge Anderson's decision and the Board has not yet ruled in those cases. Although I have taken official notice of Judge Anderson's decision, in the absence of resolution by the Board, I have not based my findings in this case on any of his findings. The findings set forth below are based solely on the testimony of witnesses who appeared before me and the documentary evidence that was introduced in this case.

B. The Single Employer and the Single Bargaining Unit Issues

1. Factual findings

The Vainio family, through Professional Eye Care, which is also known as American Eye Care, owns and operates approximately 16 eye care centers located throughout Montana.[2] The Vainio family consists of optometrists David and Leonard Vainio, Attorney Kevin Vainio, and their mother H. Marie Vainio. Glasses are fitted at all Professional Eye Care centers. However before Eye Care in Missoula began operating a laboratory in early October 1986, substantially all the laboratory work flowing from the Professional Eye Care stores was performed in Professional Eye Care's laboratory in Butte, Montana. Two types of work were done at that Butte laboratory. One involved surfacing in which curves were ground into the lenses. That work required expensive heavy-duty equipment such as generators, cylinder machines, and cutters. The other type of work involved finishing and hardening. That consisted of laying lenses out according to prescription, marking them, edging them, shaping them to the shape of the frame and, regarding plastic lenses, hardening and scratch-coating them. Shortly before the Eye Care Missoula laboratory opened, the surfacing equipment that had been located in Professional Eye Care's Butte laboratory was moved to the Missoula lab. Butte had duplicate finishing machinery and one set of that machinery was also sent to Missoula. At the time the Eye Care Missoula laboratory opened, it was capable of performing both surfacing and finishing work while Professional Eye Care's Butte laboratory, which no longer had the surfacing equipment, was only capable of doing the finishing work. Surfacing has to be performed on about 25 percent of the jobs, as most lenses come from stock and only have to be finished. Butte now works with stock lenses and finishing while Missoula works with stock lenses, surfacing, and finishing.

At the time the Missoula laboratory opened, there were four employees working at Professional Eye Care's Butte laboratory. They were Matt Grigsby, Mike King, Leonard Dalasera, and Richard Delano. One of those employees, King, ceased working for Professional Eye

[1] Dalasera was reinstated thereafter. It is alleged in the instant case that he was once again unlawfully discharged.

[2] The addresses are set forth in R. Exh. 2.

Care in Butte and began working for Eye Care in Missoula. Missoula is approximately 120 miles from Butte. As is discussed in detail below, Matt Grigsby was discharged by Professional Eye Care and was refused employment by Eye Care. For the reasons also set forth below, I have found that the discharge by Professional Eye Care was not violative of the Act but that Eye Care's refusal to hire him was a violation. In analyzing whether a majority of the employees at the Eye Care lab desired union representation, Grigsby must be considered an employee of Eye Care. The two other employees of Professional Eye Care in Butte were, at the time of the opening of the trial, still employed by Professional Eye Care.[3]

The Eye Care lab in Missoula opened with three or four employees.[4] The normal employee complement in the Eye Care lab is four or five and at the time of the trial there were four employees, one of whom was King who previously had worked at Professional Eye Care. All four of the employees work in the lab and none are supervisors. The Eye Care facility in Missoula consists of both a store and a lab. Two of the laboratory employees sometimes go into the store and handle a problem there. However, they are not engaged in dispensing or selling in the retail outlet on a routine basis. At the Butte lab also, the employees did not work strictly at the lab.[5]

For a number of years Professional Eye Care had been trying to open an optical store at the Southgate Mall in Missoula. No lease was obtainable because another optical store already had a lease at the mall with a 3-year "no competition" clause. After the 3 years expired, David Vainio, through John Flynn, Professional Eye Care's business manager, approached the mall's management about a lease. The management of the mall was not interested in another optical store but indicated that it would be interested in a full service operation which included examination, frames, and a complete lens preparation laboratory. David Vainio came to an agreement with the mall management to open such a full-service establishment and signed a lease in his own name. He and his wife were the only owners of the new facility that was named Eye Care. The other members of the Vainio family had no ownership interest in Eye Care.[6]

David Vainio owned half of the laboratory equipment at the Professional Eye Care Butte laboratory. The other half was owned by his brother Leonard Vainio. The two brothers negotiated for David Vainio to buy Leonard Vainio's half. The value of the equipment was put at $60,000 and David Vainio gave Professional Eye Care a check for $30,000 to pay for Leonard Vainio's interest. However, the transaction was not fully at arm's length. Both David and Leonard Vainio had access to the Professional Eye Care account so that David Vainio in effect was putting money into an account that he could draw out of. David Vainio testified that the $30,000 was allocated to Leonard Vainio even though it was in a joint account with David Vainio.

On occasion David Vainio put his personal money into the Professional Eye Care account on a temporary basis.

Before Eye Care opened at the mall, Professional Eye Care had a retail store at that location. The store lost its lease and discontinued business there. However, Eye Care used the same phone number that had been assigned to the Professional Eye Care store.

David Vainio is fully in charge of the Eye Care facility in Missoula. He and his wife own it, he hired the manager there, and he makes all key decisions including those regarding labor relations. David Vainio is also the primary person in charge of Professional Eye Care's Butte laboratory. As is apparent from the discussion below relating to the collective-bargaining negotiations, David Vainio sets labor relations policies there as well as in Missoula. Except when the position of business manager is vacant, as it has been from time to time, there is one business manager at the Professional Eye Care Butte laboratory and another one at the Eye Care Missoula laboratory. The business managers take care of the day-to-day operations.

Eye Care and Professional Eye Care keep separate records and use separate checking accounts. The government ID number used at Eye Care is a personal one that David Vainio had.

Gerald Baker, the accountant for both Professional Eye Care and Eye Care, testified in some detail concerning the books of both companies. He averred that when Eye Care first opened, he was instructed by David and Leonard Vainio that Eye Care was to be separate from Professional Eye Care and the accounting records and everything else were to be completely separate. He testified to a number of things, however, that raised questions as to their separate identities. He averred that he was paid by both Eye Care and Professional Eye Care but then he acknowledged that he had not received any checks from Eye Care. Professional Eye Care has an in-house computer in Anaconda that is used by both Eye Care and Professional Eye Care. The Anaconda facility makes the payroll for both companies though Eye Care reimburses Professional Eye Care for the expenses. Professional Eye Care does most of the purchasing of the supplies for both companies because it can do so on a mass basis. Baker testified that Eye Care reimburses Professional Eye Care for such items as frames and lenses that it receives from Professional Eye Care but the manner of the payment indicates that there is less than an arm's-length arrangement. Apparently there is no inventory of the actual goods that are passed on from Professional Eye Care to Eye Care. The computation for the payment by Eye Care to Professional Eye Care is based on a percentage of sales made by Eye Care in relation to the sales made by Professional Eye Care. Because Eye Care purchases some of its materials from sources other than Professional Eye Care, the use of the retail sales percentages would not appear to give an accurate result in determining how much Eye Care owed Professional Eye Care for supplies.

[3] During the course of the trial the complaint was amended to allege that Dalasera was discharged in violation of the Act. As is discussed in detail below I have found that he was unlawfully discharged. However, before the last day of trial he was reinstated.

[4] At one point in his testimony, David Vainio testified that the Eye Care lab opened with four employees, one of whom was Craig Tolman, the manager. However, later in his testimony, he averred that the lab opened with four rank-and-file employees and that the usual employee complement was four or five, all of whom are nonsupervisory. At one point in his brief, counsel for the General Counsel states that the Missoula lab opened with four "individuals," including an admitted supervisor. At another point in his brief he states that the lab opened with two full-time "lab employees" and two part-time "employees." I credit David Vainio's testimony that the usual employee complement was four or five. The Eye Care store opened on August 28, lab equipment was moved there about September 10, and the lab began operating in October 1986.

[5] Counsel for the General Counsel, in his brief, states that when Eye Care commenced its lab operation, it had two full-time lab employees and two part-time employees who also worked in the retail outlet operation. He argued that the part-time employees were not in the bargaining unit. The case law does not support that proposition. Fleming Industries, 282 NLRB 1030 (1987).

[6] These findings are based on the credited testimony of David Vainio. Though I do not believe that David Vainio was always fully credible, there was no evidence to contradict his testimony in this regard and I credit him.

Eye Care does separately pay such items as rent, advertising, insurance, and telephone. Baker testified that Eye Care does a lot of work for Professional Eye Care and that Eye Care pays its own employees and charges Professional Eye Care for the labor costs.

John Flynn was the business manager for Professional Eye Care. He credibly and in detail testified about the relationship between Eye Care and Professional Eye Care. He averred that on at least three occasions he went to the Eye Care store in Missoula to work on their accounts receivable. He testified that even though he was business manager of Professional Eye Care, he had never seen a billing for the supplies that Eye Care had received from Professional Eye Care. Professional Eye Care purchased supplies such as frames, lenses, contact lenses, and solutions that were sent to the Butte facility from where they were distributed to most of the other stores and the Eye Care lab facility. He testified that Eye Care ordered some of its own inventory and also took some of the inventory from Professional Eye Care. He also testified that Professional Eye Care has obtained supplies and inventory from the Eye Care lab in Missoula and that there never has been an accurate billing between the two facilities. He credibly testified that pursuant to the instructions of David Vainio, he has on occasion withdrawn money from other accounts including Eye Care's and put it into the Professional Eye Care Butte account when there was not enough money in the Professional Eye Care account to pay bills.

There is one medical insurance policy that covers all Professional Eye Care employees. The employees of Eye Care do not participate in that insurance plan except for Craig Tolman, the business manager of Eye Care.

David Vainio often takes work from the Professional Eye Care Butte lab to the Eye Care Missoula lab to have it worked on and also takes work in the opposite direction. Two of the Professional Eye Care stores, Helena and Great Falls, send all their work to the Eye Care lab in Missoula. The rest of the work from the Professional Eye Care operation goes to the Butte lab and David Vainio then decides where he wants to take the work.

For the purpose of this case it must be assumed that the opening of the Eye Care lab and the transfer of equipment from Professional Eye Care to Eye Care were wholly lawful. Unlawful conduct can only be found after a respondent has been properly informed of an allegation of wrongdoing and after that allegation has been fully litigated. There is no allegation in the complaint that the opening of the Eye Care lab was unlawfully motivated, that the transfer of equipment was in any way unlawful, or that there was a failure to bargain about such matters. Testimony was allowed concerning the opening of the Eye Care lab but solely in relation to allegations of single employer, alter ego, or successor. (Jurisdiction over Eye Care was alleged on the basis of its connection to Professional Eye Care and Eye Care allegedly violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act by refusing to hire Grigsby.) In his brief, counsel for the General Counsel inexplicably states "additionally at least one of the reasons why Eye Care lab facility was established was Respondents' desire to rid itself of any union obligation." That assertion is totally inconsistent with the position that counsel for the General Counsel repeatedly took during the trial. In his opening statement, counsel for the General Counsel specifically said that there was no issue regarding the failure of Respondents to notify the Union about the move of the lab to Missoula, that there was no allegation that the transfer was in itself unlawful, and that there was no allegation that the move was a violation of the Act. In the course of the trial, counsel for the General Counsel repeated that there was no allegation in the complaint that the opening of the Missoula store or the removal of the equipment to Missoula was a violation of the Act. Indeed, at one point Respondents attempted to introduce evidence relating to their motivation in moving equipment to Missoula and the General Counsel objected on the ground that there was no allegation that the move was unlawful. The objection was sustained and Respondents were denied the opportunity to adduce testimony as to the motivation for the move. At the General Counsel's own request, the matter was not litigated. The General Counsel cannot now successfully claim that the Eye Care lab facility was established because Respondents wanted to rid themselves of any union obligation.

2. Analysis and conclusions with regard to single employer issue

In Blumenfeld Theatres Circuit, 240 NLRB 206, 214-215 (1979), enfd. 626 F.2d 865 (9th Cir. 1980), the Board adopted my decision which read as follows:

> In Radio & Television Broadcast Technicians Local Union 1264, IBEW v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255, 256 (1965), the Supreme Court held that in determining whether enterprises constitute a single employer: "The controlling criteria, set out and elaborated in Board decisions, are interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership."[16] Though the Board and the courts have not always agreed on how to apply the standards enunciated by the Supreme Court, the decision of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Local No. 627, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL-CIO [South Prairie Construction Company and Peter Kiewit Sons' Co.] v. NLRB, 518 F.2d

1040 (1967), appears to be controlling. In that case the court of appeals reversed the Decision of the Board in Peter Kiewit Sons' Co. and South Prairie Construction Co., 206 NLRB 562 (1973). Part of the circuit court's decision was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in South Prairie Construction Co. v. Local No. 627, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL-CIO, 425 U.S. 800 (1976). The Board had made two separate findings. The first was that two entities did not constitute a single employer and the second was that each entity had a separate appropriate bargaining unit for collective-bargaining purposes. The court of appeals disagreed and found both a single employer and a single unit. On appeal the Supreme Court affirmed that part of the court of appeals' decision which found that the two entities were a single employer and reversed and remanded to the court of appeals that part of the decision which related to the unit question.[17] As the Supreme Court has affirmed the circuit court's decision with regard to the single employer, the language of the circuit court is of particular importance. That circuit court held 518 F.2d at 1045–46:

Guidelines for "Single Employer" Status

In Radio Union v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255 . . . (1965), the Supreme Court, in a per curiam opinion affirming a "single employer" holding below, said:

> "The controlling criteria, set out and elaborated in Board decisions, are interrelation of operations, common management, centralized control of labor relations and common ownership."

The court cited several NLRB decisions including one affirmed in Sakrete of Northern California, Inc. v. NLRB, 332 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 961 . . . (1965). In Sakrete, the Ninth Circuit stated, at 907:

> "even if the substantial evidence shows interrelationship of operations, centralized control of labor relations, or common management only at the executive or top level, we do not agree that this precludes application of the single employer concept."

It pointed out that these three criteria "deal not with power and authority, as such, but with its exercise," and that such criteria, "on any level, are considerations in addition to the factor of common ownership or financial control."[8]

Although the Supreme Court in Radio Union, supra, commented that the record in that case was more than adequate to show that all of the four "controlling criteria" were present, it does not appear that all four criteria must be present. In one of the NLRB cases cited, Canton, Carp's, 125 NLRB 483 (1959), the Board observed that it had on several occasions made a finding of a single employer status in the absence of a common labor relations policy, and even when it had been affirmatively shown that each of two corporations held to be a single employer established its own labor relations policy. In another of the NLRB cases cited, V.I.P. Radio, Inc., 128 NLRB 113 (1960), the Board found that there was little or no employee interchange; but 90 percent stock ownership of the second corporation, the same officers and directors, and centralized control of "general labor policy" and operations resulted in a "single employer" holding. In still another cited NLRB case, Overton Markets, Inc., 142 NLRB 615 (1963), the Board noted, at 619, that the circumstances were not "characteristic of the arm's length relationship found among unintegrated companies."[9] Its conclusion that there was a "single employer" for purposes of the Act rested on consideration of "all the circumstances" of the case.

From the foregoing, we conclude that "single employer" status, for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act, depends upon all the circumstances of the case, that not all of the "controlling criteria" specified by the Supreme Court need be present; that, in addition to the criterion of common ownership or financial control, the other criteria, whether or not they are present at the top level of management, are "controlling" indicia of the actual exercise of the power of common ownership or financial control; and that the standard for evaluating such exercise of power is whether, as a matter of substance, there is the "arm's length relationship found among unintegrated companies."[10]

[8] In a later decision, NLRB v. Welcome-American Fertilizer Co., 443 F.2d 19, 21 (9th Cir. 1971), the Ninth Circuit, citing Sakrete, said that no one of the four criteria is controlling.

[9] The "arm's length" test makes meaningful the Board's reference in Canton, Carp's, Inc., supra at 484, to "realities of commercial organization." It was applied by this court in American Fed of Television & Radio Artists v. NLRB, 149 U.S. App. D.C. 272, 462 F.2d 887 (1972).

[10] Petitioner relied heavily on NLRB v. Royal Oak Tool & Mach. Co., 320 F.2d 77 (6th Cir. 1963) in which the court said, at 81:

> "It requires a greater degree of credulity than is possessed by this Court to accept the view that [the subsidiary's operating officers] could inaugurate or establish a labor policy . . . that did not meet with the absolute approval [of the board of directors of the parent company]."

So too, we are persuaded that South Prairie's president, having decided or, at least, recommended that South Prairie be activated in Oklahoma, was not a free agent to alter South Prairie's nonunion policy.

[16] See also Sakrete of Northern California, Inc., 140 NLRB 765 (1963), enfd. 332 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 961 (1965).

[17] On remand the Board issued a Supplemental Decision reported at 231 NLRB 76 (1977) in which it noted that the Supreme Court had affirmed the circuit court's finding that the two entities were a single employer. The Board reconsidered the single-unit question and concluded that, even though the entities were a single employer, separate units were appropriate.

The Board has consistently followed those guidelines. Malcolm Boring Co., 259 NLRB 597 (1981). The principles were restated in Airline Bus Service, 273 NLRB 561 (1984), in which the Board used the same criteria in determining whether nominally separate businesses operating simultaneously are sufficiently interrelated so that they may be treated as a single, integrated business enterprise. See also Emsing's Supermarket, 284 NLRB 302 (1987).

In the instant case Professional Eye Care and Eye Care are interrelated in their operations. Both do the lab work that is generated by the Vainio family stores. Supplies are purchased by Professional Eye Care and distributed to Eye Care. Work coming into Eye Care is often sent to be done at Professional Eye Care and vice versa. Professional Eye Care has drawn money from an Eye Care account when Professional Eye Care's funds were short. There is a clear functional relationship between Eye Care and Professional Eye Care that can only be described as an interrelation of operations. Eye Care and Professional Eye Care have common management at the decision-making level. David Vainio is the "boss" at both enterprises. In addition, he controls labor relations at both enterprises. He makes all such decisions at Eye Care and, as indicated by his conduct in the negotiations discussed below and by his and Flynn's testimony, he has the final voice regarding labor relations at Professional Eye Care. Regarding "common ownership" David Vainio and his wife own all Eye Care while David Vainio and three other members of his family own all Professional Eye Care. Moreover, as is set forth above, the practices of Professional Eye Care and Eye Care as well as the casual arrangements for the distribution of work and supplies strongly indicate that the two organizations do not have an arm's-length relationship but deal on a family basis.

The situation in the instant case is similar to that which was present in Hahn Motors, 283 NLRB 901 (1987). There, the same person was the chief executive officer for each of the companies involved; that person exercised virtually unrestricted operational, financial, administrative, and labor relations control over both companies; that person and his wife owned all of one company and 35 percent of the other company with practically the entire remainder of the other company inuring to the beneficial interest of that person's mother and sister; and there was functional integration of the two companies. Taken as a whole, the Board found that the two companies did not maintain an arm's-length relationship such as is found among unintegrated companies, and that the two constituted a single employer.

Applying the case law cited above to the instant case, I find that Eye Care and Professional Eye Care constitute a single employer. As such they are jointly and severally liable for any backpay due and for otherwise remedying their unfair labor practices. Emsing's Supermarket, supra.

In his brief, counsel for the General Counsel presents a number of alternative theories regarding the relationship between Eye Care and Professional Eye Care. The thrust of one of those theories is that Eye Care is the successor of Professional Eye Care. I find that theory unpersuasive. In United Food & Commercial Workers (R & F Grocers), 267 NLRB 891, 892–893 (1983), the Board adopted that part of Administrative Law Judge William J. Pannier III's decision which held that the successorship doctrine applies where there is a bona fide change in ownership of an enterprise and there is a substitution of one employer for another under circumstances where the predecessor employer either terminates its existence or otherwise ceases to have any relationship to the ongoing operation of the successor employer. In the instant case, Eye Care and Professional Eye Care are both in existence. It is true that in Louis Pappas' Restaurant, 275 NLRB 1519 (1985), the Board held that a successor obligation is not defeated by the mere fact that only a portion of a former union-represented operation is subject to sale or transfer to a new owner. However in that case the employees in the conveyed portion constituted a separate appropriate unit and those employees comprised a majority of the unit under the new operation. As the United States Supreme Court held in NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972), a successor employer finding is appropriate where a bargaining unit remains unchanged and a majority of the employees hired by the new employer are represented by a recently certified bargaining agent. As found below in the instant case, the lab employees of Professional Eye Care constitute an independent and separate unit from the lab employees of Eye Care and a majority of the employees in the Eye Care bargaining unit did not come from Professional Eye Care. There is no basis for finding a successorship.

Counsel for the General Counsel also argues that Eye Care is an alter ego of Professional Eye Care. Once a single employer is found there is little need to resolve the question of alter ego. In both situations there is a finding that there is only one enterprise. However, in both situations the one enterprise can have operations at two different locations and the case will often turn on whether the two locations constitute a single bargaining unit in which the enterprise has to bargain with the union or constitute two independent bargaining units where bargaining is only required in one. In Hahn Motors, supra, the Board, after finding a single employer relationship, went on to conclude that it was unnecessary to reach the question whether an alter ego relationship existed. In any event, I do not believe that the facts as set forth above warrant a finding of alter ego. The criteria used in determining alter ego were reiterated by the Board in Continental Radiator Corp., 283 NLRB 234 (1987), in which it was held:

> In Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001, 1002 (1984), the Board stated that it will find alter ego status where two employers have "'substantially identical' management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision, as well as ownership." In addition, the Board considers whether there has been any hiatus in operations, whether the companies use the same building, and "whether the purpose behind the creation of the alleged alter ego was legitimate or whether, instead, its purpose was to evade responsibilities under the Act."[6] No one factor is determinative of alter ego status.

An alter ego theory is generally used where an employer disguises its continued operation of a facility by the creation of another entity in order to evade bargaining responsibility. That is not the situation in the instant case. Though David Vainio owns Eye Care and he along with other family members (two brothers and a mother) own Professional Eye Care, there is not a substantial identity of ownership. The two facilities are 120 miles apart, they maintain their own identities, and there is no finding that Eye Care was opened for any improper reason. As set forth above, I must assume that Eye Care was opened for lawful reasons. O. Voorhees Painting Co., 275 NLRB 779 (1985).

3. Analysis and conclusions with regard to the separate bargaining unit issue

In Peter Kiewit Sons' Co., 231 NLRB 76 (1977), enfd. 595 F.2d 844 (D.C. Cir. 1979),[7] the Board emphasized the difference in approach in resolving a single employer question and a scope of unit question, holding:

> In determining whether a single employer exists we are concerned with the common ownership, structure, and integrated control of the separate corporations; in determining the scope of the unit, we are concerned with the community of interests of the employees involved.

The Board goes on to indicate that in resolving the unit question where there is more than one operation of a single employer, such factors as bargaining history, functional integration of operations, differences in the types of work and skills of the employees, extent of centralization of management supervision, and the extent of interchange and contact between the groups of employees are to be considered. Some of those factors are discussed above. There is a bargaining history at the Professional Eye Care lab but none at the Eye Care lab; there is some functional integration of operations as discussed above; there is centralization of top management but not of day-to-day operations; and there is no interchange or contact between the groups of employees except for some of the initial hiring.

The relocation of a bargaining unit does not necessarily destroy that unit. In Hahn Motors, supra, the Board found that two companies constituted a single employer and that the relocation of service department employees to a new facility 7 miles away did not destroy the community of interest that had existed within the plantwide unit so as to justify depriving those employees of continued representation. There the Board found that the respondents' efforts to fragment the unit by unilaterally imposing the geographical separation of 7 miles could not defeat the employees' right to representation.

In the instant case, the single employer has two lab facilities. They are located 120 miles apart so that it may be assumed that they draw from different labor pools. The normal or representative employee complement at the Eye Care lab in Missoula is four or five employees. As found below Matt Grigsby, who had formerly worked for Professional Eye Care, was unlawfully denied employment at Eye Care. For the purposes of determining the employee complement of Eye Care, Grigsby must be added to the list. If he is added then the normal employee complement would be five or six. One employee, King, who had worked for Professional Eye Care, left his work there and began working for Eye Care. Thus for our purposes two employees out of the five or six in the Eye Care lab bargaining unit were formerly in the Professional Eye Care lab bargaining unit. There is no evidence that any of the other employees in the Eye Care lab bargaining unit desired the Union to represent them. No matter how it is counted, the Union has not been selected by a majority of the Eye Care lab employees to represent them.[8] If the General Counsel's contentions are correct, then those employees will not have an opportunity to express their wishes as to representation. Under all the circumstances of this case and with particular reliance on the fact that the two laboratories are separated by a distance of 120 miles, that there is no basis for assuming that the Missoula lab was opened to thwart union activity or in violation of the Act, and that there is nothing to indicate that a majority of the employees at the Missoula lab desire union representation, I do not believe that Respondents' obligation to bargain at Butte, Montana, should be extended to cover the employees employed in Missoula, Montana.[9] In reaching this conclusion I have also considered the fact that the outstanding certification by the Board is limited to employees "employed by David Vainio d/b/a Professional Eye Care at the facility located at 225 South Idaho, Butte, Montana."

The complaint as amended alleges that the laboratory employees of Professional Eye Care and Eye Care constitute an appropriate bargaining unit; that the Union requested Professional Eye Care and Eye Care to recognize and bargain with it as the representative of the employees in that unit, which included employees of Eye Care; and that Professional Eye Care and Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union in that unit. As I have found that the Eye Care laboratory unit is a separate bargaining unit and that the Union does not represent a majority of the employees in that unit, those allegations in the complaint must be dismissed. The complaint as amended also alleges that as a result of Professional Eye Care's and Eye Care's refusal to bargain in that unit, Grigsby was terminated from his employment with Professional Eye Care. As I have found that Respondents had no duty to bargain in the Eye Care lab unit, that allegation must also be dismissed. The amended complaint also alleges that Grigsby was discharged from Professional Eye Care and refused employment by Eye Care in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Those allegations are discussed in detail below.

[7] See also Malcolm Boring Co., supra.

[8] Even if the lab opened with three employees, one of whom had worked for Professional Eye Care, and Grigsby is added to make four, there would only be two out of the four employees who indicated a desire for union representation. That is less than a majority.

[9] The complaint does not allege and the General Counsel does not contend that the Eye Care lab is an accretion to the Professional Eye Care bargaining unit. That issue will therefore not be addressed except to note the Board's holding in Melbet Jewelry Co., 180 NLRB 107 (1969), that:

> We will not, however, under the guise of accretion, compel a group of employees, who may constitute a separate appropriate unit, to be included in an overall unit without allowing those employees the opportunity of expressing their preference in a secret election or by some other evidence that they wish to authorize the Union to represent them.

C. The Discharge of Grigsby by Professional Eye Care and the Refusal to Hire Him by Eye Care

1. Factual findings

Matt Grigsby began working for Professional Eye Care as a surface grinder in January 1985. After the Union began its organizational drive, Grigsby engaged in union activities. In the summer of 1985 Professional Eye Care discharged Grigsby. The legality of that discharge was litigated before Judge Anderson. In January 1986, before Judge Anderson's decision issued, Grigsby was reinstated pending that decision. Judge Anderson found that Grigsby's discharge was not in violation of the Act. However, Professional Eye Care kept Grigsby in its employ thereafter. In July 1986, which was several months after Judge Anderson's decision issued, David Vainio told Union Business Representative Gary Taylor that Professional Eye Care did not have any more trouble with Grigsby since he came back to work, but that Grigsby's job would be phased out when the lab in Missoula started. At the time Grigsby was reinstated, Professional Eye Care knew of his union activity. Grigsby became a union officer in the summer of 1986.

About August 18, 1986, Grigsby was told by Craig Tolman, who was to become the business manager for Eye Care, that there was a lab opening up in Missoula and that Grigsby could apply. The following day he picked up an application from his business manager, John Flynn, and sent it in. About August 29, 1986, Grigsby received a letter signed by Business Manager John Flynn notifying him of the termination of Grigsby's job specialty area at the American Eye Care (Professional Eye Care) lab due to the sale of the surfacing equipment to another optical practice. The letter went on to state that it was anticipated that Grigsby's job would last from 7 to 14 days depending on when the equipment was delivered to the buyer's location. The equipment was delivered from Professional Eye Care's lab in Butte to Eye Care's lab in Missoula about September 10, 1986. On September 13, 1986, Grigsby spoke to David Vainio about working for Eye Care and David Vainio said that he would have to talk to Craig Tolman. On September 15, 1986, about 5 days after the equipment was removed from Butte, Grigsby was discharged. He was told that his services were no longer needed and the equipment that he had operated had been removed from the premises.[10] After Grigsby applied for work at Eye Care, he spoke to Tolman, who informed him that Tolman would have to talk to David Vainio about the application. Grigsby was not employed by Eye Care.

John Flynn, the business manager for Professional Eye Care, had a number of conversations concerning Grigsby's application with both Tolman, the business manager of Eye Care, and with David Vainio. In one conversation with Tolman, Tolman asked Flynn to evaluate Grigsby's application and Flynn replied that he thought Grigsby ought to go with the piece of equipment because he had worked on it for a long time, knew it well, and could do a good job. Tolman said, "Well, what about his union deal?" and Flynn replied by saying that he did not think Grigsby would bring the Union over there. In another conversation Tolman told Flynn that he was not going to hire Grigsby because he had too many doubts about him.

Flynn also talked to David Vainio about bringing Grigsby from Butte to Missoula. David Vainio said that he did not want to take Grigsby over there because he would start the Union there. Flynn replied that he did not think that he would start the Union. Thereafter, Flynn had several conversations with David Vainio in which Flynn requested that Grigsby be taken over to Missoula and in which David Vainio said that he would not do so because he did not want Grigsby to start the Union over there.[11]

2. Analysis and conclusions

The complaint alleges two separate violations of the Act regarding Grigsby. One is that Professional Eye Care fired him in violation of the Act and the other is that Eye Care refused to employ him because of his union activity. The legal analysis to be applied in cases of allegedly unlawful discharge or refusals to employ was recently restated by the Board in Joseph De Rario, DMD, P.A., 283 NLRB 592 (1987), in which it was held:

[10] Grigsby credibly testified that about a week and a half before his termination, members of the Vainio family saw him picketing on behalf of the Union at an establishment that was unconnected with the Vainio family. I credit that testimony despite the denials of some of the Vainios. However, that additional union activity occurred after he had been notified in writing that he was to be terminated.

[11] These findings are based on the credited testimony of Flynn. Tolman did not testify. David Vainio did not specifically deny that he made the remarks attributed to him by Flynn. David Vainio testified in effect that he left the decision regarding Grigsby's hiring to Tolman. He averred that he discussed that subject with Tolman and he told Tolman to talk to Grigsby about the possibility of fitting him into the lab. He further averred that he did not have any feelings one way or another about hiring him. He denied that he had any discussion with Tolman about refusing to hire Grigsby because of his union involvement. Kevin Vainio's testimony in that regard was not consistent with that of David Vainio. Kevin Vainio averred that David Vainio felt that they should not hire Grigsby in Missoula because of something Grigsby did in the past. I do not credit either Kevin or David Vainio. Flynn, as business manager of Professional Eye Care, was testifying in a manner adverse to his own interest and his demeanor as he testified was such as to convince me that he was a forthright witness who was prepared to tell the truth regardless of the consequences to himself. His testimony concerning his conversations with Tolman and David Vainio was fully credible.

In NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), the Supreme Court affirmed the test enunciated by the Board in Wright Line[10] for determining whether an employee was discharged because of the exercise of Section 7 rights. Under Wright Line the General Counsel, under Section 10(c) of the Act, has the burden of establishing a prima facie case that the employee's protected conduct was a substantial or motivating factor in the employee's discharge or other adverse action taken by the employer. Once the General Counsel satisfies this burden, the employer can avoid liability under the Act by proving by a preponderance of the evidence an affirmative defense that it would have taken the same action even if the unlawful motives had not existed.

Consideration will be given first to the allegation that Professional Eye Care discharged Grigsby because of his union activity. The General Counsel has established that Grigsby was active on behalf of the Union; that Professional Eye Care knew of that activity; that David Vainio, who set labor policy for Respondents, was extremely hostile toward employees who engaged in union activity (as demonstrated by his statements to Flynn); and that Grigsby was discharged. The General Counsel has established a prima facie showing that Grigsby was discharged because of his union activity.[12] However, I believe that Respondents have proved by a preponderance of the evidence that Grigsby would have been discharged from Professional Eye Care even if the unlawful motives had not existed. Grigsby was a surface grinder. The machines on which he worked were taken from Professional Eye Care's Butte lab and moved to Eye Care's lab in Missoula 120 miles away. The two labs constitute separate bargaining units. As set forth in detail above, the removal of the equipment was not a violation of the Act and Respondents did not unlawfully refuse to bargain about the removal. Grigsby's position was not filled by any new hire. There simply was no work for Grigsby to do in the Butte lab after the equipment he normally worked on was removed. Under these circumstances, I believe that Respondents have sustained their affirmative defense. I therefore recommend that that allegation of the complaint be dismissed.

Regarding Eye Care's refusal to hire Grigsby, an entirely different question is presented. Regarding that issue, the General Counsel again has established a prima facie case that Grigsby was not hired because of his union activity. However, here, Respondents have not established their affirmative defense. The credible evidence establishes that Grigsby was not hired because David Vainio feared that he would bring the Union from Butte to Missoula. David Vainio admitted as much to Flynn.[13] I find that Eye Care refused to hire Grigsby on and after September 15, 1986, because of Grigsby's union activity and thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

D. The Violence Against Flynn

Professional Eye Care's business manager John Flynn[14] testified in this proceeding on March 26, 1987. He was called as a witness for the General Counsel. The hearing took place in an upstairs courtroom at a State of Montana courthouse in Butte, Montana. During his direct testimony Flynn gave evidence that was adverse to the interests of his Employer, Professional Eye Care. He testified in substance that David Vainio had admitted to him that Grigsby was not hired at Eye Care because David Vainio feared that Grigsby would bring the Union there. He also testified to details of the relationship between Eye Care and Professional Eye Care which helped establish that they are a single employer. When he finished his direct examination, the hearing was recessed for lunch and he left the courtroom and walked downstairs in the courthouse to use the telephone. He entered the telephone booth and picked up the receiver. Before he could close the door to the telephone booth, David Vainio propped himself against the open door. Flynn asked David Vainio to please move so that he could make his call and David Vainio stood there with his arms folded so that Flynn could not close the door. David Vainio stood there with his mouth set and a mean look in his eye. He did not respond to Flynn's request that he move so that the door could be closed. Flynn asked David Vainio once again to move and again Vainio did not answer. Flynn then lifted his arm to try to close the door and in the process he touched David Vainio on the arm or shoulder with two fingers. At that point David Vainio punched Flynn in the mouth. Flynn momentarily blacked out and when he came to he was sitting in the phone booth with his glasses off and his lip bleeding. David Vainio was standing over him in front of the phone booth saying, "He hit me first, he assaulted me." Kevin Vainio then came to the phone booth and said that Flynn had hit David Vainio first and that he was filing charges against him.

These findings are based on the credited testimony of Flynn. Flynn denied that he actually pushed David Vainio but he acknowledged in his testimony that he tried to "nudge" David Vainio out of the way and he put two fingers on his shoulder or arm. Captain Albert Johnson, a detective captain for the Butte Silver Bow Law Enforcement Agency, interviewed Flynn about the incident. He testified that Flynn told him that when he tried to close the door, he touched David Vainio on the shoulder to try to push him out of the way but that he did not even put a full hand on his shoulder. Captain Johnson also testified that Flynn told him that he did not make any gesture that might make David Vainio think that he was about to hit him. It is clear that Flynn did touch David Vainio before David Vainio punched him. It is also clear, however, that the touching was simply part of an attempt to close the telephone booth door and whether it could be characterized as a "pushing" or a "nudging" or simply an accident, it was not of such a nature as to give David Vainio any reason for concern or any reason to believe that he had to protect himself.

[12] See Associated Milk Producers, 259 NLRB 1033, 1035 (1982), enfd. 711 F.2d 627 (5th Cir. 1983), in which the Board held:

> The elements of protected activity on the part of the discharged employee, employer knowledge of the protected activity, and employer animus toward the Union, taken together, are sufficient to establish a prima facie case of unlawful discharge.

[13] For the weight that the Board and the courts have given to such "outright confessions" of unlawful conduct, see Advance Installations, 257 NLRB 845, 848 (1981), enfd. 698 F.2d 1231 (9th Cir. 1982).

[14] There was some confusion about Flynn's title. He was business manager from February 1986 until March 1987 when he was verbally informed by David Vainio that his duties were changed to that of rental property manager. However Kevin Vainio testified that Flynn's job title did not change. When Flynn questioned the Vainios about the matter, Kevin Vainio wrote to him saying that he was still business manager. That letter was received by Flynn on March 30. On that day Flynn left Respondent's employ.

The Vainio family lined up en masse to support David Vainio. David Vainio testified in substance that he walked over to the telephone booth to ask Flynn a question concerning certain documents and that Flynn, without any provocation, punched him in the jaw. David Vainio acknowledged that he did strike Flynn but he testified that he did so only after Flynn had punched him. Kevin Vainio, David Vainio's brother, and H. Marie Vainio, their mother, testified that they witnessed the entire event and that Flynn punched David Vainio on the jaw while David Vainio stood there with his hands in his pockets and that David Vainio then replied by striking Flynn. Marie Vainio, David Vainio's wife, testified that when he came home that night he had a mark on the left side of his chin that was not there when he had left that morning. Between the testimony of Flynn and the four Vainios, who testified about the incident, I unhesitantly credit Flynn and discredit the Vainios. David Vainio's version of the incident, as corroborated by the rest of his family, is inherently implausible. Flynn had just testified in a manner that was damaging to David Vainio. As indicated above, I believe he did so because he was an honest witness. There is no indication that he had any reason to bear the type of anger against David Vainio that would lead to an unprovoked assault. If David Vainio is to be believed, then Flynn punched his boss with no apparent motive. On the other hand, it is easy to understand why David Vainio would have been extremely angry with Flynn. Flynn had just testified in a way that could have hurt David Vainio very badly. Immediately after that testimony was given, according to the testimony of Flynn, David Vainio followed him to the telephone booth, blocked the door of that booth, and punched him in the mouth. My observation of the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified also supports what I believe to be the inherent probabilities of the situation. Flynn was an extremely convincing witness. His demeanor was such as to lend credence to his testimony. That was not true regarding the Vainios. They appeared to be circling the wagons to defend the family without too much concern over the accuracy of the facts they presented.

After the luncheon recess Flynn resumed the stand to give a short description of what happened. He was then excused so that he could get medical attention and the case was put over for several weeks. On the resumption of the trial, Flynn resumed the stand and was cross-examined by Respondents.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Professional Eye Care's business manager John Flynn was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Supervisors are generally excluded from protection under the Act but there are several exceptions to that general rule. Those exceptions relate to situations in which the action against a supervisor interferes with the exercise of employees' Section 7 rights. Where, as here, the supervisor was assaulted for giving testimony adverse to the employer's interest at an NLRB proceeding, the supervisor must be protected because of the need to vindicate the rights of employees. Pontiac Osteopathic Hospital, 284 NLRB 442 (1987). As the Board held in Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982), enfd. 711 F.2d 383 (D.C. Cir. 1983):

> an employer may not discharge a supervisor for giving testimony adverse to an employer's interest . . . at an NLRB proceeding. . . . [T]he protection afforded supervisors stems not from any statutory protection inuring to them, but rather from the need to vindicate the employees' exercise of their Section 7 rights.

I find that Respondents, through David Vainio, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by assaulting Flynn because Flynn gave testimony adverse to Respondents' interest at an NLRB proceeding.

E. The Discharge of Dalasera

Leonard Dalasera is an optician who is employed by Professional Eye Care. He was active on behalf of the Union and Respondents were aware of that activity.[15] He testified on behalf of the General Counsel in the instant case and also in an NLRB injunction proceeding before a United States district court judge.

Dalasera was discharged on April 10, 1987. The reason given for the discharge was that he had falsified his timecard by not showing that he left work for about 20 minutes at the request of the police to be interviewed concerning cross-charges filed by Flynn and David Vainio in the assault incident discussed above.

Dalasera was reinstated on May 26, 1987. The General Counsel took the position that Dalasera was reinstated subject to the outcome of this case and, in effect, that Dalasera is entitled to an unconditional offer of reinstatement.

On March 13, 1987, Dalasera appeared before U.S. District Court Judge James Batt in Billings, Montana, where he testified about matters relating to an injunction obtained by the Board against Respondents. After the trial David Vainio refused to speak to him. When he asked David Vainio a question, Vainio would just whistle and walk away. Dalasera had to get another person who worked with him to ask David Vainio a question so that he could get an answer. That refusal to talk to him lasted until April 9, 1987, when David and Leonard Vainio spoke to him about an alleged falsification of his timesheet. He was discharged the following day.

[15] In the case heard by Administrative Law Judge Anderson, it was alleged that Dalasera was discharged in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. The judge found merit to that contention. Whether that finding is sustained in the exceptions before the Board, Respondents knew from its participation at that trial that Dalasera was a union activist.

David Vainio assaulted Flynn in the phone booth on March 26, 1987. The following Monday, March 30, 1987, Flynn returned to work at Professional Eye Care. Dalasera was also working that day. That morning Dalasera received a phone call at work from Albert Johnson, the Butte, Montana chief of detectives. Johnson said he was conducting an investigation into the alleged assault and he asked Dalasera to come to the police station to give a statement concerning what he saw.[16] Dalasera asked Johnson whether he could come during his lunchbreak or after work. Johnson replied that those times were not acceptable and he asked Dalasera to come right away. He told Dalasera that Dalasera only worked a half a block away and it should not be a problem.

At that time Flynn was the only management official on the premises. Both David and Leonard Vainio were out of town. Flynn was a supervisor. Dalasera called Flynn from the lab and reported to him what Johnson had said. Dalasera asked Flynn for permission to go to the police station and Flynn told him he could go. Flynn also told him that whatever time he lost from work he could make up the same day. Flynn credibly testified that when he spoke to Dalasera about going to the police station, he assumed that Dalasera would not log the time in and out to reflect that meeting and that Dalasera would make up the time during lunch or after work. That procedure had been followed before and there had been no problems.

Dalasera left the lab at 11:23 a.m. and drove his car a half block or a block to the police station where he arrived at 11:25 a.m. Detective Johnson taped an interview and Dalasera left the police station at 11:43 a.m. He drove directly back to the lab where he arrived at about 11:45 a.m. All in all he was gone from the lab about 22 minutes.

Dalasera made up the lost time on the same day. That morning he had reported for work about 7:50 a.m. which was 10 minutes before his normal time. He left for lunch about 12:05 or 12:10 p.m., instead of 12 noon.[17] At the end of the day Dalasera worked till 5:05 or 5:10 p.m.[18]

The employees of Professional Eye Care fill in their own time records. Dalasera filled in his time report for March 30 with the hours 8 to 12 and 1 to 5. He had received permission to go to the police station from Supervisor Flynn; he had made up the missed worktime as he had been instructed to do by Flynn; and he filled out the time records as both he and Supervisor Flynn understood they should have been filled out. Flynn credibly testified that on a number of occasions he had authorized employees to take off from work for about 15 minutes for personal reasons and to make up the time the same day without showing the short "in and out" periods on the time records. Flynn also credibly testified that on occasion he told David Vainio that that procedure was being used.[19]

On April 9, 1987, David, Kevin, and H. Marie Vainio met with Dalasera. Union Representatives Taylor and Duggan were also present. The Vainios accused Dalasera of falsifying his time records by not putting down the time he had been away from work at the police station. Dalasera replied that he had Flynn's permission to go and that he had made up the time.

The Vainios took action against Dalasera the next day, without discussing the matter with Flynn, who had given permission for Dalasera to leave, or with the detective, who had requested him to come to the police station. On April 10, 1987, Dalasera was given a letter signed by David Vainio stating that he was suspended without pay from his employment because of misstatements on his timecard for hours worked on March 30. The letter stated that the suspension would continue indefinitely until Dalasera or his representatives produced cause why he should continue in employment. The letter referred to a statement on the bottom of the timecard that indicated that falsification of hours was cause for immediate discharge and went on to state that at the March 9 meeting, the sole justification offered for Dalasera's conduct was that he was requested by a police officer to be at the police station and that he had the permission of Flynn to go there. The letter then stated that Dalasera was not justified in falsifying the hours on the timecard.

The sequence of events set forth above establishes that Dalasera did not falsify his timecard. He correctly understood from Flynn and from observing the past experiences of other employees that short periods of absence from work that were authorized by Flynn could be made up without encumbering the time records with the details of the minutes "in and out." It is not unusual for employers to have some "de minimis" procedure regarding bookkeeping. Otherwise an employee would have to punch in and out every time he went to the bathroom. Supervisor Flynn had established such a procedure and David Vainio was aware of it because Flynn had on occasion told him of it. Yet, the Vainios discharged Dalasera without even interviewing Flynn about the incident. Respondents did introduce some evidence to show that employees were disciplined for abusing worktime but none of those situations were comparable to the instant case. One employee, Pam Kroll, was discharged on April 26, 1987, because her office in Helena was closed and the lights were off when that office was supposed to be open. There was no indication that she was absent with supervisory approval. Another employee, Lavon Huninghake, was removed from her position as office manager in Copper City and transferred to Butte because she took time off while on the clock. Again, there is no indication that she had the permission of a supervisor to take the time off.

[16] Dalasera did not witness the actual assault but he did see some incidents that led up to it.

[17] Flynn testified that he saw Dalasera leave at 12:05 or 12:10 p.m. and Dalasera testified that he left about 12:10 p.m. Marie Vainio, David Vainio's wife, testified that she went to the lab at 12:05 that day and Dalasera was not there. I believe that the testimony of Flynn and Dalasera was more reliable than that of Marie Vainio and I find that Dalasera did work some 5 or 10 minutes during his lunch hour.

[18] This finding is based on the credited testimony of Dalasera. Marie Vainio said that she came to the lab at 5:05 p.m. and found that the door was locked. She averred that she did not see Dalasera's car outside. To the extent that Marie Vainio's testimony is inconsistent with that of Dalasera, I credit Dalasera.

[19] I do not credit David Vainio's testimony to the effect that he had no knowledge that such a procedure was being used.

David Vainio testified that prior to February 4, 1987, the payroll was made up before work for the payroll period had actually been completed. In substance, an employee was guessing as to what his hours would be near the end of the payroll period. Under such circumstances an employee could not be criticized if the time he anticipated to work was incorrect. A new system was instituted whereby all payroll reports were completed before the payroll was made up. Respondents contend that they held employees much more accountable for their timecards after the change. However, that would have little to do with the instant case. Dalasera was fully accountable for properly filling out his time reports. Under the circumstances set forth above, he simply did nothing wrong.[20] I find that the reasons advanced by Respondents for the discharge of Dalasera were purely pretextual.

The General Counsel has established that Dalasera was active on behalf of the Union and testified on behalf of the General Counsel in Board and Board-related court hearings; that Respondents had knowledge of Dalasera's activities; that Respondents harbored a virulent animosity against people who engaged in such activities (as indicated by David Vainio's actions in assaulting Flynn); that Dalasera was discharged a short time after he gave testimony at a Board hearing; and that the Respondents' asserted reason for the discharge was pretextual. Regarding Respondents' defense, it is also noted that the chain of events leading to Dalasera's leaving work to go to the police station was triggered by Respondents' own misconduct (David Vainio's assault on Flynn). The General Counsel has established a strong prima facie case to establish that Dalasera was discharged because of his union activity and his testimony before the Board and court. Respondents have come forward with no credible evidence to rebut that case.[21] Using the criteria set forth in Wright Line,[22] I find that Respondents discharged Dalasera on April 10, 1987, because of Dalasera's union activity and because he gave testimony in Board and Board-related court proceedings. In doing so, Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

F. The Refusal-to-Bargain Allegations

1. Background

The complaint alleges that Respondents unlawfully refused to bargain in a number of different ways. One primary allegation is that Respondents refused to extend the Butte bargaining unit to Missoula when the Eye Care lab began operations. As is discussed in detail above, that allegation has been found to lack merit. The complaint also alleges that Professional Eye Care unlawfully refused to provide information to the Union, made unlawful unilateral changes in the hours of employment at the Butte lab, and refused to bargain in good faith with the Union. For the reasons set forth in detail below, I believe that those allegations are meritorious. In addition, the complaint, as amended, alleges two other incidents that General Counsel contends constituted refusals to bargain. They relate to a decision to move to Billings and a decision to lease or close the Butte lab. Those allegations have not been sustained.

2. The decision to move to Billings

The complaint, as amended, alleges that on or about March 3, 1987, Respondent informed the Union of its decision to remove unit work and equipment from its Butte, Montana facility to a new facility in Billings, Montana.

On January 26, 1987, Kevin Vainio wrote to the Union saying that American Eye Care was considering installing a lab in Billings, that American Eye Care did not have a present intention to close the lab in Butte, and that it was hoped that the workload in Butte would not be reduced. The letter went on to state that American Eye Care hoped that final arrangements could be made within 2 weeks, that the Union could bargain within that timeframe, and that it would welcome any input the Union had.

Representatives of Respondents and the Union met to discuss the letter on March 4, 1987. Kevin and David Vainio told Union Representatives Duggan and Taylor that they had taken over a laboratory in the Billings area and that they had made a deal to put some of the equipment from Butte in that lab. David Vainio said that they had to talk about that to the Union to get the Union's approval. Duggan replied that Respondents always managed to notify them after they had already decided to do something rather than to negotiate. Kevin Vainio said that nothing was in concrete and they could revoke the action. Either Kevin or David Vainio said that they were going to establish an optical outlet in Billings, that it would have laboratory equipment similar to Butte, and that they wanted to move some equipment from the Butte lab there.[23]

In fact no equipment was ever moved from Butte to Billings. Professional Eye Care had purchased another company's practice in Polson, Montana, and the equipment from that practice was moved to Billings. That equipment was never set up in Billings, but as of the date of the trial was still sitting on the floor. The only lab work that was done in Billings was the retinting of lenses that come from the Butte or Missoula labs and had not been done properly there. Instead of inconveniencing the patient for 4 or 5 days by shipping the lenses back to the other labs, they were retinted in Billings. There is no edging, finishing, hardening, or grinding done in Billings.

[20] In a proceeding before the Montana Labor Department, it was held that Dalasera was disqualified from receiving unemployment benefits because he was discharged for violating company policy regarding falsification of timecards. I have fully considered that decision, which was based on a hearing held on the telephone. Nonetheless, I must give primary reliance to the record in this case that led to the findings set forth here.

[21] I do not credit David Vainio's assertion that he disregarded Dalasera's union activity in deciding to suspend him.

[23] These findings are based on the credited testimony of Duggan. Taylor's testimony was somewhat different from that of Duggan. Taylor averred that the Vainios said that there might be a reduction of work and the number of people at Butte, that Duggan objected to the loss of work and said they had a right to negotiate before they made the move and not after, and that the Vainios said that they had not made the move and were contemplating it, but that it did not matter because they were going to make the move. I believe that Duggan was a more accurate witness than Taylor and I credit him, particularly with reference to Duggan's assertion that the Vainios said that nothing was in concrete and they could revoke the action.

The amount of tinting done at Billings does not cause the employees at the Butte lab to lose any hours of work and no hours were cut at Butte because of that tinting.[24]

The complaint does not allege that the removal of the tinting work was a violation of the Act. It is limited to the assertion that on or about March 3, 1987, Respondents informed the Union of the decision to remove unit work and equipment to Billings. The facts set forth above establish that what Respondents did was inform the Union of their intention to take certain actions. Their subsequent conduct clearly established that that statement of intention was nothing more than a proposal for bargaining. After negotiating with the Union, Respondents did not carry out their stated intention. No equipment was moved from Butte to Billings and the Billings laboratory was not opened except to the very limited extent that retinting work was performed where it had been improperly performed in the other labs. I therefore find that Respondents did not unlawfully inform the Union of its decision[25] to remove unit work and equipment from Butte to Billings as alleged in the complaint.

3. The decision to lease or close the Butte lab

The complaint, as amended during the course of the hearing, alleges that on or about March 26, 1987, Respondents informed the Union that they were closing their lab facility in Butte, Montana.

On March 25, 1987, Union Business Representative Taylor received a telephone call from Kevin Vainio who told him that the Vainios were thinking about leasing the lab. Kevin Vainio also told Taylor that they were going to give Dalasera the first option to lease the lab and that they were contemplating getting out of the laboratory business altogether in Butte. He said that they were going to lease it out and if they could not lease it out, they were going to close it.[26]

Later in the day on March 25, 1987, Vainio wrote to Taylor "to confirm dates for bargaining on the lease of the laboratory and equipment." The letter goes on to give dates that Respondents were available for bargaining. The letter was delivered to the Union that day. The following day, March 26, 1987, Taylor replied to the Respondents' March 25 letter saying that he could not meet immediately because of prior scheduling and he needed up to 3 weeks to schedule meetings.

On March 25, 1987, David Vainio spoke to Leonard Dalasera about leasing the lab. David Vainio said that he was going to lease the lab and that Dalasera had the first option to lease it. He also told Dalasera that he would lease it to someone else if Dalasera was not interested. David Vainio told Dalasera that if he leased it, he could negotiate with the Union.

As of the last day of the trial Respondents were still operating the Butte lab. There is no indication in the record that there was any further discussion between Respondents and the Union over Respondents' proposal to lease or close the Butte facility.

The complaint alleges that Respondents violated the Act by informing the Union that they were closing their lab facility in Butte. Assuming for the purpose of argument that Respondents had an obligation to bargain about going out of the lab business as well as the effect of such a lease or closure on the bargaining unit employees, the facts set forth above do not establish a violation of the Act. There are two parts to a decision-making process. An employer must make a decision with regard to what he wants to do. That decision deals with his own mental processes and is not subject to bargaining. It is quite another matter when the employer takes action based on that decision. At that point there may well be a duty to bargain. In the Lange Co., 222 NLRB 558, 563 (1976),[27] the Board affirmed the decision of Administrative Law Judge William J. Pannier III, which held in part as follows:

> Counsel for the General Counsel, however, argues that Respondent's conduct is tainted by virtue of the fact that it had already made the decision to transfer and lay off employees before advising the Union. Yet, in no case has the Board held that an employer must defer making a decision concerning terms and conditions of employment until it has first conferred with the representative of its employees. The requirement is that, after reaching the decision, the employer must then notify the representative and afford the opportunity to discuss that decision and to consider alternative proposals. Thus, in Ozark Trailers, Incorporated, 161 NLRB 561 (1966), the Board made it clear that the illegality lay not in the fact that the employer had first made the decision before consulting with its employees' representative. The illegality lay in the implementation of that decision prior to affording the representative an opportunity to advance and discuss alternative courses of action. Id. at 568.
> This is also illustrated in Moffitt Building Materials Company, et al., 214 NLRB [655] (1974), where the Board found that the employer had not violated the Act even though it had made a decision to liquidate its business without so much as a fare-thee-well to the bargaining representative, and where the latter then learned of that decision, but made no > effort to bargain with the employer. Id. Similarly, in Association of Motion Picture and Television Producers, Inc., 204 NLRB 807 (1973), the representative first learned of the decision when it was announced by the employer. Nonetheless, no violation was found as no bargaining was thereafter requested by the representative. If, as is contended in the instant case, it were the making of the decision prior to consulting with the representative that constituted the violation, then violations would have been found in both of these cases. > Indeed, to accept the General Counsel's argument in this matter would be to create great instability in bargaining relationships, for if formulation of decisions had to be deferred, then bargaining would be reduced to being conducted hypothetically in a vacuum. Employers are entitled to first reach a decision. This provides the starting point for any bargaining which then might follow. However, employers must then be willing to consider the alternatives proposed by the bargaining representatives before implementing those decisions.

[25] See the discussion of "decision" bargaining in the following section.

[26] These findings are based on the credited testimony of Taylor. David Vainio testified that they anticipated leasing out the Butte lab, that he and his brother felt they should divest themselves of the lab in general and spend most of their time doing examinations, and that they seriously considered leasing the Butte lab, the Missoula lab, and any other lab that they might have. David Vainio acknowledged that they notified the Union of their intention to lease the Butte lab, but he denied that he said anything about closing the lab. Where David Vainio's testimony conflicts with that of Taylor, I credit Taylor.

Respondents have not implemented any decision they may have made to lease or close their Butte lab and have given the Union advance notice of their intention and have provided the Union with a fair opportunity to bargain. Respondents have not violated the Act by informing the Union of a decision to lease or close their lab facility and that allegation of the complaint must be dismissed.

4. The request for information

The complaint, as amended, alleges in substance that the Union requested and Respondents refused to furnish the sales agreement for the equipment that was transferred from the Butte lab to the Missoula lab, as well as the lease agreement between David Vainio and the Southgate Mall in Missoula for the Eye Care Missoula lab. The background facts needed to put that information in context are set forth in detail above. Also as found above the Eye Care lab in Missoula constitutes part of a single employer with Professional Eye Care in Butte even though each has a separate bargaining unit for laboratory employees.

At a negotiating session in September 1986 Kevin Vainio took the position that Professional Eye Care had no duty to bargain about the Missoula lab. He told the union representatives that the equipment from Butte had been sold to David Vainio and that David Vainio was the sole operator of the Missoula lab. Union Representative Duggan asked to see a copy of the sales agreement and a copy of the lease on the Missoula lab. Kevin Vainio replied that it was none of the Union's business. However, a few moments later, Kevin Vainio had Flynn bring a copy of what appeared to be the last page of a lease. In addition, at some undisclosed time after the bargaining session, Kevin Vainio called the union office and told Taylor that the lease would be made available for a certain cost. Taylor offered to let Respondents use the Union's copying machine. By letter dated November 12, 1986, Kevin Vainio offered the Union a copy of the lease and the related documents. However, the letter went on to state:

> When we receive payment of the sum of $26.50, which represents a reasonable cost for copies and copying by our employees, we will be happy to provide you with a copy. This amount is for 53 pages at the rate of $.50 per page, which is the amount charged by the federal courts for copies.

By letter dated November 17, 1986, Taylor informed the Respondents that he would not pay any money or fees for any documentation that the Union needed from the Respondents. In the letter Taylor stated that the Union had its own copying machine and if Respondents brought the documents to the Union office, the Union would make a copy for itself and another for Respondents. The evidence does not indicate that any further action was taken by either Respondents or the Union and the documents were not given to the Union.

The information sought by the Union was reasonably related to its need to evaluate whether work was being unlawfully diverted from the Butte lab to the Missoula lab, whether Eye Care was part of a single employer with Professional Eye Care, and whether the Union had the right to represent the lab employees of Eye Care. A union may require information that will help determine whether a recipient of transferred work is in some way related to the transferring employer where it represents the employees of the transferring employer. Bentley-Jost Electric Corp., 283 NLRB 564 (1987). Information that goes to the core of the employer-employee relationship is presumptively relevant. Where the information sought goes to matters occurring outside of the unit, relevance must be proven. Calmat Co., 283 NLRB 1103 (1987). Here the General Counsel has established that the requested information was needed by the Union for it to evaluate how it should proceed with its collective-bargaining responsibilities. However, the finding that the information sought was relevant does not end the inquiry. As the Board held in Century Air Freight, 284 NLRB 730 (1987), an employer and a union should bargain in good faith regarding conditions under which relevant information is to be furnished. Here the condition that Respondents imposed was that the Union pay $26.50 for 53 pages of photocopies at 50 cents a page. Though the Union refused to pay that amount, it did offer to make the photostats itself. Respondents neither accepted that offer nor made any counterproposal. It simply did not furnish the documents. As the Board held in Tower Books, 273 NLRB 671 (1984), enfd. mem. 772 F.2d 913 (9th Cir. 1985):

> Here, the Union requested information such as the names, addresses, and job classifications of only 12 employees, and their wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. The information sought was basic and encompassed matters which employers are required to provide to enable unions to bargain intelligently and to fulfill their obligations as the selected representative of the employer's employees.[3] The cost and burden of compliance ordinarily will not justify an initial, categorical refusal to supply relevant data.[4] "If there are substantial costs involved in compiling the information in the precise form at the intervals requested by the Union, the parties must bargain in good faith as to who shall bear such costs . . . ."[5] The Respondent expressed no willingness to bargain about costs. Additionally, the onus is on the Respondent to show that production of the data would be unduly burdensome. There is nothing in the record to substantiate such a claim. On the contrary, it can be inferred from the Respondent's failure to produce evidence of substantial cost in response to the Union's claim that the cost would be "de minimis," that the costs for compiling basic information on only 12 employees was indeed negligible. Mindful that each case of what constitutes good-faith bargaining must turn on its particular facts, it is clear that the Respondent's refusal to supply the information—while neither justifying its request for costs nor offering to bargain over the matter—was unreasonable. A lack of good faith can be inferred therefrom.

[5] Food Employers Council, 197 NLRB 651 (1972). Contrary to the assertion of our dissenting colleague, this case indicates that there is indeed a sound basis in the law for the Union's request that the Respondent demonstrate a burdensome financial impact before the Union would discuss costs.

I believe that case is controlling in the instant situation. Here Respondents started with an outright refusal to furnish the relevant information. Later Respondents offered to furnish information at a set fee but did not propose to bargain about the fee. When the Union offered to make the photocopies itself, Respondents did not accept the offer or make any counterproposal. Under these circumstances, a lack of good faith can be inferred.

I find that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to furnish the Union with photocopies of David Vainio's lease on the Eye Care Missoula facility and the sales agreement under which David Vainio purchased equipment from Professional Eye Care.

5. The changes in hours

Until June 16, 1986, Respondents' employees at the Butte lab worked a regular 8-hour day, 40-hour week. On June 16, 1986, their hours were reduced to 6 hours a day.

Sometime in May 1987 Business Manager Flynn had a conversation with Leonard Vainio in which they discussed the possibility of a cut in hours. Leonard Vainio told Flynn that the Department of Labor might require substantial back wages for overtime, but it was not a problem because they would cut hours until they made up the lost wages. On June 15, David Vainio instructed Flynn to cut the hours of the lab employees to 6 hours a day. The same day Flynn told employees Leonard Dalasera, Mike King, Gregg Wedlek, and Matt Grigsby that their hours were to be reduced. The cut in hours was put into effect the following day. No notice was given to the Union about Respondents' intention to change the hours, and the Union did not become aware that the hours had been changed until June 25, 1986.

Except for a few exceptional days where the employees worked 8 hours, the 6-hour workday remained in effect until August 20, 1986, when the workday was reduced to 5 hours. Not long before that, the Labor Department issued an order requiring the payment of back wages for overtime. On August 19, Leonard Vainio told Flynn to reduce the hours and David Vainio authorized him to send out a notice to that effect.

On August 19, 1986, Flynn drafted a letter to Union Representative Taylor telling him that due to economic and business considerations, the hours worked in the Butte lab "have been" reduced to 5 hours a day effective August 20. The following day, August 20, Flynn distributed a notice to employees Dalasera, King, Grigsby, and Valeno, which stated in part that their hours were reduced to a 5-hour day effective immediately. After notifying the employees that their hours had been reduced, Flynn notified the Union of the change by delivering the letter that he had drafted the previous day.

The 5-hour day for Butte lab workers remained in effect until September 5 or 6, 1986, when the hours were raised to 8 hours a day. They remained at that level thereafter.

There is no contention by the General Counsel that the change in hours was motivated by antiunion considerations. The sole question presented is whether the changes in hours were unlawful because Respondents made them unilaterally without giving the Union an opportunity to bargain about them. Respondents justified their action on several grounds. None were persuasive. Both Kevin and David Vainio testified that before reducing the hours they made a number of phone calls to the Union but were unable to reach Union Representative Taylor because he was out of town. They both asserted that Taylor did not always respond to the telephone messages they left with his office.[28] Taylor's telephone records establish that the Vainios did call him and did leave messages. Kevin Vainio testified that on one occasion he left a message that he wanted to talk to Taylor about reduction in hours. I do not credit Kevin Vainio's testimony in that regard. Other than that evidence, there is nothing to indicate that the Union was informed of Respondents' desire to reduce hours until after the hours were in fact reduced. Regarding the August 20 reduction in hours, Respondents did notify the Union in writing, but only after the change had been put into effect. Obviously, Respondents knew how to use the mail. Under these circumstances, I do not believe that Respondents made a reasonable effort to notify the Union of their intention to reduce the hours and did not give the Union any opportunity to bargain about the matter until after the hours were changed.

[28] I credit Taylor's testimony to the effect that he always did answer his messages. However, he acknowledged that he was often out of town. His delays in returning calls might well have led the Vainios to believe that he was ignoring their calls.

Respondents also contended that there was a time lag between the time they requested bargaining and the time that the Union would make its representatives available for bargaining. However, Respondents cannot be heard to complain about the possibility of the Union's delaying a response to a notice of intention to reduce hours when such a notice was never given. The Union was never given an opportunity to bargain.

Respondents also contend that they had the right to change the hours because of an agreement on a management-rights clause. Prior to the events in question here, the Union had proposed a management-rights clause that included the right of the employer to schedule the work subject to the terms of the agreement. Initially, Respondents said they had no objection to that clause but then in a counteroffer Respondents proposed a management-rights clause that would specifically have given them the right to determine "employee hours" as well as the scheduling of work. The Union never agreed to that change. There was no agreement either on that clause or on a contract in general. Even if there were an agreement on that clause and the clause was subject to the interpretation that Respondents wish to give it, the clause would have no operative effect until an agreement was reached on a contract as a whole. Agreement on one part of a contract is in the usual case contingent on agreement concerning the rest of the contract. Respondents did reduce the hours of work of the employees in the Butte lab without notifying the Union of their intention to do so and without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain about it.

Where, as here, an employer is bargaining with a Board-certified union, it violates Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act if it unilaterally and in the absence of impasse makes changes in the terms and conditions of employment of its employees. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962); St. Elizabeth Community Hospital, 240 NLRB 937 (1979). The Union is the duly certified representative of Professional Eye Care's laboratory employees; hours of work constitute a mandatory subject of bargaining; though the unit was small, the change in the number of hours worked was substantial and applied to the entire bargaining unit; the changes were made without prior notice to the Union and without any opportunity on the part of the Union to bargain about them before they were put into effect; and Professional Eye Care has not come forward with any credible defense that would justify the unilateral change in hours. By reducing the number of hours worked as set forth above, Professional Eye Care has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. The failure to bargain in good faith

The second amended consolidated complaint alleges that Respondents failed to bargain in good faith with the Union. The general law regarding good-faith bargaining has been set forth at length in such cases as West Coast Casket Co., 192 NLRB 624 (1971), enfd. in pertinent part 469 F.2d 871 (9th Cir. 1972), and Borg-Warner Controls, 198 NLRB 726 (1972). Section 8(d) of the Act requires the employer and the union to confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. That section does not compel either party to agree to a proposal, but there must be a good-faith effort to reach an agreement. Each case stands on its own and good faith must be determined by scrutinizing the totality of the parties' conduct. As was held in West Coast Casket Co., supra at 636:

> From the context of an employer's total conduct, it must be decided whether the employer is lawfully engaged in hard bargaining to achieve a contract that it considers desirable or is unlawfully endeavoring to frustrate the possibility of arriving at any agreement. Sunbeam Plastics Corporation, 144 NLRB 1010.

Professional Eye Care and the Union held bargaining sessions on July 24 and September 19, 1986. The complaint alleges that Respondents manifested bad faith in those sessions. The parties had engaged in bargaining for some time before then. By December 13, 1985, at least some progress had been made. At that meeting Kevin Vainio told the union representatives that there was agreement regarding union security, hours of work, foremen working, discrimination, posting of contract, bimonthly pay periods, successor clause, grievance and arbitration, moonlighting clause, management rights, funeral leave, jury duty, civil rights clause, minimums, and language concerning the length of the agreement. Kevin Vainio also told the Union that open issues included wages, vacation, insurance, holidays, report and callout, and jurisdiction. At that meeting Union Representative Duggan asked Kevin Vainio for a written counterproposal before the next meeting. They met again on January 17, 1986. Professional Eye Care had no counterproposal and once again Duggan asked for one. David Vainio was present at that meeting. He said that his bottom-line position was that wages and costs had to be frozen, but later David Vainio proposed to cut Dalasera's pay from $7 to $5 and the pay of other lab employees from $4.50 an hour to $4 an hour. David Vainio said that all Professional Eye Care had to do was talk to the Union about those things and it did not have to agree with the Union on anything. He told the union representatives that John Flynn would talk to them until 5 p.m. and he left the meeting.

On June 25, 1986, David Vainio called the Union and asked to schedule a meeting. The following day Union Representative Duggan wrote to David Vainio. The letter said that the Union could not meet on such short notice and that the Union's schedule did not allow a meeting at that time or the following week. It went on to state that during the meeting of January 17, 1986, the Union had requested a written counterproposal, which had not yet been received. In the letter Duggan took the position that a written proposal was needed for any meaningful negotiations to take place and reference was made to David Vainio's verbal rescission of certain actions taken by Kevin Vainio at the previous meeting of December 13, 1985.

The parties did meet for a bargaining session on July 24, 1986. David Vainio and Flynn represented Professional Eye Care. Duggan and Taylor represented the Union. David Vainio arrived at the meeting 15 or 20 minutes after it was scheduled to start. He began by complaining about Dalasera's work. He said that Dalasera was going to have to be reprimanded or have his wages cut to $5 an hour. Duggan replied that they would have a grievance and disciplinary procedure if a contract was agreed to, but at that point they should discuss negotiations. There was discussion about the opening of the Missoula lab and how it would affect the Butte lab.

In mid-1985 the Union had given Professional Eye Care a proposed contract. At the July 24, 1986, meeting Professional Eye Care gave the Union a document entitled "Changes to Machinists Union Contract." The document was an article by article response to the Union's original proposal showing "no change," "omit," or proposing new language. The Professional Eye Care's proposal called for $5 an hour for people able to perform all lab duties, and $4 an hour for people able to perform only certain duties. The Union's original proposal called for a full grievance procedure culminating in binding arbitration. Professional Eye Care's counterproposal allowed for the filing of grievances, but contained a provision stating that if no agreement was reached on the grievance, the decision of the employer prevailed. Professional Eye Care's proposal also provided that all costs of grievances were to be borne by the Union. Under Professional Eye Care's proposal there would be no binding arbitration, all costs of arbitration would be on the Union, and the decision of an arbitration board would be taken into consideration by the employer but not be binding on it. The Union's proposal allowed authorized representatives of the Union to contact employees during shop hours as long as the contacts did not unreasonably interfere with the duties of the employees and as long as other conditions were met. Professional Eye Care's proposal was that no agent of the Union could contact employees during work hours. Professional Eye Care's proposal ended with a clause that would provide for costs incurred by careless acts of employees being recorded and subtracted from the employees' pay.

Flynn also gave the Union a document entitled "Lab Quality Guidelines" which set forth procedures for quality control and employee discipline. During the course of the meeting David Vainio stated that there would be no contract unless he was permitted to recover any costs that were brought about by either negligence or the willful destruction of property by his employees. Duggan questioned the legality of that type of clause.

Less than an hour after negotiations began, David Vainio left the meeting. Before he left, Duggan requested that he be given something in writing to show that Flynn had authority to bargain. David Vainio signed a document stating that he authorized Flynn to bargain in his place when necessary.[29] After David Vainio left, the meeting only lasted another half hour. During that time they discussed Professional Eye Care's proposals. Duggan said that they had already reached agreement on a clause for working foremen. Flynn replied that David Vainio now wanted that clause out. Duggan said that Professional Eye Care's wage proposal was less than the one that it had proposed on two previous occasions. Flynn replied that the Union would have to talk to David Vainio about wages. Duggan referred to a number of other proposals that Professional Eye Care had at one time agreed to and now wanted deleted, and Flynn replied each time that he could not do anything about it because David Vainio wanted it out. There was talk about the jurisdiction clause originally requested by the Union. That clause was not geared to the work of laboratory employees. Duggan said that he recognized that some of the Union's proposals were boilerplate and did not apply to an optical lab so that before the next meeting he would draft another document that better described the work of people the Union was bargaining for. He sent a full contract proposal to Professional Eye Care on August 13, 1986.[30]

The next negotiating session was scheduled to take place at 9 a.m. on September 19, 1986. In arranging for the meeting, the Union had requested that Professional Eye Care furnish a written counterproposal in advance. David Vainio arrived for the meeting half an hour late. At that time he and his brother Kevin met with Duggan, Taylor, and Matt Grigsby, one of Professional Eye Care's employees. David Vainio said that there would be no negotiations as long as Grigsby was in the room. Duggan replied that it was the Union's prerogative to decide who would be on the negotiating committee. David Vainio then said that there would be no agreement unless there was some method for him to recover losses that employees were responsible for. Duggan said that it was not appropriate to talk about employee deficiencies at that time because they were there to negotiate a labor agreement. Duggan brought up the subject of the Missoula lab and Kevin Vainio said that the Union already had had an opportunity to negotiate on that.

About 15 minutes after the negotiating session began, David Vainio and Flynn left the meeting. Shortly thereafter Kevin Vainio left. He came back with Flynn and Flynn said that he was not representing Professional Eye Care and he had no authority to do so. Duggan reminded Flynn that at the July 24 meeting David Vainio had given the Union a written document authorizing Flynn to bargain. Flynn replied that he was only authorized to talk to the Union and that he was not able to strike any deal. At that point Duggan asked Kevin Vainio to supply a document authorizing him to bargain. Kevin Vainio obtained a statement signed by David Vainio saying that Kevin Vainio was authorized to bargain as the need arose. At that point Kevin Vainio asked Duggan to show his authority to bargain for the Union. Duggan showed him his union credential card.

The meeting resumed with Kevin Vainio and Flynn representing Professional Eye Care. Duggan asked for Professional Eye Care's written proposal and Kevin [29] Flynn credibly testified that the only authority he had at the July 24 negotiating session was to finish the discussion and to obtain knowledge.

[30] These findings are based on the credited testimony of Duggan. He appeared to have a very good memory and his demeanor was such as to indicate that full reliance could be placed on his testimony. His testimony was in part corroborated by that of Taylor and Flynn. To the extent that testimony of David and Kevin Vainio is inconsistent with that of Duggan, I credit Duggan and do not credit David and Kevin Vainio.

Vainio gave him another copy of the "Changes to Machinists Union Contract" that had been discussed in the previous meeting. There was talk about the Missoula lab and Kevin Vainio asserted that the Union had abandoned its right to negotiate.

While the parties were going over Professional Eye Care's proposals, David Vainio returned to the meeting and asked how things were going. David Vainio said, "Have we reached a stalemate yet? Let's get these pickets going. I'm tired of fooling around." Duggan answered that there was a long way to go in negotiations before there was any kind of impasse. David Vainio then said that he was getting tired of all the time he was spending with this "thing." He asked why they did not call the thing "quits." David Vainio then went on to say that they would never have any agreement unless the agreement prohibited union representatives from being on the premises. David Vainio said that he did not want to see "you people" on the premises any more. He then left the meeting.

After David Vainio left, Kevin Vainio discussed some of the Union's proposals. He said that Professional Eye Care did not agree to the union shop proposal. Duggan replied that Professional Eye Care had agreed to it on three other occasions. Kevin Vainio said that Professional Eye Care wanted to make sure that the Union was not treating any of the people with favoritism and that all of them were paying dues. Duggan replied that they could accomplish that by agreeing to a checkoff provision. Kevin Vainio said that that was not what he meant and that he wanted the right to inspect the union records. Duggan replied that the internal union records were none of his business and that they were not even a proper subject for bargaining.

After further discussion concerning the Missoula lab, the parties went on to direct their attention to the management-rights clause that had been proposed by the Union and that had previously been agreed to by Professional Eye Care. Kevin Vainio said that he wanted to add something to the management-rights clause concerning employee hours. Duggan said that the Union's management-rights clause had been tentatively agreed to at three or four previous meetings. Kevin Vainio replied that he wanted to change it "because it's September 19." They then spoke about hours and overtime. Duggan said that the Union's proposal accommodated a complaint that Professional Eye Care had made in previous meetings by allowing a 6 to 10 a.m. starting time, which he understood Flynn had wanted at the July 24 meeting. Kevin Vainio took the position that it should be a 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. starting time. When Duggan said that Professional Eye Care was taking a regressive position, Kevin Vainio replied that times do change. As the meeting progressed, Kevin Vainio retreated from other offers that he had previously made.

The parties broke for lunch at 12:15 p.m. that day, at which time Duggan again reminded Kevin Vainio that he expected copies of the lease and sales agreements on the Butte equipment. Kevin Vainio said that he had no intention of giving either of those documents, but that he would have a proposal for the Union when he got back. They returned from lunch about 1:40 p.m. and Kevin Vainio gave Duggan a five-page handwritten document called "Labor Agreement," that was extremely difficult if not impossible to read. It was accompanied by three pages of the Union's proposal on which handwritten changes were made. Kevin Vainio said that the union-security clause meant that he wanted the right to inspect internal union records to determine that the Union was not lying to him about people paying dues and how much they paid. In the management-rights clause, he specifically added the right to determine hours. The meeting adjourned about 2 p.m.[31]

I find that Professional Eye Care did not engage in good-faith bargaining. David Vainio, the key negotiator for Professional Eye Care, was late for meetings and left them early; he went through the motions of giving authority to bargain to Flynn when Flynn had no real authority (i.e., Flynn told the Union that it would have to talk to David about wages); David Vainio played cat-and-mouse games with the Union in which his brother Kevin would agree to a union proposal and then David would veto it; many of Professional Eye Care's offers appeared to be whimsical rather than serious (a 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. starting time for employees in a business that appeared to be open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.); David Vainio's remarks indicated that he was not serious about negotiations (he was tired of fooling around and wanted to get the pickets going); David Vainio made statements about prohibiting union agents from coming on the premises; and Professional Eye Care insisted on inspecting internal union records. In addition, as found above, Professional Eye Care demonstrated its bad faith by refusing to furnish documents needed by the Union to intelligently bargain. Taken as a whole, Professional Eye Care's conduct indicates that it had no desire to reach an agreement but was taking whatever actions were necessary to thwart one. I find that Professional Eye Care did not bargain in good faith and therefore violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents Professional Eye Care and Eye Care constitute a single employer and are jointly and severally liable for any backpay due and for otherwise remedying their unfair labor practices.

2. Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to hire Matt Grigsby on and after September 15, 1986, because of his union activity.

3. Respondents, through their agent David Vainio, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by assaulting John Flynn because Flynn gave testimony adverse to Respondents' interest at an NLRB hearing.

4. Professional Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act by discharging Dalasera on April 10, 1987, because of Dalasera's union activity and because he gave testimony in Board and Board-related court proceedings.

[31] These findings are based on the credited testimony of Duggan, which was substantiated in part by Taylor and Flynn. To the extent that the testimony of David and Kevin Vainio is inconsistent with that of Duggan, I do not credit Kevin and David Vainio.

5. Professional Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by

(a) Refusing to honor the Union's request to supply it with photocopies of David Vainio's agreement to buy equipment from Professional Eye Care and with David Vainio's lease on Eye Care's Missoula premises.

(b) Changing the hours of employment of employees in the Professional Eye Care laboratory bargaining unit without notifying the Union and affording it an opportunity to bargain about the change.

(c) Failing to bargain in good faith with the Union.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondents engaged in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that they be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Eye Care violated the Act by refusing to hire Matt Grigsby on and after September 15, 1986, because of his union activity, I recommend that Respondents be ordered to offer him immediate employment at the Eye Care laboratory and to make him whole for any loss of earnings resulting from the refusal to hire him by payment to him of a sum of money equal to the amount he normally would have earned as wages and benefits from September 15, 1986, which was the date he would have been hired absent the unlawful refusal to hire him, to the date on which an offer of employment is made, less net earnings during that period. The amount of backpay will be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[32]

Having found that Professional Eye Care discharged Leonard Dalasera in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, I recommend that Respondents be ordered to unconditionally offer him reinstatement at the Professional Eye Care laboratory, if they have not already done so, and to make him whole for any loss of earnings resulting from his discharge by payment to him of a sum of money equal to the amount he normally would have earned as wages and other benefits from April 10, 1987, which was the date of his discharge, to May 26, 1987, when he returned to work. The amount of backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, supra.[33]

Having found that Professional Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to honor the Union's request to supply certain photocopies, I recommend that Respondents be ordered to furnish the Union with photocopies of David Vainio's agreement to buy equipment from Professional Eye Care and with David Vainio's lease on the Eye Care premises.

Having found that Professional Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by changing the hours of employment of employees in the Professional Eye Care laboratory bargaining unit without notifying the Union and affording it an opportunity to bargain about the change, I recommend that Respondents be ordered to make the employees in that bargaining unit whole for any loss of earnings resulting from their reduction in hours by payment to each of them of a sum of money equal to the amount he or she normally would have earned as wages and other benefits if they had worked full 8-hour days between June 16, 1986, when the hours of work were first reduced, until September 6, 1986, when the employees were once again put on an 8-hour day, with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, supra.

Having found that Professional Eye Care violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to bargain in good faith with the Union, I recommend that Respondents be ordered to bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of their employees in the following bargaining unit:

> All laboratory employees employed by David Vainio d/b/a Professional Eye Care at the facility located at 225 South Idaho, Butte, Montana; but excluding all office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

It is further recommended that Respondents be ordered to preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay.

It is further recommended that Respondents be ordered to expunge from their files any reference to the failure to hire Grigsby or the discharge of Dalasera and to notify them in writing that that has been done and that evidence of those unlawful actions will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against them.

As Respondents' acts demonstrated a tendency to behave in total disregard of the rights of their employees, I recommend a broad 8(a)(1) remedy to enjoin any and all violations of that section of the Act. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979); Goren Printing Co., 285 NLRB 38 (1987).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[34]

ORDER

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Cracraft

On January 13, 1988, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in the above-entitled proceeding[1] in which it affirmed, in part, the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the administrative law judge and adopted his recommended Order with certain modifications. The Board found, inter alia, that the Respondent Union and Respondent Employers Wolf Trap and Ford's Theatre violated Sections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(a)(1), respectively, by maintaining closed-shop provisions in their collective-bargaining agreements that gave work preference to union members. We further held that by refusing to refer Charging Party Regina Becker for employment pursuant to a lawful hiring hall arrangement between the Respondents because of her nonunion status the Union violated Section 8(b)(2). Finally, we announced a new policy of finding employers jointly and severally liable for a union's discriminatory operation of a hiring hall only if they know or can be reasonably charged with notice of a union's discrimination. Previously, the Board had adhered to the principle of strict liability and held employers responsible even if they had no knowledge, either actual or constructive, of a union's discriminatory operation of a referral system. Applying the new standard, we found that despite the absence of actual knowledge on the part of Respondents Wolf Trap and Ford's Theatre it was, nevertheless, reasonable to charge them with notice of the Union's discriminatory treatment of Becker because they knowingly agreed to the unlawful closed-shop clause.[2] We therefore found these Respondents violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act and ordered them to cease and desist, to post a notice to employees, and to make Becker whole for any losses she may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against her.

On February 8, 1988, Respondents Wolf Trap and Ford's Theatre filed a "Joint Motion to Reconsider and Stay Further Proceedings" stating various reasons for the Board to reconsider its finding of violations against them. Alternatively, the Respondent Employers submit that even if the Board adheres to its decision, their backpay liability should be limited to the duration of the contracts that contained the unlawful closed-shop clauses. In addition, Respondent Ford's Theatre contends that, in any event, the 10(b) date for imposing liability against it is May 2, 1981, rather than April 20, 1981, as set forth in the notice to employees that the Board ordered to be posted.

The Board has considered the Respondent's motion and finds merit in their contention that their liability for the Union's discrimination against Regina Becker should cease upon expiration of the contracts, which contained unlawful closed-shop provisions in their contracts with the Union. The sole basis for assessing liability against Wolf Trap and Ford's Theatre was the presence of the closed-shop provisions in their contracts with the Union. It follows that such liability should extend no longer than the life of the contracts containing those unlawful clauses, i.e., December 31, 1981, in Ford's Theatre's case and April 30, 1982, for Wolf Trap.

Thus, on reconsideration, we shall modify our original Order by limiting the Respondent Employers' backpay liability in accordance with the above dates. In addition, Respondent Ford's Theatre correctly points out that the charges against it were not filed until November 2, 1981, and, therefore, we shall amend the 10(b) date set out in the notice to read May 2, 1981, rather than April 20, 1981.

[2] Conversely, we dismissed the complaint against Respondent National Theatre because it had neither actual knowledge of the Union's discrimination nor a closed-shop bargaining agreement under which it could be reasonably charged with notice of the unlawful conduct. The General Counsel did not contend, and there is no evidence to support a finding, that any Employer Respondents had actual knowledge of the Union's discrimination.

289 NLRB No. 96

We have modified our Order to reflect the changes made in accordance with this decision and to more accurately reflect our original Decision and Order. The Order as so modified is set out below as well as the attached notices, which are substituted for those that are attached as appendices to our original Decision and Order.

In all other respects, the Respondents' motion raises no other issues not previously argued and fully considered by the Board and is denied.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On April 12, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Marvin Roth issued the attached decision. The Interim Trustee in Bankruptcy filed exceptions limited to the issue of whether the Board could require a liquidating trustee to take the affirmative actions necessary to comply with the recommended Order against the Respondent in this case.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

The Interim Trustee does not except to the judge's findings that the Respondent committed violations of the Act. Rather, in her exceptions the Trustee merely asserts that an involuntary Chapter 7 bankruptcy petition was filed against the Respondent on February 26, 1988, in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, Southern Division, in Detroit, Michigan, which automatically stayed all legal proceedings against the Respondent under the provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 362(a). Board proceedings, however, fall within the provisions of 11 U.S.C. § 362(b)(4) and (5), which specifically except proceedings by a governmental entity to enforce its police or regulatory powers from the automatic stay provisions in 11 U.S.C. § 362(a). Phoenix Co., 274 NLRB 995 (1985). Furthermore, the institution of bankruptcy proceedings does not deprive the Board of jurisdiction or authority to entertain and process an unfair labor practice case to its final disposition. Antoine's of Beverly Hills, 280 NLRB No. 142, slip op. 2 (July 31, 1986), not reported in Board volumes.

The Interim Trustee also asserts that the Respondent no longer has any employees, the Respondent's business operations have ended, and the Trustee only has the authority to liquidate the Respondent's business but has no authority to operate the former business. The Trustee contends that she has no authority to undertake the affirmative actions required to comply with the recommended Order in this case and that it is therefore inappropriate for the Board to impose such affirmative provisions on a liquidating trustee. We disagree. Consideration of the unsupported assertions in the Trustee's exceptions is best left to the compliance stage of this proceeding, when the Respondent can introduce evidence about the closing of its business.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, American Fleet Maintenance Company, Inc., Detroit, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Stanley C. Moore III, Esq., of Detroit, Michigan, for the Respondent.
Joseph Postas, of Detroit, Michigan, for the Charging Party.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARVIN ROTH, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard at Detroit, Michigan, on October 5, 6, and 7, 1987.[1] The charge in Case 7–CA–27039 was filed on June 10 by International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union). The Charge and amended charge in Case 7–CA–27144 were filed by the Union respectively on July 16 and August 19. The consolidated complaints, which issued in Case 7–CA–27039 on July 24 and in Case 7–CA–27144 on August 26, allege that American Fleet Maintenance Company, Inc. (Respondent or the Company) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. The gravamen of the complaint is that the Company allegedly unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union as representative of a unit of its employees, unilaterally discontinued paying health insurance provisions and unilaterally granted the employees a wage increase, engaged in unlawful acts of retaliation, interrogation, and promises of benefits, and discriminatorily disciplined and terminated employees Donald Cooper and Pete Sype because of their union activities. The Company's answers deny the commission of the alleged unfair practices. All parties were afforded full oppportunity to participate, to present relevant evidence, to argue orally, and to file briefs. The General Counsel and the Company each filed a brief.

On the entire record in this case[2] and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the briefs and arguments of the parties, I make the following

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Preliminary Findings: the Company's Operations, the Union Organizational Campaign, the Negotiations Between the Parties, and the Question of Whether the Company Validly Recognized the Union

The Company's facility is located on Meyers, in De-roit. The Company previously operated a facility on East Warren in Detroit. The Company commenced operations at the Meyers facility in December 1985, and con-inued to operate at East Warren until July 1985. In March 1987, the Company's supervisory hierarchy con-isted of: President Richard Topolewski; his stepfather Eugene Kopcik, who was board chairman; Topolewski's cousin, William Dinardi, who was vice president; and Foreman Gil Davis Sr. All four performed hands-on work in the shop in addition to their supervisory duties. William Dinardi Sr., Topolewski's uncle, was sales manager. As of March 19 the Company had 12 shop employees. Topolewski testified that all 12 could be described as mechanics, although not all performed mechanical work. Most had a principal job function, although they did not work exclusively at the function. Stantley Marchelwicz worked at teardown and inspection, and James Celani cleaned the engines after they arrived at the facility. Ronald Carter worked at assembly, including the "Supercharger." Donald Cooper and Peter Sype, the alleged discriminatees, were engine builders. Walter Klatzke worked at transmission building, including teardown and inspection of transmissions. Robert Swigert operated the engine dynomometer (testing machine). (The transmission dynomometer might be operated by any one of several persons.) Kendall Magee removed and reinstated engines, and Jerome Kennedy helped install engines, among other tasks. Gil Davis Jr. functioned as a general helper, and Mark Palkowski was parts clerk. Charles Brown did janitorial work. President Topolewski and Board Chairman Kopcik worked on parts in the machine shop. The supervisors, including Topolewski, worked on assigned tasks as needed. The Company also had sales and clerical personnel who worked in the office, including Topolewski's mother and wife.

On March 12, in response to call from one of the employees, Union Business Agent Joseph Potas met with Sype, Cooper, Davis Sr., and Davis Jr. Davis Sr. told Potas that he was a leadman and had no authority to hire and fire. Potas testified that on the basis of what Davis Sr. told him, he concluded that Davis Sr. was a supervisor. Sype testified that this was also his understanding. However, at the present hearing the parties stipulated that Davis Sr. was a supervisor who had authority to hire and fire. Potas distributed union authorization cards and all four present signed cards. Cooper ad Sype took extra cards and the next day, solicited seven additional employees (Klatzke, Brown, Palkowski, Celani, Swigert, Magee, and Carter) to sign authorization cards. Cooper, who neglected to date his initial card, signed a second card on March 13. Cooper and Sype turned in all cards to the Union. Davis Sr. did not solicit any cards. As of March 13, 10 of the 12 shop employees (all but Marchelwicz and Kennedy) had signed union authorization cards.

By letter dated March 19 to the Company, the Union asserted that a majority of the Company's maintenance employees designated and bargaining as set forth in an attached "Recognition Agreement." The agreement provided that the Company agreed to recognize the Union as a representative of "all its employees employed as: leadmen, diesel mechanics, automotive machinists, journeymen mechanics, general maintenance, apprentice mechanics, stockroom clerks, parts pickup men, helpers and porters, but excluding office-clerical employees, truck drivers, dock and warehousemen, supervisory employees, salesmen and guards are defined in the Act." The proposed agreement provided that the parties would negotiate a collective-bargaining contract, whose terms would be retroactive, and also provide for a card check in the event the Company has a good-faith doubt concerning the Union's majority status. The agreement also provided that any "arbitrary action" by the Company against union adherents would be considered by the Union as a basis for filing an unfair labor practice charge.

After receiving the Union's letter, President Topolewski telephoned Business Agent Potas and requested a meeting with him. Potas said that they could go to an election and sign the recognition agreement, and (in the latter event) the parties could first have a card check by an outside person. Topolewski replied that he did not doubt the Union had a majority and an election would be a waste of time. The parties met late in the week of March 23 at the Company office. Potas was accompanied by Business Agent John McDonald and Topolewski by Kopcik and Denardi Jr. Topolewski complained that the Company was a small firm, had financial problems, and questioned why the Union wanted to organize it. He showed Potas the Company's financial statements, and said that he changed his mind and wanted to go to an election. McDonald said that the parties could go to an election, sign the recognition agreement, or the Union could strike. Topolewski testified that he was ready to sign the agreement but that Kopcik balked. Potas suggested that Topolewski think it over. On March 30 Denard Jr. telephoned Potas and said the Company was ready to sign. Potas immediately went to the Company's facility. Topolewski again stated that he changed his mind and wanted to go to an election. Potas returned to his office. About 1 p.m. Denardi again called and again said that they changed their minds, and Potas should return to the facility. Pitas immediately did so. They discussed the recognition agreement. Topolewski objected to the retroactivity clause. Potas agreed to strike it, which he did. They also discussed the bargaining unit. Topolewski said that some of the job classifications in the recognition clause were not accurate, e.g., the Company did not have any "apprentice mechanics" as such. Potas replied, and Topolewski agreed, that this was no problem because both parties understood that the agreement covered all shop employees, and excluded supervisors, sales, and office personnel. Topolewski testified that he did not consider the unit description to be a problem, and therefore did not request any change in the language.[3] Topolewski also told Potas that Davis Sr. was a foreman. Potas replied that they could resolve his status in the contract negotiations. Topolewski questioned Potas about the clause on "arbitrary action," saying that he wished to avoid such accusations. Potas advised Topolewski to document any disciplinary action. At the conclusion of their meeting the parties signed the recognition agreement, as modified to delete retroactivity.[4] In the meantime, on March 26, Topolewski discussed unionization with Cooper and Sype. Their conversation will be discussed in the next subsection of this decision.

At a union meeting on April 7, the employees elected Sype as steward and member of the negotiating committee, and Cooper as shop committeeman and alternate member of the negotiating committee. Thereafter, Sype attended negotiating sessions. Davis Sr. was present at the meeting, and Topolewski immediately learned of the election, although he was not then officially notified, and was not certain of the respective positions held by Cooper and Sype. the next day he asked Sype who informed him of their respective positions.

The Company and the Union next met on April 13. Potas brought a copy of a contract between the Union and an employer association, which he proposed as a basis for contract negotiations. Potas said he wanted the contract language, but they could discuss economics. Topolewski and Denardi Jr. objected to the wage and fringe benefit amounts, and said they did not understand the contract language, but agreed to read the contract. Potas explained the functions of the steward and committeeman, and they discussed minor matters (Potas questioned why the Company did not provide a pay phone and soap in the washroom). The parties agreed to meet next on April 15. Shortly before that meeting Denardi Jr. asked Potas to bring a copy of a contract between the Union and another employer (Cummins Michigan, Inc.), which Potas did. At the April 15 meeting the parties did not discuss contract proposals. However, they did discuss shop problems, and particularly as this concerned individual grievances. They discussed the fact that Ron Carter was paid less than the rate of his job. (The Carter problem will be considered later in connection with the complaint allegations of discriminatory conduct.) They discussed grievances pertaining to employees Brown and Pulkowski. They also discussed the matter of discipline. (The Company gave Cooper a written disciplinary warning on April 7 for absenteeism and another written warning on April 15.) Potas recommended a progressive disciplinary system. The Company did not say whether it had written shop rules, and that matter was not discussed. The parties next met on May 1. Topolewski was obviously preoccupied with another unrelated matter, and Potas suggested that they schedule another meeting. Again they did not discuss specific contract proposals. The Company never presented any specific proposals. There was some general discussion about seniority and job classifications. Potas testified that Topolewski and Denardi told him that Blue Cross-Blue Shield coverage was "gone by May 1 or it was about to be gone," the Company was negotiating with Blue Cross-Blue Shield for employee self-insurance, and was also looking for a cheaper policy, and the Company gave the employees a 50-cent-per-hour increase to help defray the cost of health insurance. Potas replied that the employees needed health insurance. Potas testified that this was the first notice the Company gave him concerning these changes, although he had recently heard rumors from the employees about these changes.

The parties next met, as scheduled, on May 14. In the meantime, the Company discharged Cooper on May 4, laid off Sype on May 5, and gave him two disciplinary notices and discharged him on May 14, and gave disciplinary notices to Ronald Carter on April 15 and 30 and to Stanley Marchelwicz on April 23. When the parties met, Pitas attempted to commence contract negotiations. Instead, the Company presented the Union with a copy of a petition dated May 8 from employee Robert Swigert to Potas, signed by seven employees (Carter, Klatzke, Davis Jr., Marchelwicz, Magee, Swigert, and Celani), stating that they no longer wished to be represented by the Union. Potas had not previously received the petition although he found the petition in his mail when he returned to the union hall that day. Topolewski said that in view of the petition he did not think that the Company was obligated to bargain. Potas disagreed and left. By letter dated May 18 the Union demanded a resumption of bargaining. Potas also telephoned the Company, but Topolewski said there was no change in the Company's position. On July 23, after the Union filed its charge in Case 7-CA-27039, and the Regional Director determined to issue a complaint, Denardi told Potas that because of the Board's preliminary determination the Company would resume negotiations. The parties met shortly thereafter. They discussed Cooper and Sype. Topolewski said he would close before taking them back. Potas sought to discuss a contract. They agreed on some lanuage in principle, but the Company did not submit any roposals. The parties did not meet again in negotiations.

[3] The alleged appropriate bargaining unit as stated in the complaint differs slightly in form, but without any substantive difference, from unit defined in the recognition agreement. At the hearing the parties stipulated that the unit described in the complaint covered all shop employees as of March 19.

[4] Topolewski testified that he thought they met and signed the agreement on March 31. However, Potas testified that they did so on March 30. The agreement is dated March 30. I credit Potas.

In its answers to the complaints, the Company denied at it entered into a legally valid recognition agreement ith the Union, that the Union was the representative of s shop employees, and that the union stated in the comlaint was an appropriate unit for collective bargaining. lowever, in its brief the Company does not dispute that validly recognized the Union on March 30. Rather, the ompany contends in sum that it was entitled to withraw recognition from the Union, on the basis of the lay 8 employee petition, because the Company allegedy had a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status, ased on objective factors. I find that a majority of the ompany's shop employees validly designated the Union s their collective-bargaining representative, that on larch 30 the Company entered into a lawful and binding agreement whereby it recognized the Union as represntative of its employees in a unit appropriate for colective bargaining, and that by reason of such recogniion, the Union was from March 30 until at least May 8 he exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit. It is undisputed that 10 of the 12 shop employees signed union authorization cards. The Company did not until May 14 question the Union's majority status. That status was not tainted by the presence of Supervisor Davis Sr. at early union meetings. Davis Sr. did not solicit any employee to sign cards; indeed, he was not even present when seven of the employees signed authorization cards. Davis Sr.'s presence at union meetings could not reasonably be viewed by the employees as coercive, or indicating management endorsement of the Union. The employees assumed that Davis Sr. was a nonsupervisory leadman, and he so represented himself at the first union meeting. As will be discussed, the employees knew all along that the Company was opposed to unionization. Therefore, the authorization cards were valid. Steward Sandwich Service, 260 NLRB 805, 808 (1982). The Company and the Union understood and agreed that the Company recognized the Union for a unit of all shop employees, i.e., excluding supervisors, sales, and office personnel. The Company questioned the Union's choice of language in describing the unit, but accepted and agreed to that language. All the shop employees performed functions described in the recognition agreement. Therefore, it was immaterial that the Company did not then employ "apprentice mechanics."

The General Counsel contends (Br. 8) that apart from (or addition to) the Company's obligation under the recognition agreement, the Union is entitled to a Gissel remedial bargaining order (NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 613-615 (1969)). The General Counsel argues that such offer would be effective from March 19, "at the outset of the [Company's] unlawful course of conduct." However, the first alleged unfair labor practice occurred on March 25. I shall defer this matter until after I have discussed the alleged unfair labor practices on which the General Counsel predicated her request.

B. Alleged Unlawful Interrogation and Promises of Benefit

Donald Cooper testified without contradiction that when he was initially hired by the Company (September 1985), Topolewski told him that he did not want a union and did not want to hire anybody who wanted a union. I credit Cooper, and I find that Topolewski's statement may properly be considered as background evidence in this case.

On March 25 or 26, after receiving the Union's request for recognition, Topolewski summoned employees Cooper and Sype to his office. Denardi Sr., Denardi Jr., and Kopcik were present. Until this time neither employee had informed management of their support for the Union. Cooper and Sype testified in sum as follows concerning the meeting: Topolewski asked why they were bringing in the Union, adding "am I that hard to work for?" The employees answered that they wanted job security, vacation time, air filters, a pay phone, and other improvements in working conditions. Denardi Jr. proceeded to do most of the talking. He said that the Company was having financial difficulties, and this was a bad time to have a union. Topolewski gave the employees a copy of the company financial statement. Denardi Jr. told them that the Company had considered an incentive program for engine builders, under which they would receive a bonus if they built more than two engines per week (Cooper and Sype were the only employees who worked regularly at engine building). The Company had not previously mentioned such a program. Denardi Jr. added that with a union coming in they might as well close the doors, there was no way they could financially make it. Cooper and Sype told other employees about this meeting. Topolewski, the Company's only witness, testified that after receiving the Union's request for recognition, he summoned Cooper and Sype to his office "to try to see what happened." Topolewski admitted that Davis Sr. told him that Cooper and Sype brought in the Union. In light of Topolewski's testimony, it is evident that he summoned the employees for the initial purpose of questioning them about the union organizational campaign. Topolewski testified in sum that he told the employees that he was not so bad an employer, that the Company was having financial difficulties, which he proceeded to explain, and he gave them a copy of the Company's latest financial statement. He testified that he told them he could bargain with the Union, but this would do no good if the Company could not pay for any agreed-on benefits. Topolewski testified that he did not otherwise discuss the Union. Topolewski did not testify concerning what, if anything, was said about an incentive program. He also did not testify concerning what, if anything, was said by Denardi Jr. or any of the other management officials present. As Denardi Jr. did most of the talking, Topolewski's testimony has limited evidentiary value.

I credit the testimony of Cooper and Sype as summarized above. In the context of the meeting, Denardi's suggestion of a bonus for engine builders constituted an implied promise of benefit to the two leading union adherents if they abandoned the Union. I further find that the Company, by Denardi, threatened the employees with plant closure if they continued to support the Union. Denardi Jr. did not make a prediction based on objective economic considerations related to specific union proposals. Rather he equated unionization with plant closure. As indicated, in the same conversation in which the Company pleaded poverty, Denardi Jr. proposed an incentive bonus as an alternative to unionization. As will be discussed, this was not the only instance in which the Company pleaded financial inability, while at the same time demonstrating its ability to provide employee benefits. In sum, the Company was demonstrating an example of the "fist inside the velvet glove." NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409 (1964). Although the complaint does not allege a threat of plant closure, the question of what transpired at the meeting was fully and fairly litigated, and Denardi's threat of plant closure was an intergral part of his remarks. I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by offering Cooper and Sype an incentive bonus plan if they abandoned their support for the Union and by threatening the employees with plant closure if they continued to support the Union.[5] I further find that Topolewski violated Section 8(a)(1) by coercively interrogating Cooper and Sype concerning their reasons for wanting a union. Topolewski had no legitimate reason for questioning the employees. He never questioned the Union's majority status. He interrogated the employees in an atmosphere of unnatural formality, specifically, in his office, where the employees were confronted by an array of top management. Topolewski did not give the employees any assurance against reprisals. On the contrary, he questioned the employees in the context of unlawful threats and promises of benefits, and against a background of employer hostility to unionization. During the same period of time whan Topolewski met with the employees he was equivocating about signing the recognition agreement. It is evident Topolewski was stalling to gain time to undermine the Union, and began his campaign by trying to pressure the leading union adherents into abandoning the Union. As will be discussed, when this tactic failed, the Company proceeded to the next step, namely, to apply pressure against all the employees.

C. Discontinuance of Health Insurance Benefits and Wage Increases to Employees

The complaint alleges that about April 30, the Company discontinued paying health insurance premiums for the unit employees, that about May 4 the Company granted the unit employees a wage increase, that the Company took those actions without prior notice to the Union and without affording the Union a meaningful opportunity to negotiate and bargain about the changes, and that the Company thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

The Company's personnel including the unit employees were covered by a Blue Cross-Blue Shield health insurance plan under which the Company and the employees each contributed a portion of the premiums. On March 25 or 26, shortly after meeting with Cooper and Sype, Topolewski assembled a meeting of all employees. Topoloweski and Denardi Jr. informed the employees that the Company was behind in premium payments, that the Company could not afford to pay the premiums, and therefore that the policy was being canceled. They said that the employees would have to get their insurance through the Union. This was the first notice given to the employees of such cancellation. Nothing was said at this time about a wage increase. Friday, March 27, was a payday. The employee's paychecks were accompanied by a notice from management to "all employees," dated March 27, the text of which stated as follows:

> Due to our inability to pay the Blue Cross-Blue Shield payment we are forced to let the policy lapse.
> Blue Cross will contact you individualy [sic] to see if you want to continue it personally.
> To help defer the added personal expense starting April 1, 1987, all hourly pays will be increased by $.50 per hour.
> I sincerely regret being forced to do this but it has become economically impossible to continue.

The announced wage increase was sufficient to compensate single employees for lost employer contribution, but was not sufficient to compensate for lost family coverage.

In fact, that Company never canceled health insurance coverage. Rather the Company permitted the Blue Cross-Blue Shield policy to lapse for nonpayment of premiums, effective as of May 1, i.e., more than a month after its announcement. The Company long had a policy of waiting until the last possible moment to forward premium payments. As a result the Company was always delinquent in premiums payments, and on at least two occasions was given notice of "cancellation" by the insurer. The Company did this, not because of inability to pay, but to maximize use and profit from its own funds and the employees' contributions. Thus, every time the Company was threatened with a notice of cancellation of policy, it would pay in as much as necessary to become current, the policy would remain in effect, and the Company would resume its delinquent ways. The Company received notice of cancellation from the insurers in November 1986 and again by notice dated March 16, effective as of February 1. However, the policy did not lapse on either occasion. It is undisputed that the insurer submitted statements which indicated that the policy was paid up through March, the employees were covered through April, and that the insurers billed the Company for premiums for the month of April. The Company used similiar tactics in connection with the announced pay increase. Donald Cooper testified that he did not receive the 50-cent-per-hour increase until the third payday in April (April 17). Topolewski in his testimony admitted that he did not grant all employees a wage increase as of

[5] The Company argues (Br. 24-25) that it did not violate the Act because it never implemented the incentive bonus plan. The argument is without merit. Sec. 8(a)(1) prohibits both promises and grants of benefits to discourage unionization just as it prohibits both threats and retaliatory actions for that purpose.

April 1, either then or retroactively. Topolewski testified in sum that with respect to employees who had family coverage, he withheld the amount of the wage increase as a fund for payment of premiums they decided to renew coverage. When some employees did not renew coverage on an individual basis, the Company gave some of the money to the employees and paid the rest to the insurer.

I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by unilaterally discontinuing payment of health insurance premiums for the unit employees, and unilaterally granting the unit employees a wage increase. The Company independently violated Section 8(a)(1) by discontinuing payment of premiums because that action was discriminatorily motivated. The Company used its March 27 announcement as a club over the employees' heads. The Company did not act on its announcement. However, when the employees failed to abandon the Union, the Company retaliated by permitting the policy to lapse. Therefore the Company violated Section 8(a)(1), regardless of its bargaining obligations. Moreover, as found, the Company discontinued paying health insurance premiums and effectuated a wage increase after March 30. The Company did so unilaterally, without giving prior notice to the Union and without offering the Union a meaningful opportunity to negotiate and bargain about the changes. Instead, the Company falsely led the Union to believe that these changes were implemented prior to the recognition agreement. The Company did not even offer the Union, after the fact, an opportunity to negotiate about the changes. Instead, before the parties had an opportunity to engage in an indepth discussion of substantive matters, the Company discontinued bargaining. Therefore the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by unilaterally discontinuing payment of health insurance premiums and by granting the employees a 50-cent-per-hour wage increase. If the Union is entitled to a remedial bargaining order under Gissel, then it would follow that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) even if the changes were initiated on March 27 because the Company's bargaining obligation would commence from March 25 or 26, when it began engaging in unfair labor practice conduct.

D. Written Reprimands to Cooper, Sype, and Other Employees, Discharge of Cooper, and Layoff and Discharge of Sype

The complaint alleges that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by engaging in the following discriminatory actions: issuing written reprimands to Donald Cooper about April 5 and 15; presenting Pete Sype with a written reprimand about May 13; discharging Cooper about May 4; laying off Sype about May 5, and discharging him about May 15; and since about April 1, engaging in a retaliatory campaign against unit employees by issuing an increased number of written reprimands through various supervisors. As the evidence concerning these allegations is interrelated, I shall deal with them together.

On April 7 the Company issued the following written warning to Cooper:

> Subject: Absenteesim
> As you well know, in the last couple of months you have missed a number of days due to illness. These missed days for the most part have been documented by Doctors excuses.
> However, upon making an inquiry with your Doctor concerning your last excuse on 4/6/87, we discovered that he simply diagnosed you over the phone. Later that day your wife picked up your written excuse, which stated you were totally incapacitated with gastrointestinal flu, all of which he concludes without you being present.
> It is our contention that this excuse and the past excuses from this Doctor are not valid. American Fleet Maintenance is forwarding our complaint to the Doctor and the Licensing Board of Lansing.
> Any further disciplinary action may result in your dismissal.

On April 15 the Company issued another written warning to Cooper, which read as follows:

> Subject: Poor Workmanship
> Upon dyno testing Engine #6VA-JD6774 it was discovered that (2) two of the oil pump bolts were left out. As you know this causes the engine to leak oil, as well as a delay in turn-around time for that unit. Obvious errors of this nature must cease.

The Company terminated Cooper on May 4, giving him the following written notice:

> Subject: Termination
> Due to excessive and constant absenteeism we are forced to terminate your employment immediately.
> When employees are not on the job it seriously hampers production.

Topolewski testified that he terminated Cooper because he did not show up for work for 3 days. Topolewski denigrated the quality of Cooper's work performance, testifying that Cooper was "a good repairman," but could not really be considered an "engine rebuilder" because he could not "rebuild or remanufacture component parts." Just what Topolewski meant is not clear because only Topolewski and Kopcik normally remanufactured component parts as such, i.e., in the machine shop. Topolewski testified that Pete Sype also could not rebuild component parts. However, he admitted that he simply meant that Sype took too much time to rebuild a supercharger (which was normally Ronald Carter's work). However, Topolewski admitted that Cooper was told only that he was discharged for absenteeism, and Topolewski did not claim that he discharged Cooper for any other reason. He did not claim to know why Cooper was absent. However, the Company, in its cross-examination of Cooper, suggested that it has something to do with the fact that Cooper performed repair work out of his home.

Cooper began working for the Company in September 1985. He quit in March 1986, and was rehired in November 1986. He testified without contradiction that prior to April 7 he had never been given a written disciplinary notice of any kind, and that he was never given a disciplinary suspension. Cooper further testified that on every occasion, except one, when he was absent from work, the absence was caused by illness and that on each such occasion he presented a doctor's certificate. He testified that the one other occasion occurred in November 1986, shortly after he returned to work for the Company. Denardi Jr. gave him permission to be absent for 3 days to go deer hunting, as planned by Cooper before he returned to work. Denardi was present at this hearing, but was not called to testify. In the absence of Denardi's testimony, or that of any other actual or potential company witness, the assertion in the April 7 disciplinary notice that Cooper's absences due to illness, "for the most part have been documented by doctor excuses," is uncorroborated hearsay. I credit Cooper. I find that Cooper's absences due to illness were always documented by a doctor's certificate, and that Topolewski knew this to be the case.

With regard to the April 7 warning Cooper testified that on April 6 he was ill with a respiratory infection. Cooper testified in sum that in February he began doing repair work in his garage and yard, and that outside work the night before may have aggravated a cold, but that he did not stay home to work. He did not visit a doctor, but he telephoned a doctor and his wife picked up the doctor's certificate. The next day Cooper brought the certificate to work. Topolewski asked Cooper whether he had gone to the doctor. Cooper falsely answered that he had. Topolewski did not accept the answer. Instead, he called the doctor and learned that Cooper had not visited him. Topolewski then issued the warning notice, and filed a complaint against the doctor. Topolewski admitted in his testimony that this was the only time he questioned a doctor's ceteificate. He testified that he did so because he learned that Cooper was working at home, and that as a result of the April 6 incident he assumed that Cooper has lied about being sick on prior occasions. Cooper testified without contradiction that he was never before told that he had to personally visit a doctor to have his excuse accepted as valid. Cooper was next absent for 3 days beginning Monday, April 27 (he was not scheduled to work for the balance of that week). Cooper testified that he was sick with a stomach flu. This time Cooper visited a doctor and personally obtained a certificate. He reported to work on Monday, May 4, and found that his timecard had been pulled from the rack. He went to Topolewski, who told him that "he just couldn't put up with this anymore." Topolewski did not accept or even look at the doctor's certificate.

If Topoloweski issued the April 7 warning and discharged Cooper because of absenteeism, his action would be inconsistent with the Company's usual policy and practices in two important aspects. First, the Company had a progressive disciplinary practice for absenteeism which predated the Union's organization campaign. The General Counsel presented in evidence a three-page document addressed from Topolewski, to "All Employees," captioned "Shop Rules Restated." With respect to "Absenteeism," the document stated as follows:

> ABSENTEEISM
> A. First offense—Written warning
> B. Second offense—Day off
> C. Third offense—3 days off
> D. Fourth offense—Misconduct, subject to discharge. Bonafide sickness with doctors slip is excuseable. Without doctors slip is unexcused and subject to absenteeism remedies.
> 2 days off without notification considered voluntary quit.
> Any time off during 1st 30 days is subject to immediate discharge.
> 3 lates in 90 days is subject to review and possible discharge.

Topolewski testified that the Company has written work rules, including the above rules on absenteeism, until the end of 1985, which were used only at the East Warren facility. He testified that they were not "really" distributed, but posted on a bulletin board. However, he testified that the rules were posted at East Warren and Meyers. He further testified that after his attorney advised him to discontinue using the rules, he told his supervisor not to distribute them "anymore." If the rules had been posted and never distributed, there would have been no need to give such an instruction. The rules as presented in evidence by the General Counsel were headed with the Meyers' address. Pete Sype testified that when he began working for the Company in April 1986, then-foreman John Denardi gave him a copy of the rules, and he was never told they were no longer in effect. Employee Walter Klatzke testified that when he was rehired by the Company in May 1986, Denardi Jr. gave him a copy of the rules, he was never told they were no longer in effect and, to his knowledge, the rules were being distributed as late as January 1987. Cooper also testified that he was given a copy of the rules when he was hired. In the absence of any testimony by Denardi Jr., Klazke's testimony stands unrefuted. According to Topolewski, he discontinued using the rules after his attorney advised him they were ineffective. In fact, as Topolewski admitted, he had a very good reason for using a progressive disciplinary system for absenteeism. Topolewski testified that he instituted this system because of disputed claims for unemployment compensation "so that I could cover myself if I had a problem down the road." Thus it is not surprising that after Cooper was discharged, and Sype protested that Topolewski had violated his own rules by not following the disciplinary procedure, Topolewski answered that he had "already been to court on that once" and "wasn't worried about it." In essence, Topolewski was boasting that he was covered because he had reduced his action to writing.

Second, as the Company's own rules indicate, the Company treated "bona-fide sickness with doctors slip" as an excusable absence not subject to discipline. The rule did not require that the employee personally visit the doctor for the slip to be acceptable. Thus, under the Company's own rules, neither of Cooper's absences in April warranted any disciplinary action. Therefore, the reasons given by Topolewski for both the April 7 warning and Cooper's discharge were demonstrably pretextual. This is graphically demonstrated by a written notice that the Company gave to employee Stanley Marchelwicz on April 23. The text of the notice was as follows:

> Subject: Absenteeism
> On March 21st and 22nd you were not at work due to an illness for which you called in. By calling in you had followed proper procedure. But, in the future when you are out sick, upon returning you must furnish the Company with a Doctor's excuse in order for the missed day or days to be considered an excused absence.

Topolewski, in his testimony, professed to be unable to explain why the Company took over a month to give a warning to Marchelwicz. It is evident from the warning that the Company did not even enforce its requirement of a doctor's slip, let alone require a visit to the doctor. However, after discharging Cooper, the Company belatedly issued a warning to Marchelwicz to bolster its pretext for Cooper's termination.

At the hearing evidence was presented concerning the work and attendance record of employees Ronald Carter, in part as a basis from comparison with Cooper. Carter began working for the Company in 1981, and quit shortly before the present hearing. It is undisputed that Carter had an atrocious attendance record. Carter's personnel file contained a string of written warnings dating back to 1984. Most concerned absenteeism and tardiness, although several were for substandard work. Some warnings for absenteeism indicated that Carter would be discharged for the next offense. As Topolewski put it, Carter was "fired and rehired several times." There were no doctors to call. Carter "had his grandmother and grandfather die seven or eight times each." However, Topolewski testified that he was lenient with Carter because he was a longtime employee and the least dispensible employee, e.g., the only one who could satisfactorily rebuild a supercharger. At one point Topolewski was prepared to really discharge Carter. Instead they struck a deal. Carter agreed to take a pay cut from $9 to $7 per hour. However, he would get $9 per hour for any week in which he had perfect attendance. Between July 21, 1986, and April 15, 1987, Carter did not receive any written warnings. That day, when the Company and the Union met, the Union questioned Carter's rate of pay, and Topolewski explained their arrangement. That same day, and again on April 30, the Company gave Carter written warnings for absenteeism, each of which threatened discharge for future offenses. On July 27, shortly after the Regional Director issued the first complaint in this case and the Company and the Union met again, the Company gave Carter another written warning, this time for tardiness, and threatening discharge for the next instance of absence of tardiness. In view of the wage arrangement between Topolewski and Carter which resolved the matter of his attendance, the Company had no legitimate reason to issue written warnings to him. Rather, the timing of the actions and the context in which they occurred, including the Company's other unlawful actions calculated to undermine the Union, indicate that the Company was using these warning notices as a means of pressuring Carter and other employees to abandon or withhold support from the Union (Carter signed the May 8 antiunion petition).

At this point, I shall return to the circumstances of Cooper's termination. Topolewski testified in sum that on May 4 the Company was behind schedule in production for the city of Detroit, and had been so for several months, that this could cost the company substantial penalties, and that by his absence Cooper cut the company production of engines in half. However, the next day (May 5), the Company laid off Pete Sype. Topolewski testified that he laid off Sype because of "lack of money and work." The Company thereby almost simultaneously removed from its shop the only two employees who regularly worked at engine rebuilding. Topolewski's explanations for terminating Cooper and laying off Sype are mutually inconsistent. If the Company were so busy and behind schedule as described by Topolweski, than it would make no sense to remove both engine rebuilders from the shop. In an effort to bolster his explanation for laying off Sype, Topolewski testified that he had only 92 series Detroit diesel engines to be worked, and Sype had only worked on 71 series Detroit diesel engines. The difference in numbers designated reflects the number of cubic inches per cylinder. However, Sype testified that on May 5 there were 71 series engine blocks in the shop, which indicated that they were there for engine rebuilding. Moreover, although Sype had not worked on 92 engines in the shop, he was trained and qualified to perform such work. Therefore, it would have been a simple matter to give Sype such on-the-job instruction as were necessary to enable him to work on 92 series engines. Topolewski testified that after Cooper and Sype were gone, he assigned Stantley Marchelwicz, among others (including supervisory personnel) to rebuild the engines. Topolewski initially testified that besides Cooper and Sype, only himself, Denardi Jr., Davis Sr., and Carter were qualified to rebuild engines. However, Topolewski subsequently testified that Marchelwicz was an engine rebuilder. In fact, as previously indicated, Marchelwicz worked at teardown and inspection. It is evident that Marchelwicz was less qualified to rebuild engines than either Cooper or Sype, whether 71 or 92 series. I find that the Company's professed reason for laying off Sype was pretextual. Topolewski's action becomes understandable when one considers that by discharging Cooper and laying off Sype, Topolewski removed the two leading union adherents from the shop, and thereby demonstrated to the remaining employees the length to which he would go to break the Union.

To sum up at this point, I find, in light of the Company's hostility toward unionization, including its expressed policy of not wanting union adherents, the timing of the action taken against Cooper and Sype, the Company's increasingly severe campaign of unlawful conduct designed to undermine the Union, and the demonstrably prextextual reasons for its actions, that the Company issued the April 7 warning to Cooper, discharged Cooper, and laid off Sype because of their leading role in supporting the Union. The Company therefore violated

Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. I further find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by issuing warning notices to Carter to pressure him to abandon his support for the Union, and by giving Marchelwicz a warning notice to conceal the ture reason for discharging Cooper. "In cases where an employer terminates an employee as part of an effort to camouflage the discriminatory discharge of a known union activist, the Board has held that all that is required is finding that the discharge of the one was undertaken in an attempt to validate or support the discharge of the other." L. C. Cassidy & Son, 272 NLRB 123, 131 (1984), and cases cited. It follows that lesser discipline for the same purpose would also be unlawful. Concerning all these matters, for the reasons discussed above, the General Counsel presented a prima facie case that the Company engaged in such actions because of protected employee union activity, and the Company failed to meet its burden of establishing that it would have engaged in such conduct in the absence of pretextual activity. Further, I find the discriminatory actions against Cooper, Sype, and other employees discussed above may properly be considered as evidence of the Company's motivation for the remaining actions against Cooper and Sype.

As indicated, the complaint alleges that since on or about April 1, the Company discriminatorily issued an increased number of written reprimands to unit employees. In addition to the reprimands discussed above (all were found unlawful) and the April 15 warning to Cooper, and warnings issued to Sype (which will be discussed), the company personnel records presented in evidence indicate only one other use of written discipline since April 1. That was the discharge of Charles Brown on April 15, assertedly for unexcused absence (not for illness). In January prior to the union campaign, Brown was given a 2-day suspension for loafing on the job after being verbally warned. April 15 was a day marked by discussion between the Company and the Union concerning the problems of individual employees, including Brown. (Brown had been returned to janitorial work with reduction in pay, after an unsuccessful try at engine teardown.) April 15 was also marked by company disciplinary action against employees whose individual concerns were discussed that day (Carter, Brown, and Cooper). The complaint does not allege that Brown was unlawfully terminated, and the General Counsel does not discuss the matter in her brief. I find that Brown's discharge was not litigated in this case and, therefore, I am making no findings whether the action taken against him was lawful.

Before returning to the April 15 warning to Cooper, I shall discuss the Company's next actions against Sype. He was never recalled to work. On May 15 Sype went to the plant to attend the negotiation session. The next day he went to pick up his vacation paycheck and was summoned to the office where Topolewski and Denardi Jr. handed him two disciplinary notices. The first, dated May 9, read as follows:

> On May 6, 1987 Engine #6VA-49347 was put on the dyno. After approximately on (1) hour the unit would not pull any oil, upon tear down it was discovered that the oil pump was not packed with lube for initial start. This cost American Fleet Maintenance 1/2 day for 2 men to R&R unit. This is not consistent [sic] with proper work standards.
> Any further work quality problems may result in you [sic] dismissal.

The second, dated May 14, read as follows:

> On May 8, 1987, Unit #6VA-88471 would not draw oil. Upon inspection it was not that the oil pump was not packed, this caused 1/2 day for 2 men to repair this problem.
> On May 6, 1987, in the afternoon same engine would not start. Cause timing. Upon tear down it was found that there were two timing marks on crank gear and wrong marks used, even though we had studied this same problem 2 week porior [sic] you still did not check your work. This caused 25 man hours to correct.
> Due to your disregard of work quality your services are no longer required.

There was no discussion at that time of either notice, although Topolewski had mentioned the crank gear at the negotiating session. As indicated, Sype did not work after May 5. The Company never asked Sype about any of the matters, or invited him to examine or explain any of the alleged problems.

On the basis of Topolewski's own testimony, the discharge notice was demonstrably false, at least insofar as the first paragraph suggested that Sype had done something wrong. Topolewski testified in sum that the notice was true, including the dates and order in which the events occurred. Topolewski testified in sum as follows: Ron Carter told him that the motor would not start. Topolewski concluded that one of three things must be missing, namely, air, fuel, or compression. He knew that the motor had air and fuel. However, if the oil timing was off, there would be no compression. Topolewski described the correction process as follows:

> Q. So what was involved in correcting the problem?
> A. Oh, you have to remove the unit from the dyno, remove the bell housing, you have to remove the oil pan, you have to remove the fall wheel, you have to remove the fall wheel housing, you have to get into gear. It's quite a lengthy job. You have to return racks, tune-up, everything. It's about a major a thing you could do short or rebuilting the motor.

If as indicated in the discharge notice, all this occurred on May 6, then plainly Sype could not be responsible if on May 8, after reassembly, the oil pump was not packed with lube. (This assumes that the pump was required to be packed with lube, a matter which is in dispute.) Rather, the fault would have been that of the person or persons who dismantled and reassembled the engine.

The false assertion contained in the discharge notice also casts doubt on Topolewski's assertion that the oil pump had to be packed with lube. Cooper and Sype testified in sum that the Company never instructed them to pack the oil pump with lube, and that such procedure was not necessary to draw or pump oil. In support of their testimony, the General Counsel presented in evidence a Detroit diesel manual that was made available by the Company to the shop personnel. The manual in pertinent part described the procedure for installation of the oil pump for Detroit diesel V-71 engine. The manual did not indicate that the pump had to be packed with lube. Sype testified that he referrd to the manual to resolve questions. Sype testified that, as indicated by the manual, they applied a light film of oil, but that this was not the same as packing the pump with lube, which is a heavier oil. Topolewski testified that the employees were required to pack the pump with a special lubricant designed for engine assembly, which was similar to heavy oil, and that this procedure was necessary to prevent a dry start, which could ruin the motor. Topolewski testified that the manual was not applicable because it was "more geared to the field repair" of engines rather than the Compnay's work of completely rebuilding engines. Topolewski also testified that the pumps on which the Company worked operated differently from those described in the manual. If so, then these distinctions would apply to all the engines on which Sype worked. If Topolewski were correct, then it is difficult to see why the Company would provide its personnel with a manual which was inapplicable to the Company's operations and therefore misleading. If this matter were all that was involved in the present case, then I would have greater difficulty in resolving the credibility question presented between the uncorroborated testimony of Topolewski and the testimony of Cooper and Sype, which is corroborated by the manual. However, as discussed, the evidence in the present case indicates that Topolewski was discriminatorily motivated toward Cooper and Sype because of their union activity and was looking for pretextual reasons to remove them from the shop. As also indicated, Topolewski's testimony was demonstrably not credible in several respects. I have no comparable reason to question the credibility of the employees. I credit Cooper and Sype. Therefore, it follows that the Company's professed reason for the disciplinary warning dated May 9 was false, and that the first paragraph of the termination notice was, for this additional reason, also false.

With respect to Sype, this leaves only the second paragraph of the discharge notice, i.e., the allegation that Sype used the wrong timing mark on the crank gear. The evidence indicates that this type of problem was unusual and difficult to avoid. A crank gear should normally have only one timing mark. Sometimes a crank gear had two timing marks, or a second mark that looked like a timing mark. These marks were small and difficult to locate and identify. In early March Donald Cooper had a problem with double marks. A crank gear had double marks, and he did not seee the second mark. When the gear was set in place, it put the engine out of time, and the engine did not run properly. As a result the engine had to be removed from the dynomometer (where it was being tested), and partially dismantled. After Cooper located the problem, he reassembled the engine, including the crank gear. Cooper was not warned verbally or in writing or given any other discipline as a result of this incident. He was simply told to pay more attention. Topolewski testified that he took no disciplinary action because: "You know, people are human. Mistakes do happen." Sype had no record of making such a mistake. Prior to the day of his termination he had never been given any written warning for poor workmanship or any other reason. Testimony and the Company's records fail to indicate that the Company ever discharged an employee solely for poor workmanship. As indicated, the Company simply demoted Charles Brown when it became apparent that he was not qualified to perform the work to which he was assigned. With respect to the problem of double timing marks, Topolewski initially testified that the solution was to index to gear by making a center punch mark to locate the correct position. Later he testified that the proper procedure was to discard the crank gear with double marks and get one with one mark. If Topolewski was confused about how to deal with this problem, then it is unlikely that, absent a discriminatory motive, he would write up or discharge an employee for dealing with the problem in the wrong way, when the employees had no prior record of making such a mistake. Sype testified that he had no recollection of double timing mark on the crank gear referred to in his termination notice. As indicated, Sype was not confronted with this matter until 10 days after he had last worked on the engine. Even if the problem developed as described, which is questionable, I find that the Company has failed to meet its burden of establishing that Sype would have even been disciplined, let alone discharged, in the absence of Sype's union activities. As the General Counsel presented a prima facie case that the Company acted against Sype because of the union activity, I find that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by issuing written warnings to Sype and by discharging him.

The remaining alleged 8(a)(3) violation is the April 15 warning to Cooper, alleging that oil leaked from an engine because two oil pump bolts were left out. There are 8 bolts that connect the oil pump to the engine, and a total of 14 bolts on the pump housing. There are two additional bolts that are used to connect the engine to the dynomometer. However, if these were not attached securely, the engine would not be secured to the dynomometer. Cooper was not shown the alleged problem, and he was not told which bolts were missing or when oil leaked (if it did). Topolewski testified that Ronald Carter, who was operating the dynomometer, told him about the problem (although Robert Swigert normally operated the engine dynomometer). Therefore, Topolewski's testimony substantially consists of hearsay. In the absence of any testimony by Carter, I am not persuaded that the Company has presented credible evidence concerning what, if anything, happened. As indicated, I have ample reason to question Topolewski's credibility. As found, the Company was looking for a pretext to get rid of Cooper, and shortly thereafter discharged him because of his union activity. I find that the Company issued the written warning of April 15 to Cooper because of his union activity, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

E. Withdrawal of Recognition and Refusal to Bargain with the Union

Under present Board law, a union that is lawfully recognized by the employer but not certified by the Board is conclusively presumed to have majority status for a reasonable period of time from the date of recognition. After that reasonable period of time expires, the union enjoys a rebuttable presumption of majority status, which can be overcome by the employer demonstrating that the union in fact does not have a majority representative status, or that the employer has a reasonably grounded doubt concerning the union's majority status, asserted in good faith, based on objective considerations, and raised in a context free of employer unfair labor practices. Tajon, Inc., 269 NLRB 327 (1984); Terrell Machine Co., 173 NLRB 1480, 1480–1481 (1969), enfd. 427 F.2d 1088 (4th Cir. 1970); Hotel & Restaurant Employees of Pocatello, 213 NLRB 651 (1974).

In the present case, as found, the Company lawfully and voluntarily recognized the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in an appropoate unit. The Company contends (Br. 18–20) that it had a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status, based on the May 8 petition and, therefore, was privileged to withdraw recognition and discontinue bargaining with the Union. The argument fails because the Company did not have a good-faith doubt. Rather, the Company withdrew recognition in the context of flagrant unfair labor practices that were calculated to undermine the Union's majority status. Even if the Company had not engaged in such unlawful conduct, the withdrawal of recognition would be premature because a reasonable point of time had not elapsed. "Absent a reasonable period of time for bargaining following recognition, the actual majority status of a union is immaterial. . . . [R]easonable time does not depend upon either the passage of time or the number of calender days on which the parties met. Rather, the issue turns on what transpired during those meetings and what was accomplished therein. . . . the test is what was accomplished at the meetings that were held." Tajon, Inc., supra, 269 NLRB at 327–328. Measured by these standards, a reasonable period of time did not elapse. The parties never reached the point of serious and substantial discussion of contract provisions. That failure was caused primarily by the Company's delaying tactics repeated requests for sample contracts, and failure to submit any contract proposals. The Company did not remedy its unlawful conduct by agreeing to meet once with the Union after the first complaint was issued in this case. Indeed, the Company does not contend that this meeting constituted a resumption of recognition and bargaining. Therefore, a bargaining order is warranted. Having made such determination, I find it necessary to decide whether, in the absence of the recognition agreement, the Union would be entitled to a remedial order under the principles of NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., supra.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time diesel, automotive, journeymen and apprentice mechanics, leadmen, general maintenance, stockroom clerks, parts pickupmen, helpers, and porters employed by the Company at its Detroit, Michigan facility, excluding all office clerical employees, salesmen, truckdrivers, dock and warehousemen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act constitute a unit approptiate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since March 30, 1987, the Union has been and is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Company's employees in the unit described above.

5. By failing and refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union as the representative of the employees in the appropriate unit, and by unilaterally changing terms and conditions of employment without prior notice to the Union and without affording the Union a meaningful opportunity to negotiate and bargain concerning such changes, the Company has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By discharging in regard to the terms, conditions, and tenure of employment of Donald Cooper and Pete Sype, and the terms and conditions of employment of Ronald Carter and Stanley Marchelwicz, thereby discouraging membership in the Union, the Company has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

7. By interfering with, restraining, and coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act, the Company has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Company has committed violations of Section 8(a)(1) (3), and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. I shall recommend that the Company be ordered to recognize and on request bargain with the Union as the bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit. Having found that the Company discriminatorily terminated Donald Cooper and Pete Sype, I am recommending that the Company be ordered to offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exists, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and benefits that they may have suffered from the time of their terminations to the date of the Company's offer of reinstatement, with interest. I shall also recommend that the Company be ordered to remove from its records any reference to the unlawful terminations of Cooper and Sype, and the unlawful written reprimands to Cooper, Sype, Carter, and Marchelwicz, to give each of them written notices of such removal, and to inform them that this unlawful conduct will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them. See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982). Backpay shall be computed in accordance with the formula approved in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950).

I am further recommending that the Company be ordered to reinstate Blue Cross-Blue Shield group health insurance for the union employees, and reimburse those employees for any medical or dental bills they have paid to health care providers that the policy would have covered, and for any premiums they may have paid to continue medical and dental coverage in the absence of the Company's required contributions, less the amount of the 50-percent-per-hour wage increase that the Company granted the employees to compensate for the loss of such coverage; such reimbursement to be with interest. Interest on backpay and reimbursement shall be as computed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[6] It is also recommended that the Company be required to preserve and make available to the Board, or its agents, on request, payroll and other records to facilitate the compution of backpay due.

I further find that the unfair labor practices in this case, which include flagrant and serious violations of three sections of the Act which were directed and committed at the highest level of management, demonstrate that the Company has a general disregard or hostility for the Act. Therefore, I am recommending that the Company be ordered to cease and desist from infringing in any manner on the rights guaranteed the employees by Section 7 of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Babson and Cracraft

On May 14 and November 18, 1987, Administrative Law Judge James L. Rose issued the attached decision and supplemental decision,[2] respectively. The Respondents filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief and cross-exceptions[3] with a supporting brief. Respondent Capitol Transit filed an answering brief to the General Counsel's cross-exceptions. Following the issuance of the judge's supplemental decision, Respondent Capitol Transit filed a reaffirmation of its exceptions to the judge's initial decision and exceptions to the supplemental decision. The General Counsel filed an answering brief and a motion to strike a portion of Respondent Capitol Transit's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision, the supplemental decision, and the record in light of the exceptions[4] and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[5] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified and set forth in full below.[6]

1. We agree with the judge that Respondent Transcontinental Leasing violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act when it applied its collective-bargaining agreement with the United Labor Associates International to former Capitol Transit drivers and required them to sign applications for membership in ULAI and dues-checkoff authorizations. We find merit in the General Counsel's cross-exception and find that Transcontinental Leasing's conduct also violated Section 8(a)(3) because the collective-bargaining agreement contained a union-security clause. Safeway Stores, 276 NLRB 944 (1985). Further, by telling the Capitol Transit drivers that they must sign the membership application and dues-checkoff authorizations if they wanted to continue to work, we find that Transcontinental Leasing violated Section 8(a)(1).

2. The General Counsel cross-excepts to the judge's failure to find that Respondent Capitol Transit created the impression of surveillance of employees' union activity. The General Counsel alleges that Respondent Capitol Transit violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by stating that it was aware

[1] On November 2, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] By unpublished Order dated September 18, 1987, the Board remanded the case to the judge to make a credibility resolution regarding testimony related to the issue whether Respondent Capitol Transit had knowledge of union activity prior to its decision to enter into a leasing agreement and terminate its bargaining unit employees.

[3] The General Counsel seeks, inter alia, a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondents under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such an order. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[4] The General Counsel's motion to strike a portion of Respondent Capitol Transit's exceptions is denied.

[5] Respondent Capitol Transit has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We have also reviewed the record and find no merit in Respondent Capitol Transit's argument that the judge demonstrated antiemployer bias.

We agree with the judge's conclusion that Cusmano's and Vitello's interrogation of employees regarding whether they signed union authorization cards violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. Those interrogations were initiated by Cusmano and Vitello (the owners of Capitol Transit) during the organizing campaign, were directed at employees who had not declared their union sentiments, and were accompanied, on at least two occasions, by the threat that employees would "all be walking" if they pursued the "matter."

The General Counsel cross-excepts to the judge's failure to find that Vitello also interrogated employee Earl Cathey on two occasions about his union activities. Because we find this allegation cumulative, we find it unnecessary to reach the issue whether Vitello unlawfully interrogated Cathey.

[6] In par. 1(d) of the recommended Order against Respondent Capitol Transit, the judge used the broad cease-and-desist language "in any other manner." We have considered this case in light of the standards set forth in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), however, and have concluded that a broad remedial order is inappropriate inasmuch as it has not been shown that Respondent Capitol Transit has a proclivity to violate the Act or has engaged in such egregious or widespread misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights.

The judge also found that unfair labor practices committed by Respondent Capitol Transit were sufficiently egregious to support a bargaining order. In light of our reversal of the judge's finding that Respondent Capitol Transit violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act when it executed a leasing agreement and thereby terminated the bargaining unit employees, we find that a bargaining order is inappropriate. We will issue an order in lieu of the judge's recommended Order eliminating both the broad cease-and-desist language and the bargaining order.

In par. 2(a) of his recommended Order against Respondent Transcontinental Leasing the judge ordered the deletion of certain portions of Respondent Transcontinental Leasing's collective-bargaining agreement with United Labor Associates International. Under the circumstances of this case we find a deletion of any language in the collective-bargaining agreement unnecessary, and shall modify the Order accordingly.

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

who was passing out authorization cards. We find merit in the General Counsel's cross-exception. Employee Brad Burton testified that when he met with Vitello to discuss a problem with Vitello's son, Vitello told Burton that Burton's brother was passing out union cards and that if they kept pursuing the matter of signing authorization cards "you'll all be walking." The judge credited Burton's testimony that Vitello told him "you'll all be walking" and found that Vitello had made a clear threat that employees would be terminated for engaging in protected activity. However, the judge did not mention Burton's testimony regarding Vitello's statement during the same conversation that Burton's brother was passing out authorization cards. We find that the judge overlooked Burton's testimony regarding the passing out of authorization cards when he stated that the record offered no factual support for the surveillance allegation of the complaint. We further note that, while denying that he made any threats to Burton, Vitello testified that he asked Burton if his brother ever gave him a union card to sign. Relying on Burton's credited and uncontroverted testimony, we find that Respondent Capitol Transit created the impression of surveillance in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when Vitello advised Burton that Burton's brother was passing out union cards. Although the complaint alleged that this incident constituted unlawful surveillance, rather than impression of surveillance, it is well settled that "[a] variance between complaint and findings will not defeat a Board determination where the issue on which the findings were based was fully litigated." REA Trucking Co. v. NLRB, 439 F.2d 1065, 1066 (9th Cir. 1971).

3. We disagree with the judge's finding that Respondent Capitol Transit violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by changing its operation from one utilizing employee-drivers to one leasing drivers from another company in response to its employees' union campaign. A union organizational campaign among Capitol Transit's approximately 46 truckdrivers began in mid-August 1986.[7] On September 2 Capitol Transit executed a leasing agreement with Transcontinental Leasing, to become effective September 15, that provided for Transcontinental Leasing to furnish employees to do the hauling of freight and commodities for Capitol Transit. The effect of the leasing agreement was the termination of the entire bargaining unit at Capitol Transit.

Charles Garavaglia, Respondent Transcontinental Leasing's labor consultant, testified that on July 17 he met with Joseph Vitello, co-owner of Capitol Transit, at Vitello's office to discuss labor consultant work. In response to Vitello's major complaint that he could no longer devote time to trucking because he was spending all his time in administrative work, Garavaglia stated that he proposed the possibility of personnel leasing. According to Garavaglia, after Vitello expressed interest, Garavaglia set up a meeting on July 25 with a representative of Transcontinental Leasing, Vitello, and himself. Garavaglia further testified that following an in-depth discussion with the Transcontinental Leasing representative at the July 25 meeting, Vitello said that "he would go with" the program subject to working out comparable insurance coverage and employment protection for Respondent Capitol Transit's present employees.

The parties met again on August 29. Garavaglia testified that at the August 29 meeting the parties agreed that Transcontinental's insurance policy provided more coverage than Vitello's coverage and did so at a less expensive rate. Garavaglia informed the parties that agreement had been reached with the Union representing Transcontinental's employees to permit Capitol Transit employees to work for Transcontinental. Garavaglia stated, "With those two agreements, Mr. Vitello agreed to sign an agreement with Transcontinental." The leasing agreement was signed on September 2, to be effective September 15.

Pursuant to our remand instructing the judge to make a credibility resolution concerning Garavaglia's testimony, the judge credited Garavaglia's testimony concerning what was said at his meeting with Vitello and concerning the dates of their meetings. Although crediting Garavaglia, the judge nevertheless concluded that Vitello did not reach a decision to change his operation until August 29, i.e., after he learned of the organizational campaign on August 13. The judge found that while testimony regarding the July 25 meeting seemed to indicate that Vitello was seriously considering changing the method of his operation, the testimony was insufficient to conclude that, in fact, Vitello had made up his mind or had determined at that time to enter into an employee leasing arrangement. Rather, the judge concluded that as of July 25 those talks were still in a preliminary stage subject to resolution of issues Vitello raised and that agreement was not imminent. Noting that Vitello did not testify that he had made up his mind or that he had told Garavaglia that he had made up his mind at the July 25 meeting, the judge found the words "he would go with a progam" could reasonably merely convey interest although the judge stated that "it is possible" to conclude from those words that Vitello had made up his mind.[8]

Contrary to the judge, we find that the credited evidence, when viewed in its entirety, warrants the conclusion that on July 25 Vitello accepted Transcontinental's employee leasing arrangement, subject to certain conditions that were subsequently satisfied. We cannot agree with the judge that Garavaglia's testimony that Vitello said that "he would go with a program like that" conveys nothing more than Vitello's mere interest in a leasing agreement.[9] Rather, we interpret Garavaglia's testimony to mean that on July 25, well before the union organizing campaign began, Vitello made an initial decision to change to an employee leasing operation, subject to the satisfactory resolution of certain specific concerns. The issue is not, as the judge phrased it, whether Vitello "had made up his mind" on July 25 to enter into the employee leasing arrangement. The issue is whether Vitello's initial decision, which was not tainted by any motive proscribed by the statute, was thereafter influenced by the organizational campaign that commenced among Capitol Transit's employees.

We find that it was not. After July 25 events followed a logical progression with the parties meeting again on August 29 and Vitello agreeing to sign a leasing agreement on learning that his concerns about insurance coverage and employment protection for his employees had been satisfied. On September 2 the agreement was executed and thereafter put into effect. By mid-August, of course, the union campaign at Capitol Transit was underway, but there is no showing that it affected in any way the events that had their genesis in the meeting held the month before. Where, as here, an employer's initial decision to change its mode of operations is lawful, the Act does not prohibit the employer from carrying out that decision simply because the employer's employees choose to engage in union activities.

Our finding with respect to the date on which the decision concerning the leasing arrangement was effectively made weakens the General Counsel's prima facie case; but even assuming that the prima facie case was established simply by virtue of evidence of union animus and the occurrence of union activity prior to the signing of the lease agreement, we conclude that Respondent Capitol Transit has carried its burden by establishing that it would have signed the agreement even in the absence of union activity. Accordingly, we reverse the judge's finding that Respondent Capitol Transit violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by executing the leasing agreement with Transcontinental Leasing and thereby terminating all the bargaining unit employees.

[8] The judge further found that those were Garavaglia's words and did not purport to be a quote from Vitello.

[9] Contrary to the judge, we place no significance on the fact that Garavaglia did not purport to quote Vitello's exact words. It is clear from Garavaglia's testimony, which the judge credited, that Garavaglia was giving his account of what Vitello said at the July 25 meeting.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried before me on 28 and 29 January 1987 at Detroit, Michigan, on the General Counsel's complaint,[1] which alleged that the Respondents are joint employers of certain employees and that they engaged in violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The Respondents each generally denied that it engaged in any unfair labor practices and each contends that they are not joint employers of any employees. Each Respondent appeared by a representative at the hearing.

On the record as a whole, including my observation of the witnesses, briefs, and arguments of counsel, I issue the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

Capitol Transit, Inc. is one of several companies owned and operated by Clarence Cusmano and Joseph Vitello, engaged in the interstate hauling of various goods, products, and materials. Specifically, Capitol Transit is a Michigan corporation with offices in Detroit, which annually derives gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from the interstate transportation of freight and commodities as an essential link in interstate commerce pursuant to agreements with, among other employers, the Ford Motor Company, some of whom, including Ford Motor Company, ship directly from Michigan to points outside the State goods valued in excess of $50,000.

The parties agree, and I find, that Capitol Transit is an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Transcontinental Leasing, Inc. is an Ohio company with its principal office and place of business in Cleveland. It is engaged in the business of providing employees to other employers for the performance of work.

About 2 September 1986, Capitol entered into an agreement with Transcontinental, in which Transcontinental was to provide employees to drive trucks for Capitol and has done so. The value of services to Capitol provided by Transcontinental during 1986 and to other employers directly engaged in interstate commerce or who serve as an essential link in the interstate transportation of freight and commodities exceeded $50,000.

The parties agree that Transcontinental is and at all times material has been an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

Prior to Capitol entering into the 2 September agreement with Transcontinental, Capitol employed approximately 46 truckdrivers in connection with its business of hauling freight and commodities. After preliminary discussions with representatives of Transcontinental, specifically its labor consultant Charles Garavaglia, Capitol entered into the agreement with Transcontinental in which Transcontinental would furnish employees to perform the duties theretofore performed by Capitol employees. Provisions were made to ensure that Capitol employees would have the first opportunity to work as employees for Transcontinental beginning 15 September, the effective date of the lease agreement.

Terminating the entire bargaining unit, which Capitol did, and entering into the lease agreement with Transcontinental is the gravamen of the unfair labor practices alleged in this matter. Preliminarily, however, there is a question of whether on these facts it can be concluded that the two Respondents are joint employers.

[1] The original charge was filed on 15 September and amended on 1 October 1986. The complaint issued on 31 October 1986. All dates are in 1986 unless otherwise indicated.

Transcontinental, in addition to the 46 former employees of Capitol, has about 250 or so other employees working for various companies as leased employees, principally in Ohio and Michigan.

There is no indication in the record, other than the facts outlined above, suggesting that Capitol and Transcontinental are joint employers under Board law. There is no evidence that they jointly control the wages, hours, or other terms and conditions of employment of employees. Their relationship appears to be a bona fide arrangement for the leasing of employees. Indeed, the General Counsel does not allege that Transcontinental is a disguised continuance of Capitol or that the two companies are alter egos of each other. It is only alleged that they are joint employers, and on the facts of this record, I conclude they are not. Evidence that Capitol continued to exercise control over significant terms and conditions of employment is lacking. There is no evidence that any supervision by Capitol was more than routine. Nor is there evidence that Capitol hired, fired, or disciplined employees. TLI, Inc., 271 NLRB 798 (1984).

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

All parties agree that Local 124, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, AFL-CIO (Local 124), and United Labor Associates International (ULAI) are both labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

The material facts in this matter are largely undisputed and may be summarized. Local 124 is a relatively small Teamsters local normally employing one full-time business agent who is also the president. Local 124 represents employees of sister companies of Capitol Transit but has never represented the Capitol Transit drivers. Periodically, however, and particularly in the few months prior to the events in this matter, Local 124's then president (William Klann) asked one of the owners of Capitol Transit (Joseph Vitello) to recognize Local 124 as the bargaining agent for the drivers.

Vitello's stated objection to signing such a recognition agreement had to do with the Teamsters' pension plan to which he would have to become a party, and the unfunded liability exposure attendant to signing on with that plan. In discussions with Klann, Vitello asked if they could negotiate a pension plan different from the basic Teamsters Central States Pension Plan and Klann stated they could not, and even if they did, such would not be approved by the International.

In any event, Klann asked that Vitello recognize Local 124 and Vitello refused. During this period, however, there is no indication that any Capitol employees were members of Local 124 or had ever authorized Local 124 to represent them for purposes of collective bargaining.

But sometime in the late summer Capitol employees, in fact, began to sign authorization cards designating Local 124 as their collective-bargaining representative. During the latter part of August and through September, approximately 30 such authorizations were signed.

The number of cards actually signed is not a matter of record inasmuch as it appears that not all of them were offered into evidence. Why this is so is unknown; however, it is noted that some of the cards in evidence have what appears to be altered dates. In addition, two cards that were purportedly signed in August were not datestamped received by the Board's Regional Office until 14 January 1987. All the other cards offered into evidence by the General Counsel were datestamped received on 24 September, the week following the filing of the charge.

Notwithstanding that the date on some of these cards is questionable, there is no question that employees of Capitol were engaged in an organizational campaign in late August and early September, and that cards were signed by the employees giving an unambiguous authorization to Local 124 to represent them. There is no indication or argument concerning the authenticity or unambiguity of the cards.

Nor is there any real dispute that during this period Cusmano and Vitello, the principal officers and managers of Capitol, interrogated employees concerning whether they had in fact signed authorization cards.

Thus, Mark Benedict testified that about a week before 14 September, at Capitol's dispatch room, Cusmano "asked me if I'd signed a card for the Teamsters or not." Benedict testified he told Cusmano that he had not.

Bradley Burton testified that during a discussion with Vitello, Vitello asked if he had signed a union card and then said "that it wouldn't do me no good at Hawk Trucking [a sister company of Capitol] because Hawk is non-union." Burton told Vitello that he had not signed a card. Burton further testified that during this conversation Vitello said, "Well, it's none of my business, but if you keep pursuing the matter, you'll all be walking." Sometime later in another conversation with Vitello, Burton testified:

> He asked me if I'd told any Union people that he said, if we didn't stop pursuing this matter, we'd all be walking. And I told him, "No, I never said no such thing." He said he had some witnesses stating that, you know, I had said this. And I said, "Joe, I don't know what you're talking about. I don't know where you got your witnesses from."

Finally, Burton testified:

> [Vitello] asked me the same thing, if I had said anything to any Union people or officials of him saying that, if we didn't stop pursuing the matter, he would—we'd all be walking. And, finally, I told him, I said, "Yes, Joe, I did say that; and yes, you did say that." He said, "Why are you telling me this now? You told me "no before?" And I said, "Joe, I was afraid for my job." He said, "Well, you ain't got nothing to be afraid of for your job."

While Vitello admitted to the interrogation of Burton and other employees, he denied the threats testified to by Burton.

William Johnson testified that Vitello talked to him about Local 124 and the Company and "tried to show me where it was better that I stay with the company like the company was rather than switch over to the Union. In other words, if it came down to a vote like where I would have to vote for the company or vote for the Union, that I should vote for the company instead the Union." During this conversation, Vitello asked Johnson if he knew about the cards that were being passed around and if he had signed one. Johnson told him no.

Similarly, Stephen Dudash testified that on two occasions Vitello asked him if he had signed a card and he told Vitello yes.

Victor Burton, an employee of Capitol Trucking (a sister company of the Respondent) and a Local 124 member, testified that he had passed out cards to Capitol drivers. Vitello "asked me what I was trying to do to his company."

As noted above, Capitol and Transcontinental signed the lease agreement on 2 September to be effective 15 September, and on Sunday, 14 September, representatives of Capitol and Transcontinental met with the employees to advise them of the change in operations. Drivers were told they could become employees of Transcontinental if they chose, although such was not required; but, if they wanted to work beginning the next day, they would have to do so.

At this meeting, employees were also told that Transcontinental had a collective-bargaining agreement with ULAI covering all its employees and, pursuant to the terms of that agreement, they would have to become members of ULAI. Thus, in addition to W-4 forms, representatives of Transcontinental also gave employees applications for membership in ULAI and for dues-checkoff authorizations. To that point, there had been no effort on the part of ULAI to organize these employees, nor had ULAI obtained any authorizations for representation from any of them.

Representatives of ULAI had met with representatives of Transcontinental, specifically Labor Consultant Garavaglia, and had negotiated a collective-bargaining agreement covering all of Transcontinental's employees effective 1 July. It provided, inter alia:

> The terms of this Agreement shall apply to all employees in the classifications of work set forth herein and shall cover all accretions to or relocations of bargaining unit operations, including newly established or acquired warehousing, transportation or processing operations of the Employer.

Beginning 15 September all (or substantially all) of Capitol's former driver employees began working as employees of Transcontinental, but doing the same work under essentially the same conditions as they had previously. Although unclear from the record, it appears that all the employees who began working for Transcontinental on 15 September signed applications for membership in ULAI and dues-checkoff authorizations, pursuant to which Transcontinental has made dues deductions from their wages and has remitted those amounts to ULAI.

B. Analysis and Concluding Findings

1. Interrogation

As noted above, there is no real dispute that on several occasions the owners of Capitol Transit interrogated employees concerning whether they had signed authorization cards on behalf of Local 124. Vitello admitted that he had asked employees whether they had signed authorization cards.

The allegation concerning interrogation by Cusmano was added as an amendment to the complaint at the outset of the hearing over objection by counsel for Capitol Transit. The amendment was received with leave for counsel to move for a recess following the close of the General Counsel's case if time was deemed necessary to prepare a defense to the allegation. No such motion was made.

Cusmano did not testify. Accordingly, the testimony concerning interrogation by him stands undenied on the record and I find that it occurred substantially as testified to.

There is therefore no question on this record that the Respondent's two principal officers in fact interrogated bargaining unit employees concerning their union activity. I conclude that this interrogation, occurring as it did in the context of the organizational campaign, and subsequent decision by Capitol Transit to terminate the entire bargaining unit, was unlawful and was violative of Section 8(a)(1).

The type of interrogation engaged in by Vitello and Cusmano was not the benign questioning found permissible by the Board in such cases as Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), enfd. sub nom. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 11 v. NLRB, 760 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir. 1985). The interrogation here, I conclude, was part of Capitol's effort to thwart employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.

2. The threats

Although Vitello denied in general terms that he "threatened" employees, I find more believable the testimony of Bradley Burton that Vitello told him if they kept pursuing the matter of signing authorization cards, "you'll all be walking." Under these circumstances, such is a clear threat that employees would be terminated for engaging in protected activity. In making such a statement to Burton, which he did on two occasions, Vitello violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. Other allegations of 8(a)(1) violations

The complaint also alleges that Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) by stating it would be futile to engage in activity on behalf of Local 124, and that Respondents were engaged in surveillance of employees' union activity. The record does not offer factual support for these allegations. Accordingly, I shall recommend that paragraphs 12(a) and (d) be dismissed.

4. Termination of the bargaining unit

Although Klann had asked Vitello to recognize Local 124 as the bargaining agent for the Capitol Transit drivers in the spring and summer of 1986, there is no indication that Local 124 represented any of those employees then, nor was there any organizational activity on their behalf. However, by August, authorization cards were being distributed among the Capitol Transit drivers and they were being signed. This fact Vitello knew, as demonstrated by his interrogation of his employees in late August and September. Nor did Vitello deny knowledge that employees were signing authorizations for Local 124.

It is in the context of this organizational campaign, which included Vitello's interrogation and threats to employees that on 2 September he signed a lease agreement with Transcontinental, the effect of which was to terminate the entire bargaining unit. While the leasing of drivers, and the attendant dissolution of the bargaining unit as employees of Capitol Transit, may very well have been legitimate between Capitol Transit and Transcontinental, the conclusion is inescapable that it was precipitated by the employees' organizational activity.

At least, the General Counsel made out a prima facie case that Vitello determined to change from employee-drivers to leased drivers as a result of the employees' union campaign. Therefore, Capitol Transit has the burden to establish that even in the absence of the union activity it nevertheless would have entered into this arrangement and terminated the bargaining unit employees. See Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980). Capitol Transit brought forth no persuasive evidence tending to support a conclusion that it would have negotiated such a leasing arrangement with Transcontinental in the absence of the employees' union activity. Indeed, the only evidence tending to support Capitol's position are the self-serving declarations of Vitello, which I discredit. Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466 (9th Cir. 1966). Accordingly, I conclude that by executing the lease agreement with Transcontinental and thereby terminating all of the bargaining unit employees, Capitol Transit violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

5. The Transcontinental violations

Although not free from doubt, it is assumed for purposes of this decision that the recognition by Transcontinental of ULAI was lawful, there being no allegation of illegality in this relationship.

The collective-bargaining agreement between Transcontinental and ULAI purports to cover "all accretions to or relocations of bargaining unit operations, including newly established or acquired warehousing, transportation or processing operations of the Employer." There is no proviso that the agreement will be applicable only in the event that ULAI establishes that it represents a majority of the new employees. There is no evidence that ULAI was ever designated the bargaining representative of any Capitol employee. To the contrary, at the material time it was Local 124 that was obtaining authorization cards from these employees.

It is clear and long established that a collective-bargaining agreement is unlawful if it purports to apply to a newly acquired facility without the employees of that facility having had an opportunity to determine whether they in fact want to be represented by the labor organization. See, e.g., Safeway Stores, 276 NLRB 944 (1985).

Nor are there sufficient facts here to support the contention that a unit of drivers working exclusively for Capitol Transit would be an accretion to any other bargaining unit of Transcontinental employees. Though there is testimony of some interchange of employees as a general theory, there was no evidence of any specific interchange between employees working for Capitol Transit and any other operation for which Transcontinental supplies employees. There is no commonality of supervision between these employees and any other groups of Transcontinental employees. The employees at Capitol Transit were clearly a definitive bargaining unit prior to the time that Transcontinental and Capitol Transit entered into their arrangement.

In effect, Transcontinental and ULAI argue that the lease agreement between Transcontinental and Capitol Transit lawfully denied bargaining unit employees their right to self-organization. Such is clearly erroneous. See, e.g., Towne Ford Sales, 270 NLRB 311 (1984).

I conclude that ULAI, Transcontinental, and Capitol Transit could not legitimately deny the Capitol Transit drivers their right to self-organization.

By enforcing the collective-bargaining agreement as to the former Capitol Transit drivers, requiring them to sign applications for membership in ULAI and dues-checkoff authorizations and implementing those authorizations by withholding dues from the employees' wages and remitting them to ULAI, Transcontinental violated Section 8(a)(2) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The unfair labor practices found above, occurring in connection with Capitol Transit's and Transcontinental's respective businesses, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

V. THE REMEDY

Having concluded that Capitol Transit violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3), I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act, including terminating its lease agreement with Transcontinental Leasing, Inc., and rehiring all its truckdriver employees and making them whole for any wages or other loss of benefits that they may have suffered as a result of their termination effective 15 September 1986, in accordance, if applicable, with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289

(1950), with interest as provided for in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[2]

In addition, inasmuch as I conclude that Local 124 in fact represented an uncoerced majority of the employees in the appropriate bargaining unit, Capitol Transit should be ordered to recognize and bargain with Local 124 as the exclusive representative of those employees.

Although it is questionable when some of the authorization cards offered into evidence were signed, it is clear that at least 26 of them were signed by bargaining unit employees prior to 24 September, the date those 26 were received at the Board's Regional Office in Detroit. The fact that some of these cards may have been undated or the date altered does not affect the authenticity of the card, the signature of the employee or the unambiguous nature of the card as designating Local 124 to be the exclusive bargaining agent for that employee. The precise date when these cards were executed is not particularly critical in this matter, although it is noted that most of them in fact were signed, according to the testimony of the cardsigner, on the date indicated on the card and this occurred in late August or early September.

The date a card is signed is important to establish when majority status is reached and to ensure a contemporaneous designation of representation. Where those factors can be independently established, as here, then whether each card is signed or a date is altered is not significant.

While altering dates on authorization cards or any other document is not to be condoned, the mere fact that some of the dates appear to have been is not of material importance. The point is, there is no argument that the individuals who purportedly signed the authorization cards in fact did so and did in fact understand that they were signing an authorization for exclusive representation by Local 124. Who altered the date or under what circumstances is not known. It would therefore be inappropriate to deny an employee his designation of the Union based on the fact of such alteration—especially if the date is not particularly material.

I therefore conclude that by at least 24 September a majority of the 45 or 46 employees in the appropriate bargaining unit had designated Local 124 as their bargaining agent.

Finally, the unfair labor practices here are sufficiently egregious to support a bargaining order. Not only did Vitello engage in interrogation and threats at the outset of the organizational campaign, he undertook to rid himself of the entire bargaining unit. I therefore conclude that a bargaining Order is appropriate. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969). The Order should be retroactive to 24 September, the first date it is clear that Local 124 had majority status. Trading Port, 219 NLRB 298 (1975).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

Preliminary Statement

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge. On 18 September 1987, the Board remanded the subject case to me for the purpose of making a credibility resolution concerning the testimony of Charles Garavaglia, a labor consultant who represents Respondent Transcontinental Leasing, Inc. (Transcontinental).

The Board concluded that:

> (A) determination regarding the credibility of this testimony is necessary to resolving the issue of whether Respondent Capitol's decision to change from employee drivers to lease drivers occurred before the organizational drive began. Upon remand, the Judge is to make a credibility finding regarding Garavaglia's testimony.

A. Brief Summary of the Facts and Analysis

As more fully detailed in my initial decision, for a number of years Teamsters Local 124 (the Union) through then-president William Klann had attempted to get Respondent Capitol Transit, Inc. (Capitol) to sign a recognition agreement. To this end, occasionally Klann would meet with the president of Capitol, Joseph Vitello, who would refuse to grant recognition for a number of reasons, which are immaterial to the issues in this case. The most recent such attempt before the events in this matter occurred in early 1986.

Charles Garavaglia testified that beginning in July 1986 he had three meetings with Vitello, the ultimate purpose of which was to convince Vitello that he should use the services of Respondent Transcontinental, a company engaged in the business of furnishing employees to employers such as Capitol. According to Garavaglia, the first meeting was 17 July and involved the subject of Garavaglia becoming a labor relations consultant for Capitol. The second was 25 July and focused on the attempt by representatives of Transcontinental to convince Vitello to change his method of operations and use their service. The third was 29 August when an agreement between them was reached. It was executed on 2 September.

According to Garavaglia, on July 25 Vitello indicated that he was interested but did have four areas of concern, one of which involved insurance and another placing his current employees with Transcontinental so that they could continue to do his work. Garavaglia testified that he said he would look into these matters and specifically would contact the Union that represented the employees at Transcontinental (United Labor Associates International) to determine whether or not it would be permissible, in the event that Capitol and Transcontinental signed an agreement, for the then employees of Capitol to be offered employment with Transcontinental to work at Capitol.

Vitello testified to four meetings with Garavaglia. The first was in early July. The second was in late July at which Rogers of Transcontinental was also present and explained how Transcontinental worked. Then, according to Vitello, there was a third meeting, also with Rogers and Garavaglia, in early August at which time Vitello told Rogers "that I would be interested in going with his company on a couple of conditions."

In late August Vitello met again with Garavaglia and was told those conditions (insurance and hiring of his drivers) could be met and on 2 September the contract was signed.

Garavaglia testified to three meetings, omitting the one in early August. The substance of the late July and early August meetings testified to by Vitello occurred in one late July meeting according to Garavaglia. Though there is a conflict between the Respondent's principal witnesses concerning how many times they met, their testimony about what they discussed is similar.

In essence, Vitello said he would be interested if two conditions were met. He was not informed that those conditions could be satisfied until late August. Neither he nor Garavaglia testified that they had a meeting of the minds prior to the time the lease was signed. At best, both Vitello and Garavaglia testified that Vitello was conditionally interested.

There is nothing in Garavaglia's testimony nor in the testimony of Vitello that would indicate that in late July Transcontinental and Capitol had any kind of understanding that Capitol would use the services of Transcontinental. There is no indication in Garavaglia's testimony, or that of Vitello, that Vitello had made a decision then, even tentatively, to change his method of operations.

William Klann testified that he met with Vitello on 13 August and presented him with recognition agreement which Vitello stated he would submit to his lawyer. According to Klann's testimony, on cross-examination:

> Q. Did he [Vitello] ask you whether you had authorization cards?
> A. Yes.
> Q. What did you tell him?
> A. I said that that's in the process. I then—the people have been talking to each other and there is cards out yes.

Vitello testified about this meeting. He did not deny that he asked Klann about cards and Klann had stated that the Union was in the process of getting authorization cards signed.

Garavaglia and Vitello then met on 29 August and reached an agreement in which Capitol would use Transcontinental, and they signed a lease on 2 September to be effective 15 September.

Based on the generally undisputed and credible evidence of record, and crediting Garavaglia, I conclude that Vitello did not make a decision to change his method of operations until at least 29 August 1986.

There is nothing in Vitello's testimony, or other credible evidence, to suggest that he had made a decision prior to that date. While it appears to be the case that Vitello was contemplating a change in operations prior to 29 August, he had not yet made a decision.

It is also undisputed that by at least 13 August Vitello knew that his employees were engaged in an organizational campaign on behalf of the Union. Klann so testified Vitello did not refute this testimony.

Further, had Vitello in fact decided to change his method of operations before 13 August, it seems reasonable he would have told Klann. But at a minimum, he would probably not have engaged in the 8(a)(1) conduct.

Although the dates of Vitello's interrogation of employees are not precisely set, the credible evidence shows that there were interrogations and other acts violative of Section 8(a)(1), which began occurring in late August. I do not find it particularly unreasonable that the employees' memory of when particular acts of interrogation took place lack mathematic precision. The general timeframe of late August is sufficient and is corroborative of the undenied testimony of Klann that he had a meeting with Vitello on 13 August at which he stated that the employees were engaged in organizational activity. I therefore reaffirm my conclusion, based on all the credible evidence of record, that in fact Vitello knew of the organizational campaign among his employees prior to the time that he made the decision to change his method of operation by terminating the entire bargaining unit and executing an employee lease agreement with Transcontinental.

B. The Credibility of Garavaglia

On reviewing the record and my trial notes, I find no basis to discredit Garavaglia. His testimony appears internally consistent and not at material variance with others whom I do credit. While his demeanor was not particularly positive, neither did it show untrustworthiness. Absent a basis for discrediting one who has taken an oath, I conclude that his testimony should be credited, at least where unrefuted. I generally credit his factual version of the meetings to which he testified. However, his interpretation of those facts I consider argument by an interested representative of one of the parties. In short, his testimony of what was said at his meetings with Vitello and when they met is credited. His opinion that Vitello decided in July to use Transcontinental is not. Garavaglia's opinion is not supported by the facts to which he or Vitello testified.

Thus, though I credit Garavaglia's testimony, I nevertheless conclude that Vitello did not reach a decision to change his operation until after he learned of the organizational campaign. That he and Garavaglia may have had discussions along these lines prior to the time he learned of the organizational activity does not make lawful his otherwise unlawful activities.

The only testimony suggesting a contrary finding is in Garavaglia's version of the 25 July meeting. Present were Garavaglia, Vitello, Rogers, and Vitello's son. After discussion of how the personnel leasing process would work, its value and Roger's experience in the trucking industry, Garavaglia testified:

> And Mr. Rogers gave him [Vitello] the information. He accepted that information and said he would go with a program like that, subject to—I think it resolved [sic] around four issues. One was, there was an issue over his insurance. Something about he was a self-insured insurant, or something that he had to pay the total amount of the insurance. I don't know the exact details. And something about Mr. Rogers had a premium policy with Firemans Fund, and that they matched the benefits. They looked—Firemans Fund looked better and cheaper. He wanted to make sure, so he wanted some proof from either an actuary, or somebody from Firemans Fund, or something to say that the insurance is better. There was an issue over the people that he had presently employed with him. Would they be given protection to work, I think he said at Capitol Transit? There was an issue over if the insurance—if he went along with the program would it pick it up immediately? If his stopped today would theirs pick up immediately? Did he—in the final one did he have the ability to have enough extra people if he needed a surge of people? And that was the basis.

While this testimony of Garavaglia seems to indicate that Vitello was seriously considering changing the method of his operation, it is insufficient to conclude that in fact Vitello had made up his mind or had determined at that time to enter into an employee leasing arrangement.

I conclude rather that as of 25 July those talks were still in a preliminary stage subject to resolution of the issues Vitello raised and that agreement was not imminent. This is established by the fact that after the 25 July meeting, Transcontinental and Capitol had no further contact until 29 August. I credit Garavaglia over Vitello and conclude there was no early August meeting. It does not seem to have been in Garavaglia's interest to ignore such a meeting, had it in fact occurred. However, it would seem to be in Vitello's interest to have had yet one more meeting prior to any proved union activity. While the number of meetings is not so important as what was said, that these two principal actors have such different memories of how often they met, suggests that the meetings themselves were not considered too important. This in turn implies that nothing of great substance occurred—certainly not something so important as reaching an agreement.

Although it is possible to conclude from the words "he would go with a program like that" that Vitello had made up his mind, such words just as reasonably merely convey interest. Further, it is clear that these are Garavaglia's words and do not purport to be a quote from Vitello. Vitello did not testify that he had made up his mind or told Garavaglia that he had. To interpret Garavaglia's testimony in such a way as to conclude that Vitello had agreed about 25 July to enter into the employee lease arrangement would be to give determinative significance to Garavaglia's choice of words as a witness—words that do not even purport to be those he remembered Vitello having uttered at the time. I do not believe that the Section 7 rights of 45 employees can be set on such a questionable foundation.

Counsel for the General Counsel argues that Vitello and Garavaglia should be discredited and I should find there were no meetings between them until late August—after the organizational campaign became known. Though somewhat vague their testimony of a late July meeting tends to be corroborated by Lawrence McHenry, a representative for United Labor Associates International. McHenry testified to an early August discussion with the president of ULAI, the subject of which was their earlier meeting with Garavaglia about giving former Capitol employees preference to be hired by Transcontinental. Such supports Garavaglia's testimony that he met with them on 31 July. Other witnesses to this discussion between McHenry and Donald Deters fixed no date. Klann, who McHenry testified was present, denied the substance of McHenry's testimony. Though crediting Klann could serve to discredit McHenry and therefore Garavaglia, Klann's testimony is not sufficiently definitive for such a conclusion. I credit McHenry.

While I do not discredit Garavaglia, neither do I conclude that he even attempted to testify factually that Vitello had decided to enter into the leasing agreement as of 25 July.

From a totality of the record, I conclude that Vitello did not decide to enter into the employee leasing arrangement until after he had and learned of the employees' organizational campaign. Further, given the substantial S(a)(1) activity engaged in by Vitello after this, I conclude that his ultimate decision to change his operation was motivated by the employees' union activity; and the Respondent brought forth insufficient evidence that he would have changed even absent the union activity.

I therefore reaffirm my conclusion that by executing the lease agreement with Transcontinental and terminating all the bargaining unit employees, Capitol Transit violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

I further reaffirm and adopt the other findings and conclusions and recommend entry of the Order set forth in my initial decision.

The North American Coal Corporation and International Union, United Mine Workers of America. Case 18–CA–10202

July 11, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On March 7, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Stephen J. Gross issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The Union filed an answering brief in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

The judge concluded that the Respondent's refusal to provide information requested by the Union concerning the location of leases and coal-related assets of the Respondent and its subsidiaries and joint ventures within the State of North Dakota violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. No exceptions to this conclusion were filed. The judge also concluded that the Respondent's refusal to provide such information was a contributing cause of the November 1, 1987 strike by unit employees. Accordingly, the judge concluded that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception. The Respondent excepts to the judge's finding of an unfair labor practice strike.

We agree with the judge that the November 1, 1987 strike was an unfair labor practice strike. In reaching this conclusion, we find it unnecessary to rely on the judge's suggested rationale that any discussion of an unfair labor practice during an employee meeting called to discuss whether to strike automatically establishes a presumption that any subsequent strike is an unfair labor practice strike. Rather, we find in the circumstances of this case sufficient evidence that the Respondent's undisputed unlawful refusal to provide bargaining information was a contributing cause of the strike.

We emphasize that the requested information was relevant to the bargaining issue of employee job security, an issue of paramount concern to the Union in negotiations for a successor agreement. In fact, the Union linked these matters in its initial information request. Further, just 3 days prior to the strike, the Union informed the Respondent during bargaining that it could not make any more proposals on job security without the requested information, and it gave strike notice over this issue.[3] Shortly thereafter, at the November 1 strike meeting, employees were informed about the nature of the Union's information request, the Respondent's refusal to provide the information, the Union's specific need for the information in order to make job-security proposals, and the Union's opinion that any strike would be an unfair labor practice strike.[4] On these facts, we conclude that the General Counsel has affirmatively established the requisite causal connection between the Respondent's unlawful refusal to provide the information and the strike. Accordingly, we find that the November 1 strike was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, The North American Coal Corporation, Bismarck, North Dakota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Everett Rotenberry, Esq., for the General Counsel.
David J. Laurent, Esq. and Thomas Smock, Esq., of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

STEPHEN J. GROSS, Administrative Law Judge. The Indian Head Mine is a surface coal mine near Zap, North Dakota. The Respondent, The North American Coal Corporation (North American), owns and operates the

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Respondent alleges that it has fully remedied the unfair labor practice by forwarding the requested information to the Union on March 23, 1988, posting the required notice on March 25, 1988, and meeting with the Union to discuss the lease and asset information on March 30, 1988. Therefore, it maintains that the strike has reverted to an economic strike. We leave this issue to be litigated and resolved in compliance.

[3] Although not mentioned in the judge's decision, the uncontroverted testimony of Bruce Boyens, the Union's chief negotiator, was that:

> I believe on the 28th of October the last few things were said about our proposals was that it was unfortunate they wouldn't supply the information because we couldn't make any more proposals on job security than we already made or alter ours without it, and that we were going to have to strike over that.

[4] We agree with the judge that the Union here obviously recognized the strategic advantage of portraying the impending work stoppage as an unfair labor practice strike, but we disagree with his suggestion that this advantage and its exploitation should be viewed as a factor indicating the lack of any real causal connection between the unfair labor practice and the subsequent strike.

mine. The Charging Party, the International Union, United Mine Workers of America (UMWA), represents the mine's 55 employees. During the course of bargaining over a new collective-bargaining contract covering the Indian Mine, the UMWA asked North American for information about North American's other coal-related assets in North Dakota. North American refused to provide the information. Subsequently the employees of the Indian Head Mine went out on strike.

I. INTRODUCTION

The General Counsel contends that North American violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) when the Company failed to provide the UMWA with the information it sought, and that a cause of the strike by the employees of the Indian Head Mine was North American's refusal to provide the UMWA with such information.[1]

As claimed by the General Counsel, my conclusions are that (1) North American violated the Act when it refused to provide the information sought by the UMWA, and (2) the strike against North American is an unfair labor practice strike.

II. NORTH AMERICAN'S REFUSAL TO PROVIDE INFORMATION

The 1984 collective-bargaining agreement between North American and the UMWA covering the employees of the Indian Head Mine expired by its own terms on 1 September 1987 but prior to that date was extended through 30 October 1987. (All the events I subsequently refer to occurred in 1987 unless I specify otherwise.) Bargaining, looking toward a new agreement, began in July.

From the start of the bargaining the UMWA representatives expressed their concern about the job security of the mine's employees. Virtually all the plant, located about 15 miles from the mine, owned by the United Power Association (UPA). The contract between North American and the UPA covering coal from the Indian Head Mine expires in March 1992. The mine's employees knew that and had come to the conclusion that North American was going to shut down the Indian Head Mine in 1992 on the expiration of the contract. The mine's employees also knew that North American was discussing a follow-on contract with the UPA; but the employees assumed that even if North American did reach agreement with the UPA, the post-1992 coal would come from some place other than the Indian Head Mine. The employees expressed all these concerns to their UMWA representatives.

The employees arrived at these concerns about their future employment without any specific advice on the subject from North American. North American has not told the employees (or the UMWA) that it is going to shut down the Indian Head Mine on the expiration of the UPA contract in 1992. On the other hand North American has not said that the mine will remain open. And North American has said nothing about whether it plans to supply the UPA's powerplant from another mine if the Company does close the Indian Head Mine in 1992.

The lead negotiator for the UMWA in the bargaining with North American was Bruce Boyens, western administrator and counsel for the UMWA. His approach to the job-security issue was to propose two kinds of contract provisions. Under one approach, the "jurisdictional clause" of the North American-UMWA collective-bargaining agreement would be amended to cover additional coal lands in which North American had an interest "so that the mine life of the [Indian Head Mine] could be extended."[2] Under the second approach, Indian Head Mine employees would "have preferential hiring and transfer" rights to jobs at other North American Mines.[3]

But North American rejected the UMWA's proposals. North American's negotiating team was headed by James Rouse, director of employee relations for the western division of North American. From the start Rouse took the position that (1) "we [that is, North American's management] would indeed do what we could for the Indian Head Mine employees . . . [w]hen such a circumstance would arise that there would be a reduction in employment at that mine . . . in assisting these folks to find other employment";[4] but (2) North American would not agree to any proposed contract provision that gave the Indian Head Mine employees preferential rights to jobs at any other location. North American maintained that stance throughout the bargaining.

Boyens responded to Rouse's position by asking for information about North American's coal lands. In particular, Boyens asked for the locations of "those leases and coal related assets of North American which now exist in North Dakota." The UMWA needed that information, said Boyens > in order to make or alter what job security provisions we had on the table an that time. The Union could not intelligently bargain without that information since it needed it in order to know what North American held and in order to make any changes in our job security proposal which could form the basis for settlement of the agreement.[5]

North American refused to provide the requested information. The only information that North American would provide about its leases and coal-related assets, said Rouse, was information about the various properties encompassed by the definition of the Indian Head Mine in the collective-bargaining agreement between North

[1] The UMWA filed its unfair labor practice charge on 4 September 1987. The complaint issued on 30 October and was amended on 13 November. I heard the matter in Bismark, North Dakota, on 3 December. The General Counsel and North American submitted briefs on 6 January 1988.

North American admits that it is an employer engaged in commerce (see, in this connection, Tr. 5), that the UMAW is a labor organization, that the employees employed at the Indian Head Mine constitute an appropriate unit, and that the UMWA is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in that unit.

American and the UMWA. Because the UMWA's objective was to provide job opportunities for the Indian Head Mine employees in the event that North American shut down the Indian Head Mine, information only about that mine was not helpful to the UMWA.

Neither party subsequently altered its position about either the information request or the appropriateness of a job security provision in the new contract.

III. NORTH AMERICAN'S FAILURE TO PROVIDE INFORMATION VIOLATED THE ACT

North Amercian argues that the Act does not require North American to provide the information requested by the UMWA since that information is relevant only to nonmandatory subjects of bargaining. It is true that employers do not have to supply information that is relevant only to nonmandatory subjects of bargaining. Service Employees Local 535 (North Bay Regional Center), 287 NLRB 123 at fn. 1 (1988); Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891, 894 (1984).

As noted earlier, however, one of the UMWA's bargaining goals is to have the new collective-bargaining agreement with North American provide for preferential hiring and trasnfer rights for the Indian Head Mine employees. In this regard, a unionized employer that is planning to shut down a jobsite must, of course, bargain about the effects of the action on its employees. E.g., First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666, 681 (1981). The Board has long held that where that action includes the shutdown of one location and the opening of another, the employer is obligated to bargain about "the placement of the [old location's] employees in positions" at the new location. Brown Truck & Trailer Mfg. Co., 106 NLRB 999, 1000 (1953).

I know of no effects-bargaining case that deals with a shutdown years in the future. But "the words of [Section 8(d)] . . . plainly cover termination of employment which . . . necessarily results from closing an operation." First National Maintenance Corp., above at 681, quoting Fiberboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 210 (1964). That being so, it is far from clear that, even where employees have no basis for believing that their employer contemplates closing their jobsite, an employer has the right, during bargaining over a new contract, to refuse to discuss the effects of future closings or the transfer rights of employees affected by such closings.

For present purposes, assume that employers are not obliged to bargain about the effects of jobsite closings as long as no closing is on the horizon. That is not the situation here. There are objective circumstances specifically related to the Indian Head Mine that point to the real possibility of its shutdown. The UMWA is in fact concerned about the mine's employees losing their jobs in the event of such a shutdown.

North American argues that despite these circumstances, since there has been no "announced decision" by North American to close the mine, the Act does not require the Company to respond to requests by the UMWA to bargain about the effects on employees of a closing of the mine.[6] The central purpose of the Act is to promote industrial stability and peace.[7] Given the real, and reasonable, concerns of the UMWA about the Indian Head Mine employees losing their jobs, that purpose would plainly be disserved by the adoption by the Board of the position urged by North American.

I accordingly conclude that the Act requires North American, on request by the UMWA during bargaining over a new collective-bargaining contract, to bargain with the UMWA about the effects of the possible shutdown of the Indian Head Mine on the mine's employees.[8]

I also conclude that included within the scope of such bargaining is the question of the rights of those employees to jobs at other North American mines in North Dakota.[9]

That brings us to the information that the UMWA seeks from North American.

As discussed above, the UMWA asked North American for information about North American's "leases and coal-related assets" in North Dakota. That information is plainly relevant to what jobs the employees in the Indian Head Mine bargaining unit might transfer to if the Indian Head Mine does close in 1992. Indeed, as also discussed above, the UMWA advised North American that the Union "needed the information in order to make or alter what job security provisions we had on the table."

I am aware that North American might have reasons for not wanting to publicize the location of its coal-related interests in North Dakota. But North American could have expressed that concern here. See, e.g., Kelly-Springfield Tire Co., 266 NLRB 587, 588 (1983). North American chose not to do so.

I am also aware that, from North American's point of view, nothing the UMWA can propose could convince the Company to grant contractually established transfer rights to its Indian Head Mine employees. However, for obvious reasons, that consideration does not excuse an employer from supplying information of a kind that the Act would otherwise require the employer to provide. See Pertec Computer Corp., 284 NLRB 810 fn. 3 (1987).

[7] Sec. 1(b) of the Act; NLRB v. Financial Institution Employees Local 1182 (Seattle-First), 471 U.S. 1098 (1986).

[8] North American contends that to the extent the requested information is relevant to the UMWA's interest in rededfining the jurisdictional clause of the collective-bargaining agreement, the information relates to a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. Where requested information is relevant to a mandatory subject of bargaining, the employer may not refrain from supplying it merely because the information is also relevant to nonmandatory subject. See Oliver Corp., 162 NLRB 813 (1967). Thus I need not decide whether revision of the jurisdictional clause of the agreement would be a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. Similarly, I need not decide the effect on this theory that in 1974 North American demanded a change in the jurisdictional clause of its agreement with the UMWA, and then bargained to impasse and took (and won) a strike over the matter.

[9] The limitations expressed in that conclusion about the scope of North American's bargaining obligation (rights to jobs in mines in North Dakota) are intended only to reflect the nature of the information request that is the subject of this hearing.

The evidence suggests that the UMWA assumed that any transfer rights would apply only to mines that North American might open in the future, not to mines already in operation. Whether North American's bargaining obligation is broader than that need not to be decided here.

I accordingly conclude that by failing to provide the information requested by the UMWA, North American has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

One other question about the UMWA's information request remains. The complaint alleges that North American violated the Act by failing to provide information about the "location of leases and coal-related assets within the State of North Dakota of the North American Coal Corporation and its subsidiaries and joint ventures." (Emphasis added.) However, North American urges that information about "leases or coal-related assets owned by entities other than North American are not relevant to the Union's performance of its duties."[10]

In passing on the appropriateness of an information request, the standard used to evaluate the relevance of the requested information "is akin to that adopted matters regarding discovery." Thus "potential relevance is sufficient." Dahl Fish Co., 279 NLRB 1084 (1986); see NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 437 (1967). Under a variety of circumstances, information on the location of the leases and coal-related assets of North American's subsidiaries and joint ventures could be relevant to the bargaining between the UMWA and North American about the impact of the possible closing of the Indian Head Mine on the mine's employees.[11]

III. IS THE STRIKE AN UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE STRIKE

The employees of the Indian Head Mine who are members of the UMWA are organized into a local union of the UMWA, Local 8880. As touched on earlier, the collective-bargaining contract between the UMWA and North American expired on 30 October. On that date the UMWA's president, Richard Trumka, notified Local 8880 by telegram that he authorized a strike, effective 12:01 a.m. the following day, "upon the expiration of the agreement between the United Mine Workers and North American Coal Company."

Daniel Neurohr is the president of Local 8880. According to Neurohr: (1) the Local ordinarily receives such a telegram whenever a collective-bargaining agreement comes to an end, and (2) that kind of telegram always preceeds a strike by Local 8880.

The members of Local 8880 met during the evening of 1 November. Neurohr read Trumka's telegram. Neurohr then referred to, among other things, North American's refusal to provide information that the UMWA had requested, and said that the strike would be an unfair labor practice strike.

Dallas Wolf is a UMWA representative in North Dakota. Wolf spoke after Neurohr. Wolf testified that he told the employees—"basically . . . that we are authorized to go on strike by the president and he is the only one [who] can authorize a strike."[12]

Wolf, like Neurohr, while discussing whether to strike, referred to North American's failure to provide information, briefly described the kind of information the UMWA wanted, and mentioned why the Union wanted it. In the course of his talk, Wolk reiterated Neurohr's view that the strike would be an unfair labor practice strike.

The employees did not vote on whether to strike. Rather, in Wolf's words:

> The impression we got was that everybody wanted to go on strike . . . I got up and asked if there is any objection that I will go tell the press that we are on strike, and there was no objection.[13]

The strike did begin on 1 November and picket signs did use the term "unfair labor practice."

Neurohr was the only Indian Head Mine employee called to the witness stand by either the General Counsel or the UMWA. North American did not call any employees as witnesses.

The General Counsel contends that the foregoing facts show that the strike is an unfair labor practice strike. The question that raises is whether the strike was caused at least in part by North American's refusal to provide the information that the UMWA sought; was that refusal a "contributing cause" of the strike.[14]

Certainly there is evidence to support the contention of the General Counsel and the UMWA that the strike is an unfair labor practice strike. Namely, Neurohr (Local 8880's president) and Wolf (a UMWA representative) testified that they referred to North American's failure to provide information in the course of the meeting of the members of Local 8880 that led directly to the strike.

A number of factors point in the other direction. First, the basis of the UMWA's authorization of the strike was, clearly, the fact that the old contract had expired and no new one had been agreed to. The UMWA did not grant the authorization because North American had failed to provide information.

Second, it could prove greatly to the advantage of the Indian Head Mine employees and their union that the strike be considered an unfair labor practice strike. Thus at the meeting preceding the strike Neurohr and Wolf had considerable incentive to refer to North American's refusal to provide information (or, at least, to testify that they made such references), even if they did not care about North American's failure to provide information and even if they thought the employees felt the same way.

Third, the record tells us nothing about the thoughts of the employees (other than Neurohr) as they went out on strike.

Fourth, in the normal course of events one would expect that, from an employee's viewpoint, an employer's failure to provide information would be wholly overshadowed by other kinds of issues. In this case those other issues would be the expiration of the collective-bargaining contract and North American's adamant refusal to provide for job transfer rights.[15]

[10] Reply dated 12 November 1987.

[11] The UMWA's last request for information did not refer to the holdings of North American's subsidiaries and joint ventures. However, earlier requests did and North American apparently understood that last request to encompass such entities. See North American's Br. p. 2.

[14] E.g., American Gypsum Co., 285 NLRB 100 (1987); Citizens National Bank, 245 NLRB 389, 391 (1979).

Ultimately, it seems to me, the question is whether Neurohr's and Wolf's statements to the employees raise a presumption that the employees' states of mind reflected those statements when the employees opted to strike. If so, it was up to North American to prove that that was not the case. If not, the General Counsel did not present a prima facie case.[16]

Whatever the answer might be, if the slate was clean, it appears that the Board has resolved the question. Credible evidence that the employer's unfair labor practices were referred to in the course of the meeting of employees that led to the strike proves that the strike is an unfair labor practice strike, absent evidence to the contrary. American Gypsum Co., above; see also Buffalo Concrete, above at 841–842 (1985); Struthers Wells Corp. v. NLRB, 721 F.2d 465 (3d Cir. 1983).[17]

I accordingly conclude that the strike by the employees of North American's Indian Head Mine was an unfair labor strike from its inception on 1 November 1987.[18]

THE REMEDY

The accompanying recommended Order requires North American to provide the information sought by the UMWA.[19] The recommended Order also requires North American to reinstate striking members of the bargaining unit in the event any such strikers unconditionally ask for reinstatement, dismissing, if necessary, employees hired on or after 1 November as replacements, and requires North American to pay backpay commencing 5 days after any such striker makes an unconditional offer to return to work. Such employees' loss of earnings shall be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1980), with interest computed in accordance with New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[20]

The General Counsel urges that the recommended Order include a visitatorial provision authorizing the Board to engage in discovery, if necessary, to monitor compliance with the Order. The facts of this case do not warrant the imposition of this kind of provision. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[21]

ORDER

The Respondent, The North American Coal Corporation, Bismarck, North Dakota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with the International Union, United Mine Workers of America (UMWA), as the exclusive bargaining representative of the members of the bargaining unit at the Respondent's Indian Head Mine, by refusing to furnish the UMWA with information relevant to the effects on the members of the bargaining unit of a possible closing of the Indian Head Mine.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Provide the UMWA with the information specifying the location of the leases and coal-related assets within the State of North Dakota of the Respondent and its subsidiaries and joint ventures.

(b) On their unconditional offer to return to work, offer to all unfair labor practice strikers immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority of any other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, any persons hired by the Respondent on or after 1 November 1987, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's refusal, if any, to reinstate them in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

[15] On at least one occasion the Board had held that an employer's unlawful failure to provide information was a cause of a strike. Buffalo Concrete, 276 NLRB 839 (1985). But the information the union sought there at least arguably was more directly related to the employees' concerns than is the case here.

[16] The General Counsel has the burden of proving that a strike is an unfair labor practice. See Tufts Bros., 235 NLRB 808, 810–811 (1978).

[17] There would have been no strike, of course, had the UMWA and North American been able to reach agreement. It is conceivable that had North American provided the requested information, the UMWA could have come up with a job security proposal satisfactory to North American and that North American and the UMWA would subsequently have entered into a collective-bargaining agreement. If it were probable that an agreement would have been reached but for North American's refusal to provide the information, that might alone be enough to prove that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike, whatever thoughts the employees might have had about why they were going out on strike. See Brooks, Inc., 228 NLRB 1365, 1367 fn. 12 (1977). The likelihood that the UMWA and North American would have reached agreement had the Union gotten the information is too remote for the theory to apply.

[18] North American argues that it is premature to consider in this proceeding whether the strike is an unfair labor practice strike since the strike is ongoing and since (as of the end of the hearing, at least) no employees have made unconditional offers to return. And it is true that the General Counsel could properly have litigated in a subsequent proceeding the question of whether the strike is an unfair labor practice strike. E.g., International Business Systems, 258 NLRB 181, 193 (1981), enfd. mem. 701 F.2d 158 (3d Cir. 1983). But the Board long ago concluded that an appropriate alternative approach is to deal with that question in the proceeding that considers the actions alleged to constitute the underlying unfair labor practice, even though the strike is then still underway. J. H. Rutter-Rex Mfg. Co., 115 NLRB 388, 414 (1956), enfd. 245 F.2d 594, 597–598 (5th Cir. 1957); Louisville Chair Co., 161 NLRB 358, 376 (1966), enfd. 385 F.2d 922 (6th Cir. 1967). (For a recent example of a ruling by the Board that an ongoing strike was a unfair labor practice strike see Port Plastics, 279 NLRB 362 (1986).)

[19] North American urges that "the only entity that should be required to produce . . . information is North American"—not "North American's nonparty subsidiaries or affiliates." Br. at 12–13. North American's point is well taken and I do not understand the General Counsel to argue otherwise. That does not, however, excuse North American from producing information about the leases and coal-related assets of its subsidiaries and joint ventures, to the extent that such information is available to North American. See fns. 10 and 11, above, and the related text.

[20] Under New Horizons, interest is computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621.

[21] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Indian Head Mine copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[22] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[22] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

I. REGARDING OUR FAILURE TO PROVIDE INFORMATION TO THE UMWA

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with the International Union, United Mine Workers of America, by refusing to furnish the UMWA with information relevant to the effects on employees of a possible closing of the Indian Head Mine.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL tell the UMWA where in North Dakota we and our subsidiaries and joint ventures have leases and coal-related assets.

II. REGARDING REINSTATEMENT AND OTHER RIGHTS OF STRIKING EMPLOYEES

On the unconditional offer to return to work of any Indian Head Mine employees who are on strike against us:

WE WILL offer to reinstate them to their former jobs without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights and privileges. If those jobs no longer exist when the employees unconditional offer to return to work, we will reinstate the employees in substantially equivalent positions.

WE WILL, if necessary in order to reinstate such employees, dismiss any persons we hired on or after 1 November 1987.

WE WILL make whole such employees for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of our refusal, if any, to reinstate them.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On February 23, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Joel A. Harmatz issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

1. As discussed below, we affirm the judge's finding that the Respondent lawfully withdrew recognition from the Union on February 23, 1981.

The record indicates that between February 19 and 21, 1981, during the pendency of a blocked decertification petition, the Respondent received written statements from 21 of the 35 unit employees indicating that they no longer desired union representation. Based on these statements, the Respondent notified the Union on February 23, 1981, that it was withdrawing recognition. The judge found that the Respondent withdrew recognition as a result of clear and unambiguous evidence that the Union had lost majority support. He found no evidence that the employees' statements lacked authenticity or that they were tainted by the Respondent's sponsorship or participation.[2] Nor did the judge find any nexus between the Respondent's wage increase to employee Perry,[3] which the judge found violative of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, and the repudiation of the Union, 8 months later, by 60 percent of the unit. Based on this record evidence, the judge concluded that the Respondent lawfully withdrew recognition from the Union.

In excepting to the finding that the Respondent lawfully withdrew recognition, the General Counsel argues that the judge failed to consider employee expressions of union support and that the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition was prohibited while the decertification petition was pending. We disagree.

The evidence of employee support for the Union is ambiguous at best and is nullified by the majority's subsequent repudiation of the Union in late February 1981. Further, since the Respondent, in apparent good faith, withdrew recognition based on tangible evidence of loss of majority support, its withdrawal was lawful, notwithstanding the pending decertification petition. As the Board stated in Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088, 1089 fn. 7 (1982): "[I]f an employer is presented with a valid decertification petition supported by a majority of the unit employees, it may be privileged to withdraw from bargaining." We similarly recognized in RCA Del Caribe, Inc., 262 NLRB 963, 965 fn. 13 (1982), that, during the pendency of a question concerning representation, an employer in good faith may withdraw recognition based on objective considerations.[4] Accordingly, we agree that the Respondent lawfully withdrew recognition and dismissed the 8(a)(5) allegation.

2. We do not adopt, however, the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by unilaterally granting a 20-cent-per-hour wage increase to employee Perry on June 17, 1980. Thus, immediately after the increase, the Union filed a grievance under the extant collective-bargaining agreement claiming that the Respondent improperly reclassified Perry from labor grade 5-C to a labor grade 5-A position. The Respondent defended the reclassification, and the attendant 20-cent-per-hour wage increase, under article VI, the contract's management-rights clause,[5] and article

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The parties stipulated to the authenticity of the employees' signatures. The General Counsel did not contend that the Respondent fostered or supported the employees' statements.

[3] We correct the judge's inadvertent error in sec. III,B,1,(a), par. 2, to reflect that Kay Perry received the wage increase in 1980. We also note that Don Baird, the Respondent's production manager, admitted that Union Steward Jefferson never agreed to an increase of Perry's wages.

[4] See also Hemet Casting Co., 260 NLRB 437, 446 (1982); GAF Corp., 195 NLRB 169, 170 (1972). To the extent Turbodyne Corp., 226 NLRB 522, 525 (1976), and Mervyn's, 240 NLRB 54, 60 (1979), can be read to preclude an otherwise lawful withdrawal of recognition during the pendency of a question concerning representation, we expressly overrule them.

Member Cracraft did not participate in Dresser Industries or RCA Del Caribe. Although she agrees with the propositions for which they are cited above, she does not pass on any other aspects of those cases.

[5] Art. VI provides, inter alia, that:

> Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the sole and exclusive rights of management which are not abridged by this Agreement include, but are not limited to, the full and exclusive control, direction and supervision of the work force; the hire, promotion, demotion, transfer . . . and the assignment of work to employees without restriction.

XXXI that provided, in relevant part, that "Employees may be hired at rates above the minimum set forth in Schedule A [the contract wage scale] if the Company determines that their skills so warrant." Although the judge found that the Respondent had at least a colorable contract defense to the unfair labor practice charge, he, nonetheless, found a violation "rest[ing] simply upon the more appropriate interpretation" of the contract. We disagree. Where, as here, the dispute is solely one of contract interpretation, and there is no evidence of animus, bad faith, or an intent to undermine the Union, we will not seek to determine which of two equally plausible contract interpretations is correct. NCR Corp., 271 NLRB 1212, 1213 (1984). Accordingly, we find no 8(a)(5) violation.

3. Nor do we adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on March 10, 1981, by unilaterally granting employees a wage increase, floating holiday, and increased sickness and accident benefits. The judge found these increases unlawful on the theory that, during the pending question concerning representation, the Respondent's grant of benefits presumptively had the unlawful purpose of influencing employees in their selection of a bargaining representative. Because the Respondent did not rebut this presumption by establishing that the increases were justified by legitimate business considerations, instead of being made to impede Board decertification procedures, the judge found the increases violative of Section 8(a)(1). We disagree.

In the unusual circumstances of this case, where (1) as we find below, the increases were not discriminatorily motivated, (2) the Respondent had already, as we have now concluded, lawfully withdrawn recognition from the Union, and (3) for the reasons explained below, there was no cognizable election in prospect at the time the increases were made, we cannot conclude that the Respondent is properly chargeable with coercing the employees' choice in the election or otherwise impeding the Board's decertification procedures. Although the Regional Director did not in fact dismiss the decertification petition until August 23, 1982, the petition should have been dismissed on the issuance of the complaint on the 8(a)(5) charge alleging an unlawful withdrawal of recognition. See NLRB Casehandling Manual, Part I, Unfair Labor Practice Proceedings, Section 11730.3. Although there may be a theoretical basis for a finding that the Respondent's grant of benefits could interfere with employee free choice in a decertification election, where, as here, because of the prior lawful withdrawal of recognition and eventual dismissal of the petition, no election was ever held (and when the decertification petition should properly have been dismissed even earlier), we cannot conclude that it effectuates the purposes of the Act to find that the grant of benefits violated the Act in this respect.

4. Although we agree with the judge that the Respondent's March 10, 1981 unilateral increase in wages and benefits did not violate Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, we do so for the following reasons.[6] The General Counsel offered no evidence that the Respondent granted the floating holiday and increased sickness and accident benefits in order to undermine union support. Nor, under all of the record evidence, has the General Counsel established that the March 10, 1981 wage increase was discriminatorily motivated. The Respondent granted the increase more than 1 year after the previous employee wage increase. Although the amount of this increase exceeded that which the Respondent offered, or was willing to propose in negotiations, this alone does not render the increase unlawful. During negotiations, the Respondent was proposing figures based on a 3-year contract package rather than on a single increase. Moreover, following the withdrawal, the Respondent considered additional factors when setting the amount of its wage increase including local market conditions, comparable pay, and preservation of employee skills. The fact that, as a result of its withdrawal of recognition, more funds were available for it to address these additional concerns merely reflects a realistic assessment of the Respondent's new position following its withdrawal of recognition. It does not, standing alone, prove unlawful motivation. Nor has the General Counsel demonstrated discriminatory intent. Accordingly, we dismiss the 8(a)(3) allegations.

5. Finally, as we find that the Respondent has not violated the Act, we agree with the judge that a bargaining order is unwarranted in this case.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

[6] We expressly disavow the judge's finding that Sec. 8(a)(3) is limited to discriminatorily motivated "detriments." Benefits, as well as detriments, imposed for a proscribed object, violate Sec. 8(a)(3). Flite Chief, Inc., 220 NLRB 1112, 1120 (1975), enfd. 626 F.2d 866 (9th Cir. 1977). DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL A. HARMATZ, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding was heard by me on September 29 and 30, 1982, in Washington, North Carolina, on an original unfair labor practice charge filed on October 23, 1980, and a consolidated complaint issued December 3, 1981, which, as amended, alleged that Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by inducing employees to withdraw union support by offering possible wage increases and by threatening employees with discharge for engaging in union activity, and violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, by increasing the wages and benefits of employees represented by the Union. The complaint further alleged that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the majority representative of employees in the appropriate unit, and by making various unilateral changes, without notifying the Union, in terms and conditions of work of employees in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit. In its duly filed answer, Respondent denied that any unfair labor practices were committed. Following close of the hearing, briefs were filed on behalf of the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and the Respondent.

On the entire record in this proceeding[1] including consideration of the posthearing briefs, and my opportunity directly to observe the witnesses while testifying as well as their demeanor, I find as follows

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

Respondent is a Massachusetts corporation with a plant located in Washington, North Carolina, the sole facility involved in this proceeding, from which it is engaged in the manufacture of special valves used by power plants and in marine turbines in the petro-chemical industry. In the course of the operation, during the calendar year preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent received goods and raw materials from points located directly outside the State of North Carolina, which exceeded $50,000 in value, and manufactured and shipped directly to points outside the State of North Carolina, products valued in excess of $50,000.

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is now and has been at all times material an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and it is found that Local 1204, and its International, United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (collectively as the Union) are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Preliminary Statement

Basically at stake in this proceeding is the question of whether statutory remedies ought be invoked to enforce continued recognition of a previously certified representative, an issue that finds its origin in an initial organizational campaign waged in 1979. Thus, on July 26, 1979, the Union was designated in a Board-conducted election as representative of Respondent's production and maintenance employees at the Washington, North Carolina plant by a vote of 32 for union representation, 29 against, with 1 challenged ballot. Within a few days, on August 3, 1979, the Union was certified and shortly thereafter negotiations commenced on August 14, 1979, continuing until January 28, 1980, when 1-year agreement was executed.[2] However, the first year of this newly founded relationship was marked by controversy, including suggestions that employees were disenchanted with their statutory representative as well as charges by the Union as to foul play in the Employer's approach to employee organizational rights. The latter was memorialized in extensive unfair labor practice charges filed by the Union on October 23, 1980,[3] and the instant consolidated complaint, which, inter alia, includes allegations that between May 12 and June 16, 1980, the Respondent engaged in the conduct outlined below:

1. In June 1980, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), through Supervisor Robert Hines having offered "employees the possibility of increased wages and other benefits if they abandoned their support for the Union. . . ."

2. On June 18, 1980, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) through Supervisor Matthew Reddick's and on June 20, 1980, through Don Baird's having, "Threatened its employees with discharge for engaging in union activities."

3. On May 12, 1980, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by reclassifying and granting a wage increase to employees "unilaterally, without notifying the Union. . . ."

4. On June 9 and 16, 1980, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when it "unilaterally refused to allow stewards to file grievances."

Against the foreground of this alleged misconduct, a decertification petition was filed on behalf of employees on November 26, 1980. The petition was timely filed, and would have been processed to election but for the pending unfair labor practice charges. Well after issuance of the instant complaint, the petition was dismissed by the Regional Director on August 23, 1982, almost 20 months after filing.

In the interim, notwithstanding pendency of the petition, contract renewal negotiations opened on January 14, 1981.[4] Thereafter, on January 28, the expiration date of the agreement, negotiations were adjourned indefinitely, with the parties unable to achieve an accomodation.

[1] Following close of the hearing, counsel for the General Counsel and Respondent both moved to correct the official transcript in certain particulars. Certain errors in the transcript are noted and corrected.

[2] See G.C. Exh. 2.

[3] See G.C. Exh. 1(a).

[4] Unless otherwise indicated all dates refer to 1981.

It is noted that the complaint does not in any respect challenge the propriety of Respondent's conduct in connection with or in the course of these negotiations.

Thereafter, a further bargaining session was scheduled through the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service for February 23. However, an illness of the Company's chief spokesman led to postponement until February 28. In the interim, however, between February 19 and 23, 21 of the 35 employees in the appropriate unit at that time submitted statements to Respondent to the effect that they no longer wished to be represented by Local 1204.[5]

Based on the foregoing, by letter dated February 23, 1981, Respondent informed the Union, as follows:

> On Friday, a substantial majority of our employees informed us, in writing, that they no longer want the UE or Local 1204 of the UE to represent them. Because of this, we now have a good faith doubt that your union represents a majority of the employees in the unit certified by the NLRB.
> Accordingly, we cannot continue to recognize Local 1204 as the collective bargaining representative of these employees and will no longer deal with your union as their representative in matters pertaining to wages, hours and working conditions.[6]

As indicated, the issue of primary concern in this proceeding is whether, in the face of clear and undisputed repudiation by an employee majority, the bargaining relationship should be reestablished by a remedial order. Three distinct theories are advanced in quest of such relief. The first is found on a claim that repudiation of the Union was tainted by the Employer's unlawful conduct. Thus, it is contended that Respondent unlawfully inspired the erosion of the Union's majority by various unfair labor practices outlined above and hence, Respondent should be deemed obligated to continue to recognize and bargain with the Union until redress of the illegalities. See, e.g., Chet Monez Ford, 241 NLRB 349 (1972), enfd. sub nom. NLRB v. Chet Monez Ford, 624 F.2d 193 (9th Cir. 1980). In the alternative, it is argued on behalf of the complaint that even if no unfair labor practices were committed during the period prior to the employee defections, a bargaining order would nonetheless be justified on the basis of changes in working conditions unilaterally effected by the Employer after the withdrawal of recognition, but before the Board had an opportunity to resolve the question concerning representation raised by a then pending decertification petition. See Turbodyne Corp., 226 NLRB 522 (1976). To support this alternative view, the complaint includes allegations that further unfair labor practices were committed by the Respondent between March and May 1981, particularized as follows:

1. On March 10, 1981, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by increasing the wages and benefits of its employees.

2. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by on March 20, 1981, refusing to negotiate with the Union concerning health and safety matters.

3. On May 1, 1981, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by unilaterally, and without notifying the Union, restoring the canteen rights of employees.

As its final alternative position, the General Counsel proposes that as per Michigan Products, 236 NLRB 1143 (1978), since the postwithdrawal unfair labor practices precluded the possibility of a fair election on the decertification petition remedial bargaining order is warranted under the auspices of NLRB v. Gissel Mfg. Co., 393 U.S. 575 (1969).

Basically, by way of defense, Respondent urges that the consolidated complaint be dismissed in its entirety in that it engaged in no unlawful conduct either before or after it withdrew recognition from the Union on the basis of indisputable evidence that a majority of the employees had rejected union representation.

B. Concluding Findings

1. The prewithdrawal unfair labor practices

a. The wage increase and alleged reclassification

This allegation rests on a wage increase granted to a single employee, Kay Perry, during the term of the collective-bargaining agreement. At times material Perry was a documents clerk, a labor grade 5-C position. Prior to the events in issue here, she earned $4.44, the top rate for her classification under the contractual wage schedule. Documentary and parole evidence discloses that on June 17, 1980, while the collective-bargaining agreement was in effect, Perry's hourly rate was increased to $4.64. Respondent explained this action as triggered by termination of Perry's former supervisor on May 9, 1980, which promoted a review of her job classification. According to Don Baird, Respondent's production manager, he evaluated Perry's performance and based thereon determined that in view of her duties, at least since his arrival at the plant, particularly the responsibility she exercised independently, a 20-cent-hour increase was justified.

As indicated, the increase was not granted until June 17, 1981. The testimony is in conflict as to what transpired in the interim. According to Baird, about May 12, he contacted Ronnie Jefferson, the chief union steward, to inquire whether the Union had any objection to the increase. Jefferson indicated that he was unsure that it would be a problem, but wanted to talk to the union committee. Thereafter, Baird and Jefferson had several conversations in which, according to Baird, it was indicated that the Union had no problems with the increase in Perry's rate, but wanted other positions upgraded as well, particularly that held by Sharon Grice. Baird claims to have examined Grice's job classification, and to have informed Jefferson that she was appropriately placed in the 5-A labor grade. Baird also claims that conversations concerning the increase took place on at least a half dozen occasions and continued over a period of "some weeks." Finally, according to Baird, on June 16, he informed Allen that he was going to give Perry the increase.

[5] See R. Exhs. 4(a) thru (u) and R. Exh. 12. The General Counsel does not contend that the Company in any way fostered or solicited the withdrawals, nor is it argued that these documents either lacked authenticity or constituted insubstantial proof of loss of majority.

[6] See G.C. Exh. 9.

b. Alleged 8(a)(5) and (1) Violation

Jefferson testified to the effect that his conversations with Baird concerning Perry's wage increase were confined to a single day. He related that Baird first informed him of the Company's intention in this respect on June 11, 1980, in the front office, requesting that Jefferson inform the "committee." Then, after Jefferson assertedly consulted with Union President Allen Roberson and Vice President William Roach, he avers that he again discussed the matter with Baird after lunch, indicating that the matter would have to be negotiated. Later that same day, according to Jefferson, Baird approached him in the weld shop, stating "he already gave Kay Perry a raise on May 12th" and he did not have to negotiate "under management rights."[7]

Baird also testified that he did not decide to effect the increase until after he discussed the matter with Allen Roberson, the Local's president. Baird claims that he went to Roberson's work station where he told him that he had reached an impasse with Jefferson and wanted to put the increase into effect if the Union had no objection. According to Baird, Roberson also expressed that he had no objection to the Perry raise, but wanted to upgrade Sharon Grice. This was denied by Roberson, who claimed that he received no notification from the Company concerning Perry's wage increase, but instead first learned of the matter when Jefferson reported that Baird told him that the raise had been already placed in effect.[8] Although I credit Baird's testimony in its essential particulars, I believe as a matter of hindsight he merely interpreted the Union's position as tantamount to assent to the Perry increase. I do not, however, accept that this was the case.[9] The absence of such assent is determinative. For, on analysis it is concluded that the rate ranges set forth in the governing collective-bargaining agreement could not be altered unilaterally under any circumstances. Thus, whether an impasse was reached on the Company's professed desire in this respect is immaterial, for as stated in Fourco Glass Co., 250 NLRB 953 (1980), enfd. denied 646 F.2d 863 (4th Cir. 1981):

> Section 8(d) of the Act clearly provides that neither party to a collective-bargaining agreement is required "to discuss or agree to any modification of the terms and conditions contained in a contract for a fixed period, if such modification is to become effective before such terms and conditions can be reopened under the provisions of the contract." The fact that the Union was willing to listen to the proposal, and did not disagree that the proposal was not "fair and equitable," did not constitute a waiver of its rights under Section 8(d) of the Act.

Nor was the conduct excusable as affecting a subject matter that the Union had already bargained away. For neither the management rights clause set forth in article VI nor the reference to flexibility conferred in connection with rates of new hires in article XXXI, section C, constituted a clear and unequivocal waiver on the part of the Union with respect to any form of revision of the agreed-upon rate schedule be it upward or downward.[10] Thus, Respondent's action, in granting the increase, without first obtaining agreement of the Union, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[11]

There are a number of circumstances, however, that mitigate the scope and extent of this violation. First, only one employee was involved. Further, there is no evidence that the matter was subject to direct dealing between any official of Respondent and Perry, the employee affected.[12] Moreover, unlike cases involving a disparaging bypass, Respondent consulted the Union repeatedly seeking its assent, which in all probability, was withheld due to the Union's opportunistic effort to exert leverage for upward revision in the wage scale covering other jobs, which in the Union's view were underpaid. Finally, Respondent's defense that the contract did not prohibit merit increases over and above rates specified in the contract was at least colorable. Hence, the conclusion as to the unfair labor practice rests slimly upon the more appropriate interpretation that the Employer was so restrained, and that, having acted without union assent, the increase technically violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

2. The alleged promise of benefits

The General Counsel looks to testimony of employees Billy Roberson and Ricky Woolard to substantiate the assertion that Supervisor Robert Hines unlawfully stated in June 1980 that it was possible that wages would have been higher had the Union not been in the plant. Thus, Woolard testified that in that time frame he and Hines were engaged in conversation in his work area when Woolard stated that he had heard that if the Union had not gotten in he would not have a job. Hines responded that Woolard was probably right. According to Woolard, as the conversation continued, he inquired of Hines whether employees would have gotten a larger raise if there were no union. To this, Hines allegedly responded "possibly . . . you would have probably got double." Woolard asserts that he then asked, "What, we would have got a bigger raise?" To this, Hines allegedly responded, "yeah," but then recanted, stating: "No, I didn't mean it that way." According to Woolard, Hines also stated that "the atmosphere would probably be better without a union . . . we'd probably have canteen rights."[13]

[7] Jefferson in effect denied that the Union's sole objection to Kay Perry's pay increase was based on its claim that Sharon Grice should also receive an increase.

[8] In this respect Roberson's testimony seems to conflict with that of Jefferson who indicated that he consulted Roberson and Roach before he was informed by Baird that the increase had already been placed in effect. Roach was not examined about his involvement in the matter.

[9] Note that on June 17, 1980, the Union filed a grievance alleging that the "Company is knowly [sic] changed the contract in Schedule A. . . ." See R. Exh. 8. The Company's response omitted any claim that the Union had assented to this change, a response that would have been the most obvious, particularly since the answer was prepared at the third step by Baird himself.

[10] See, e.g., Hilton Hotels Corp., 191 NLRB 283, 288 (1971); Press Co., 121 NLRB 976, 977–978 (1958); NLRB v. Perkins Machine Co., 326 F.2d 488, 489 (1st Cir. 1964).

[11] Oak Cliff-Golman Baking Co., 207 NLRB 1063 (1973).

[12] Perry was reputed to be an antiunion employee, and she did in fact file the decertification petition in November 1980. However, evidence received failed to disclose just when she developed such a posture or whether Respondent was mindful of it at the time of the instant wage increase. In this latter connection, although the General Counsel attempted to examine Baird as to his knowledge in this respect, when objection was interposed and I sought to be educated as to relevance, the General Counsel elected to withdraw, rather than clarify the pertinence of his examination.

Billy Roberson was able to corroborate Woolard only to a limited extent. On direct examination, he afforded the following:

> I hear Robert Hines tell Ricky Woolard that if we didn't have a union, we would get more money. And then Ricky Woolard reply and said what he said, "If the union wasn't in, we would have got more money?" And Robert Hines reply, he said, "No, I didn't mean it like that." Then I had to go to the tool crib to get a tool and that's all I heard of that discussion.[14]

Hines denied making any statement to the effect that wage rates or benefits were influenced by the presence of the Union. I credit him. He impressed me as a straightforward witness, whom I regarded as credible. I also consider it unlikely that he would have ventured to express the views imputed to him by Union Steward Woolard. Beyond Roberson, and although three other employees were present, there was no further corroboration of Woolard, who was a particularly unpersuasive witness and who seemingly allowed a bias to influence his accounting of the facts in several additional areas. His testimony concerning this incident, to the extent that it transcended wages and related to other benefits, was uncorroborating and lacked a plausible ring. Also questionable was testimony of corroborating witness Roberson, who claimed to be 8 feet away, and who admittedly heard only a segment of the conversation. It was not my impression that Roberson was possessed of capacity for recall sufficient to allow attestation as to the substance of the exchange on the occasion in question. I sum, based on Hines' credited denial, the 8(a)(1) allegation in this respect shall be dismissed.

C. Threats of Discharge

The complaint imputes coercive threats to Supervisor Matthew Reddick on June 18, 1980, and to Plant Manager Baird, on June 20, 1980. As for Reddick, the allegation rests on the uncorroborated testimony of Ricky Woolard. By way of background, it is noted that on Saturday, June 14, a barbecue was held by employees to raise funds for the Union. Certain employees were scheduled to work overtime that day, including Carlton Gurley, who elected to attend the barbecue, rather than work. On the next working day, Monday, June 16, 1980, Supervisor Reddick met with Gurley in the presence of Woolard, who was present as Gurley's steward. Later that day, Gurley was called to the office of Plant Manager Baird and discharged.[15] According to Woolard, about 2:30 p.m., Reddick walked by and simply commented either "you're next" or "who's next." It is not clear that the alleged remarks were made before or after the Gurley discharge. In any event, Reddick denied making any such comment, and here again, I regarded the testimony of Woolard as unreliable. It was my impression that Woolard was incapable of recalling details with any degree of clarity and, indeed, the certainty he expressed when cross-examined about what he possibly could have heard at the time was highly suspect and convinced that his overall testimony was more a product of perspective reshaped by strong union alliances, than an accurate accounting of events as they had occurred. The allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) through any threatening remark on the part of Reddick is dismissed.

As for Baird, it is noted that Respondent, in June 1980, filed an unfair labor practice charge alleging that Local 1204 had engaged in unlawful coercion of employees. In connection therewith, an agent of the National Labor Relations Board interviewed William Roach, a union vice president and shop steward, informing him that he had been charged with "threatening employees." According to Roach, the next day he had a conversation with coworker Tommy Hardison in which the latter inquired as to what the labor investigator wanted, whereupon Roach stated to Hardinson "he wanted to see me over some lies . . . told on me."[16]

According to Baird, Chandler, after he had been questioned by the Board agent, reported to Baird that Roach told Chandler, Hardinson, and Shelton Lilley that they "were playing games with their lives."[17] He claimed that he discussed the matter with Hardinson and Lilley who confirmed Chandler's report.[18] Baird relates that he then called Roach to his office and told him that he would not tolerate threats by one employee to another and that if Roach did that again he would be terminated.

[13] At the time, the Company was interpreting the collective-bargaining agreement as confining employee access to the canteen to scheduled breaks.

[14] In his prehearing affidavit given to the General Counsel, Roberson described what he heard as follows:

> I hear Robert Hines say that if the Union wasn't in the plant, we would have probably got more money. Woolard said to him in a loud voice, what he said that if the union is voted out, we would get more money? Hines said, "I didn't mean that like that." Then I left my station to get something and I did not hear any more of this conversation.

[15] Woolard did not participate in the discharge interview as Gurley then was represented by Chief Steward Ronnie Jefferson.

[16] Hardinson testified that he had a conversation with Roach, in the presence of coworker Jermi Chandler. He claims that at the time they were "just screwing around," but that they discussed that " somebody filed a charge and Roach had threatened their life for doing that." In this context Hardison asserted that Roach said something about "some people like to play games with their life." Hardison went on to testify that Chandler informed him that he would file charges to the effect that Roach had threatened his life. Later, Hardison was called as a rebuttal witness for the General Counsel, it is difficult to comprehend the statement of the latter's posthearing brief to the effect that "no evidence was proffered of any alleged threats made by Roach."

[17] The testimony of Hardinson confirms that Roach used language to the effect that any employee who accused him of misconduct in the course of an investigation by the National Labor Relations Board would be "playing with their lives."

[18] Although Hardinson denied that he discussed the matter with Baird, this aspect of his testimony was probably incorrect.

Baird also indicated that he would again file charges with the National Labor Relations Board.[19]

The General Counsel maintains that "there is not one item of evidence to support Respondent's contention that Roach threatened any employee." In the light of Hardinson's testimony, an observation possessed of greater accuracy and pertinence would be to the effect that there is not one iota of evidence to support the General Counsel's contention that Baird's warning in any sense related to any protected activity on the part of Roach. Contrary to the position advanced in support of this allegation, the General Counsel's own evidence discloses that Roach's alleged misconduct was the focus of a Board investigation and that Roach plainly implied that those giving evidence in that connection "were playing with their lives." The General Counsel's evidence further discloses that another employee, Chandler, was sufficiently disturbed by this remark to call it to the attention of management.[20] When this information reached Baird, he called Roach in and warned him that such misconduct in the future would result in discharge.[21]

Accordingly, I find that the statements made by Baird to Roach on the occasion in question constituted a legitimate exercise of management's right to correct employee improprieties and to maintain plant discipline. Finally, under no circumstances could it be fairly concluded that the action was in any way prompted by Roach's having participated in activity protected by the Act. Hence, the 8(a)(1) allegation in this respect shall be dismissed.

1. Refusal to permit stewards to file grievances

The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act because it, "on or about June 9, 1980 and June 16, 1980, unilaterally refused to allow stewards to file grievances." At the core of this allegation is Respondent's position taken in defense of certain grievances that, in its opinion, were not processed in accordance with the procedure defined in article II of the then subsisting collective-bargaining agreement and the condition set forth in section 4 thereof that "Failure on the Union's part to follow the steps of the grievance procedure shall be considered just cause for the grievance to be dropped."

Under the contract, step one requires that "the grievance be taken up by the effected employee with his immediate supervisor . . . the employee may have a shop steward from his area present if the employee so desires." In reliance on this language, Respondent denied two grievances at the third step. The first related to the discharge of Gurley and the second involved a warning issued to Al Roberson. Both grievances were denied by Respondent on grounds that a step one grievance had not been filed with respect to either.

The central focus of this allegation is on Machine Shop Supervisor Matthew Reddick. It is claimed that Reddick precluded the step one filing of the above grievances of Gurley and Roberson. It will be recalled that Gurley and Roberson declined to work mandatory overtime on Saturday, June 14, 1980. Gurley's failure to work the overtime generated several meetings the following Monday, June 16. At the second meeting, Gurley, Shop Steward Rickey Woolard, Matthew Reddick, and Lee Penrod, Respondent's operation manager, were present. Woolard and Gurley agree that during this session Woolard indicated that he wanted to file a grievance. At this juncture, according to Gurley, Penrod inquired of Woolard, "Why do you want to file a grievance since nothing's happened . . . there's no charge been charged against this man."[22] Both Woolard and Gurley agreed that at the time of this conference Gurley had received no warning, nor had Gurley been otherwise subject to discipline. It was also conceded that no one attempted to file a first step grievance at any time after Gurley's discharge, and there is no evidence whatever that a second grievance was ever processed in this respect.

Reddick, while denying that he ever precluded the filing of a grievance, acknowledge that, in the conference with Woolard and Gurley, Woolard indicated that he wished to file a grievance.[23] In response to this request, Reddick asked Woolard, "What was the grievance . . . all I was asking for was why he was not at work on Saturday."[24]

Contrary to the General Counsel and the Charging Party, the position of Reddick in connection with Gurley in no way impeded access to contractual remedies with respect to any matter within the jurisdiction of the contractually defined grievance machinery. Under the expressed terms of the subsisting collective-bargaining agreement, a grievance is defined as "a difference of opinion between the company and the union or any employee in the company as to the interpretation, application or compliance with the provisions of this agreement." At the time of Woolard's request, discipline had not even been threatened in the case of Gurley, no detrimental action had been taken, and, hence, there certainly was no foundation for grieving a discharge or other discipline. Also, there was no perceptible dispute subject to adjustment as between the parties. In such circumstances, the position taken by Reddick impressed me as perfectly rational and hardly inimical to the scope and intent of the dispute settlement machinery negotiated by the parties. Indeed, that this action in no way prejudiced the Union's access to the grievance procedure was evident from the testimony of Chief Steward Ronnie Jefferson, who accompanied Gurley to the front office when the latter was terminated. Jefferson acknowledged that in the course of that meeting he attempted to file a grievance with respect to the discharge, but Baird informed him that the Union was required to comply with the grievance procedure by initiating a grievance at step one. Nonetheless, for reasons unclear on the record, the Union elected to pursue the matter directly to the third step where the grievance was denied on grounds that it was not processed through the first two steps of the grievance procedure as required. See G.C. Exh. 15.[25]

[19] Although the General Counsel in his brief states that Baird did not accuse Roach of threatening anybody, Roach's own testimony discloses that Baird accused him of "running around threatening people."

[20] The General Counsel urges that an adverse inference be drawn against Respondent by virtue of its failure to call Chandler or Lilley. Any inference supportive of the complaint that could be drawn in this respect was neutralized by the account of Hardinson, which confirms the basis for Baird's action, by pointing out the threatening remark as well as the fact that fellow employee Chandler was sufficiently disturbed to report the matter and declare his intention to file charges. Furthermore, Hardinson's own subjective reaction to Roach's statement is beside the point in evaluating the coercive nature thereof.

[21] The General Counsel's reliance on NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21 (1964), is misplaced. The holding and rationale in that case pertains soley to discipline imposed, albeit in good faith, under mistaken belief that an employee engaged in misconduct in the course of acknowledged protected activity. Unless an employee's displeasure with the fact that a coworker elects to cooperate with a Board investigator is to be deemed protected, it taxes imagination as to just how this allegation relates to conduct protected by Sec. 7 of the Act.

[22] Lee Penrod, Respondent's operation manager, was responsible for handling grievances at the second step. He testified without contradiction that he had never been requested to process a step two grievance with respect to the Gurley discharge.

[23] Woolard admitted that Carlton Gurley did not request a grievance in the confrontation with Reddick, but that it was Woolard himself who indicated that he had a grievance. However, the step one, in terms, seemingly requires that the employee himself file. As stated, "the grievance shall be taken by the affected employee with his immediate supervisor, and the employee may have the shop steward from his area present if the employee so desires."

[24] Woolard testified that his indication that he wanted to file a grievance was met by Reddick's response that "he [Reddick] would decide when it was the first step of grievance." Woolard's testimony was uncorroborated, seemed unlikely, and is rejected. Note that this was identical to an assertion contained in a grievance filed by Woolard, a week earlier on June 9, 1980. See R. Exh. 9.

In further support of the complaint, it is also alleged that Reddick precluded the filing of a grievance protesting a warning issued to Al Roberson, the president of Local 1204. It appears that Roberson, like Gurley, did not work scheduled overtime on Saturday, June 14.[26] Reddick gave the warning to Roberson at his machine the following Monday, June 16, under conditions described by Roberson as follows:[27]

> [Reddick] came up to me on Monday morning, during the day of Monday and asked me or told me that I had a written warning for not working four or five hours, and he asked me if I was going to sign it and I told him "no" and he said, "Well, do you want the steward present?" I said, "Yes." And so he went to the assembler and got my steward, which was Rickey Woolard; and Rickey Woolard came over, and when he got there, he said, "Are you going to sign this?" I said, "No." He said, "That's all I want to hear." I said, "Well, this is a grievance." I said, "Are you going to talk to him?" And Rickey said, "Right, this is a grievance and I want to talk to him." Reddick pointed his fingers at my steward and said, "You go back to your work area" and Rickey went back to his work area and I went back to work.

Woolard's version was not entirely consistent with that of Roberson. He related as follows:

> Q. What was said and by whom?
> A. Well, Matthew Reddick was telling Allen he was giving him a warning, a written warning for not coming to work that Saturday. And Allen told him, "consider this a first step of grievance."
> Q. What, if anything, was said after that?
> A. And Matthew said that there was no need for a first step of grievance. He say, "Take it to the second step."

The testimony of Roberson and Woolard takes on significance when considered in light of the fact that this grievance was rejected by Respondent at the third step on grounds that, like the Gurley discharge, it was "not processed through step 1 of the grievance procedure as required by Article 2, Section 4."[28]

Reddick denied that he had ever precluded the filing of a first step grievance and denied indicating to anyone that it was he who "made that decision whether an employee had a grievance."[29] Reddick specifically testified that there was never a first step grievance requested or filed in connection with the warning issued Roberson on June 16.

As indicated above, neither Roberson nor Woolard were impressive witnesses. On the other hand, Reddick struck me as believable, and under the total circumstances, his denial to the effect that he ever precluded anyone from filing a first step grievance seemed the more probable. Based on the above, it is concluded that neither Roberson nor Woolard requested a grievance in connection with the warning issued on June 16. There being no other evidence that any representative of the Respondent refused to accept or process a properly tendered grievance, the General Counsel has failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by unilaterally refusing to allow stewards to file grievances.

[25] The discharge was ultimately carried to arbitration. The arbitrator upheld the Company's position that pursuant to art. IV of the contract the Gurley grievance was not arbitrable as it was not processed in accordance with the requirements of art. II of the collective-bargaining agreement. In that view, I need not reach the question of whether deferral to the award is warranted under Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955). Disturbing, however, is the claim made by the General Counsel that that doctrine is inapposite because "the arbitrator expressly found it unnecessary to decide whether Woolard had attempted to file a first step grievance and made no findings as to whether Jefferson attempted to file a first step, or a second step grievance with Penrod." See General Counsel's posthearing Br. at 18. This reference is misleading and totally inaccurate. The arbitrator made the very findings attested to through evidence parallel to that presented by the General Counsel's witnesses in this proceeding concerning the ineffectual nature of the first step grievance attempted to be filed by Woolard. Furthermore, the award specifically concludes with respect to Jefferson that "no step 1 or step 2 grievance was ever filed." See R. Exh. 1, p. 9. Indeed, contrary to the factual assertion by the General Counsel that "the arbitrator did not find whether Respondent had prohibited Woolard and Jefferson from filing these grievances," it is apparent on the face of the award that the arbitrator concluded that this was not the case.

[26] See G.C. Exh. 17.

[27] Both Roberson and Reddick manifested some confusion stemming from the fact that on successive Saturdays Roberson refused to work scheduled overtime. He received warnings for each incident. Roberson claims to have attempted to file a grievance with respect to both warnings and that Reddick only refused to accept as to one. Both Reddick and Roberson had considerable difficulty isolating their recollection to the particular warning in controversy.

[28] See R. Exh. 3. During the preceding week, Roberson was given a warning for failing to work all of his scheduled overtime on Saturday, June 9. Woolard and Roberson concede that Reddick was informed that a first step grievance was being submitted with respect to that, and that Reddick accepted the grievance and discussed it. See R. Exh. 2.

[29] Reddick at one point testified that at the end of the conversation in which he delivered the written warning concerning Roberson's offense of June 14, Roberson indicated that the matter was to be "considered as a first step grievance." This apparent admission, however, was obviously the product of the same confusion concerning the two warnings labored under by Roberson and Woolard. Reddick in this instance is taken to have been commenting on the aftermath of Roberson's June 9 refusal to work overtime.

2. The withdrawal of recognition

It will be recalled that on November 26, 1980, a decertification petition was filed in Case 11-RD-323 during the open period prior to expiration of the subsisting collective-bargaining agreement. Despite the pendency, in January 1981, the Union and Respondent participated in contract renewal negotiations on eight separate occasions. Later, between February 19 and 21, a majority of the employees formally declared that they no longer wished union representation. Respondent was presented with this evidence and on the strength that it informed the Union by letter dated February 23, 1981, that recognition would be withdrawn.

In examining the contention that Respondent's termination of the bargaining relationship violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, it is emphasized that there is no claim or evidence in this proceeding that the defection by a majority of employees was tainted directly by employer solicitation or participation in the deauthorization process, or that the evidence of employee defection lacked authenticity.[30] Beyond that, in such a context, the controlling legal principles have been articulated succinctly in Terrell Machine Co., 173 NLRB 1480, 1480-1481 (1969):

> It is well settled that a certified union, upon expiration of the first year following its certification, enjoys a rebuttable presumption that its majority representative status continues. This presumption is designed to promote stability in collective-bargaining relationships, without impairing the free choice of employees. Accordingly, once the presumption is shown to be operative, prima facie case is established that an employer is obligated to bargain and that its refusal to do so would be unlawful. The prima facie case may be rebutted if the employer affirmatively establishes either (1) that at the time of the refusal the union in fact no longer enjoyed majority representative status; or (2) that the employer's refusal was predicated on a good-faith and reasonably grounded doubt of the union's continued majority status. As to the second of these, i.e., "good faith doubt," two prerequisities for sustaining the defense are that the asserted doubt must be based on objective considerations and it must not have been advanced for the purpose of gaining time which to undermine the union.

This second point means, in effect, the assertion of doubt must be raised "in a context free of unfair labor practices." With the foregoing in mind, it is noted that on the above findings made, the withdrawal of recognition followed a single solitary unfair labor practice founded on a wage increase granted by the Respondent, without union assent. The violation in question related to a 20-cent adjustment conferred on a single employee, which occurred 8 months before the loss of majority, and while limited to an isolated change in the contract, did in fact follow notification and consultation with the Union over an extended period. Respondent's offense in that regard was more technical than egregious in its unlawful elements. Thus, through my interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement, the consultation that took place did not fulfill Respondent's statutory obligation in that a change in substantive contract limitations was involved and nothing short of union assent to the merit increase would satisfy the rigid requirements of Section 8(d) in such a context.

On balance, the question presented is whether a violation of such limited magnitude should override the unambiguous choice registered by employees in February 1981. In this connection, it is noted that, under the precedent, not every unfair labor practice, which precedes renunciation of a union, will result in statutory resurrection of a bargaining relationship. Thus, where there is no rational basis for assuming that a causal relationship exists between an illegal act and a union's demise, Board remedies will not be invoked to perpetuate an unwanted bargaining relationship.[31] The analysis is a sensitive one, for under established policy the circumstances under which employees might reject an established representative are narrowly circumscribed, and a faultry determination might well imperil the exercise of employee choice for some time to come. For under Board policy, repudiation by employees of a union is deemed lacking in legal effect for a reasonable period of time following the issuance of a bargaining order. Indeed, the restraining impact that might be experienced by an unwilling majority through combined interaction of such an order and contract bar policy was previously reviewed by me in Deblin Mfg. Corp., 208 NLRB 392, 401 (1974), in which it was stated as follows:

> To . . . hold that Respondent was not free to assert a good faith doubt, would require an affirmative bargaining order, calculated to assure additional bargaining and ultimate agreement on a new contract which could bar an election for its duration. Recognizing the effect of such relief, and its impact > upon employee choice, the Board has sought to avoid the issuance of such an order, if based strictly on technical grounds, and where such relief would result in continued imposition of a bargaining representative on an unwilling majority, whose defection in no sense related to the prior unfair labor practice. Therefore, the Board, over the years, has declined to regard the rule precluding employers from asserting a good-faith doubt in a context of unfair labor practices as "an absolute prohibition." This is so even where the prior unfair labor practice is unremedied at the time that recognition is withdrawn.

[30] The General Counsel seeks to negate the plain import of the majority's action by certain evidence that on several occasions prior to February 19, 1981, employees in substantial numbers openly endorsed positions pressed by the Union. With a single possible exception, these expressions were ambiguous as more indicative of a shared concern in grievances promoted by the Union than an expression of continued desire for representation or preference for collective bargaining. Indeed, whether intended or not, the paraphernalia used to symbolize support of these causes downplayed the Union's own involvement and might well have been deliberately designed to reach the broadcast base possible by reflecting neutrality on the question of union representation. See G.C. Exhs. 12(a), 13(b), and 14. In any event, the earlier manifestations in no way impaired the unambiguous determination made by a majority of the employees beginning on February 19, 1981.

For reasons indicated above, I am convinced that the wage increase granted to Kay Perry in June 1980 neither caused nor influenced the repudiation fo the Union some 8 months later by 60 percent of the employees in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit.[32] Accordingly, it is concluded that Respondent's withdrawal of recognition cannot be faulted on the basis of any conduct on its part, which occurred prior to February 19, 1981.

In the alternative the General Counsel contends that even if loss of majority was not coerced, inasmuch as a decertification petition was pending, Respondent was not privileged to withdraw recognition prior to resolution of the question concerning representation. This theory is founded on the notion that in such circumstances the employer is under a strict duty of neutrality that would be violated on either a withdrawal of recognition or changes in working conditions, a view that defies longstanding Board policy to the effect that employers are free to withdraw recognition when confronted with clear evidence that the statutory representative has lost its majority. Celanese Corp., 95 NLRB 664, 672–673 (1951). Nonetheless, unfortunate language gleaned by the General Counsel from Turbodyne Corp., 226 NLRB 522, 525 (1976), appears to support just such an interpretation. That case involved an employer's obligation to "remain neutral" when an incumbent representative is rivaled by a competing labor organization. See Shea Chemical Corp., 121 NLRB 1027 (1958); see also Midwest Piping Co., 63 NLRB 1060 (1945). In Turbodyne, the incumbent representative was challenged by two rival unions, each of which had filed separate election petitions. Prior to expiration of the subsisting collective-bargaining agreement, an election was conducted. The incumbent representative obtained only 26 of the 204 votes cast in the election, but filed objections thereto, which became the subject of a stipulation by all parties calling for a rerun election. Before the rerun election could be held, the collective-bargaining agreement in question expired. Immediately thereafter, the employer withdrew recognition and effected certain unilateral changes in working conditions. The Board affirmed the administrative law judge's findings that the employer thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. However, unlike the instant case, the employer's assertion of a doubt of majority was based on questionable evidence; namely, the incumbent's poor showing in the abortive first election. In connection therewith, the administrative law judge in Turbodyne stated: "I would have extreme difficulty in concluding that [the employer] had met its burden of overcoming the presumption of majority status possessed by the contracting union." 226 NLRB at 525. Although the result in Turbodyne would be reconcilable with Celanese, supra, on that ground the administrative law judge went further. Thus, the General Counsel points to the conclusion by the administrative law judge in Turbodyne, held that:

> . . . the question of good-faith doubt of majority status of the incumbent union by the respondent . . . is essentially beside the point [inasmuch as] [t]he legal obligation of an employer, irrespective of doubt of majority status, is to await resolution of the QCR by the National Labor Relations Board or other appropriate agency, before instituting any changes in the working conditions of the employees.[33]

This reference amounted to an outright nullification of the legal efficacy of good-faith doubt. Indeed deferral to the election procedures of the Board is envisioned as actually cementing an unwanted relationship, beyond what would have been the case had those challenging the incumbent representative simply resorted to self-help. Yet, it is a view that was not supported by a citation of authority, accompanied by rationale, nor supportable under any line of reasoning familiar to me. Most significant, however, it paved the way for a remedy that heightened the opportunity of a minority union to perpetuate its exclusive statutory status. Thus, although the presumption of continuing majority was previously viewed as irrebuttable during the certification year, and during the term of a subsisting collective-bargaining agreement, Turbodyne, without explication or reference to the Celanese doctrine, would also insulate the incumbent's representative base from challenge during periods when a question concerning representation was pending. The anomaly in this view is highlighted by the General Counsel's concession that the employer would have been free to withdraw recognition had there been no decertification petition. Just how this factor ought freeze an incumbent's status as against clear evidence of a loss of majority defies explanation. Indeed, to uphold the General Counsel's view is to penalize the unwilling majority because some within their ranks have exercised the only option available to them independently under this Act to eliminate an unwanted representative, a result that would tend to discourage employees from invoking the election procedures of the National Labor Relations Board.[34] This view stands starkly in contrast with the caution that should be exercised before any new policies are adopted that further impede employees from taking steps to eliminate an unwanted representative. Their rights in this respect have already been curtailed significantly by desirable Board policies designed to foster stability in existing bargaining relationships, including certification year, contract bar, and policies precluding an election in the face of unremedied unfair labor practices.[35] The opportunity for employee choice, having been so narrowed, ought be honored with immediacy and reason where these restraints do not obtain. Here, the decertification petition was dismissed by the Regional Director soley on the ground that "[as] there is an outstanding complaint . . . which allege[s] that the employer has violated Section 8(a)(5) . . . there can be no QCR." It surely would be a paradox of circuitry, if, as the General Counsel urges, an unlawful refusal to bargain were to be founded soley on a QCR, that was ultimately negated by that very unfair labor practice.

[32] The General Counsel correctly observes that in NLRB v. Nu-Southern Dyeing & Finishing, 444 F.2d 11, 15–16 (4th Cir. 1971), it was similar context that "an employer may avoid a bargaining order by showing that the unfair labor practices did not significantly contribute to such a loss of majority or to the factors upon which a doubt of such majority is based." Although such a burden is properly reposed in the Employer, I cannot agree with the General Counsel that the duty may only be met by subjective evidence. On the contrary, consistent with the traditional approach to factfinding, the absence of nexus might be inferred on the inherent tendency of the proven facts in the light of all the surrounding circumstances. Indeed, practical limitations on the parties in litigation make it imperative that, in a case such as this, if a respondent has denied any and all unlawful conduct prior to the withdrawal of recognition, that the latter not be put to the impossible task of presenting subjective evidence that the specifically denied illegalities did not influence employee defections.

[33] This language reappeared as obiter dictum in Mervyn's, 240 NLRB 54 (1979), in a single union situation, and in the context of disputed election on a decertification petition, the administrative law judge stated 240 NLRB at 60:

> The legal obligation of an employer, in these circumstances, is to await resolution by the Board of the question concerning representation before instituting any changes in the working conditions of unit employees. Any doubt as to the Union's majority status is irrelevant, and the presumption of majority flowing from the recently expired contract continues until such resolution. Turbodyne Corporation, Gas Turbine Division, 226 NLRB 522 (1976).

Fortunately, however, Turbodyne appears to have been corrected by two recent decisions reaffirming Board policy that an employer is free to withdraw recognition if he has actual proof or a reasonable doubt that a labor organization continues to represent a majority. Those cases confirm that it is the question concerning representation, rather than the loss of majority, that is "beside the point."

Thus, RCA Del Caribe, 262 NLRB 963 (1982), as was true of Turbodyne, supra, involved an application of Shea Chemical, supra, and the employer's strict duty of neutrality in circumstances where a rival labor organization files a representation petition seeking to replace an incumbent representative. There, in a major reversal of policy, a Board majority held that in such circumstances an employer may not rely on the pendency of an election petition as a defense to a withdrawal of recognition but reains an obligation to bargain, even to the point of negotiating a new contract, pending resolution of the question concerning representation. The majority, in diminishing the impact of a QCR on the existing bargaining relationship was careful to point out that the incumbent's representative status will not be preserved in the eyes of the law where, as here, clear evidence exists as to its loss of majority. In this respect, 262 NLRB 963, fn. 13, it was stated:

> Of course this rule will not preclude an employer from withdrawing recognition in good faith based on other objective considerations. See, e.g., United States Gypsum Company, 157 NLRB 652 (1966), Laystrom Manufacturing Co., 151 NLRB 1482 (1965): Celanese Corporation of America, 95 NLRB 664 (1951).

This sentiment was carried forth by Dresser Industries, 264 NLRB 1088 (1982), in which it was held that "the filing of a decertification petition, standing alone, does not provide a reasonable ground for an employer to doubt the majority status of a union." But once more, in holding that an employer could not act on so limited a basis, the Board specifically preserved employee choice by stating, 264 NLRB 1088 fn. 7, the following:

> The rule we announce today in no way erodes the principle that an employer is privileged to withdraw from bargaining if, on the basis of objective evidence, it has good-faith doubt as to the union's continued majority status. Thus, for example, if an employer is presented with a valid decertification petition supported by a majority of the unit employees, it may be privileged to withdraw from bargaining.

It is concluded in the face of these more recent declarations that the Board has in effect repudiated the statement in Turbodyne to the effect that a good-faith doubt of majority is "beside the point." Accordingly, the view expoused by the General Counsel in reliance thereon is deemed lacking in merit. Valid and substantial evidence having presented between February 19 and 21 that the Union no longer represented a majority of the employees, Respondent was free in reliance thereon to withdraw recognition from the Union.

3. The March 10 grant of wage increases and other benefits

Consistent with the complaint, the General Counsel contends that on March 10, 1981, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by granting a 10.5-percent-wage increase, an extra "floating" holiday, and a $10 increase in compensation under the sickness and accident policy.[36] Under established Board policy, benefits conferred by an employer during the pendency of a question concerning representation are presumed unlawful as calculated to influence employees in the exercise of their choice of a bargaining representative. Thus, the burden of disassociating any conferral of benefits from the preelection campaign is on the employer.[37] With this in mind, it is noted first that no proof was offered by Respondent to divorce from union considerations, the additional holiday and enhanced sickness coverage. On the other hand, such an effort was made in connection with the wage increase and a close question is presented in that regard. However, as this was the first general wage increase received by the employees since January 28, 1980, when the recently expired contract became effective, its timing would not, standing alone, support illegality. Yet the increase was not shown to be proportionate to but seemed excessive when considered in the light of past practice. Here too, the onus is on the employer to demonstrate either that the pattern of increases given in the past, or that any such increment was arrived at on considerations other than a desire to influence the outcome of an election.

[34] Practical unsoundness in the General Counsel's theory is evident in the fact that action on the QCR raised by the RD petition filed on November 26, 1980, did not materialize until dismissed by the Regional Director on August 23, 1982. Apparently it is the General Counsel's view that during this entire period Respondent was obligated to continue recognition of the Union, and could not, without bargaining, alter conditions of work that had been set more than 2-1/2 years earlier when the initial collective-bargaining agreement became effective.

[35] Another impediment frequently encountered is the rule requiring elections to be conducted in a voting group coextensive with the historic bargaining unit, a policy requiring disenchanted employees in multiplant and multiemployer units to obtain the required showing of interest from diverse and often unfamiliar worksites.

[36] Despite extensive amendments to the complaint made at the hearing, no effort was made by the General Counsel to place in issue appropriately grants of benefit that occurred substantially after March 10, 1981, including a second general wage increase on February 1, 1982, the institution of a summer hours policy in 1982, and a change in the payday during the summer of 1982. These matters are deemed outside the purview of this proceeding.

Respondent claims that its decision to grant the 10.5-percent increase was justified by legitimate business considerations.[38] To evaluate the claim of illegality, it is important to note that the highest wage offer made by the Respondent to the Union in contract renewal negotiations was 6.5 percent. Respondent sought to explain this differential through Tyree Derrick, corporate director of labor relations for Emerson Electric Company, and Russ Adams, director of administration for Xomox Corporation.[39] According to their testimony, responsibility for defining terms and conditions of employees of organized and unorganized plants is separately allocated within the enterprise. Thus, Derrick is responsible for organized facilities, and Adams handles nonunion operations.

On analysis, the testimony of Derrick and Adams seems to suggest an overarching corporate policy in which the amount of increases to be conferred at various plants depended on organization, and as implemented, in effect amounted to an unlawful reward to employees for rejection of the Union.

Thus, Tyree Derrick described himself as the principal spokesman for Respondent during the 1981 negotiations. According to his credible testimony, when the Company made its final offer, several economic and noneconomic areas stood unresolved with the parties far apart on wages and certain other benefits. According to his estimation, the so-called last offer made by the Union included demands calling for 45- to 50-percent increases over the 3-year duration sought by the Union, with the increases in wages amounting to 19 percent in the first year, 15 percent in the second, and 13 percent in the third. This contrasted sharply with the "best and final" offer presented to the Union by the Company, which included a wage offer at 6.5 percent the first year, in excess of 6 percent in the second year, and in excess 5.5 percent in the third year. It was in this posture that negotiations were adjourned indefinitely on January 28.

By way of further clarification, it was the sense of Derrick's testimony that the 6.5 percent was not the limit as to how far the Company would go in negotiations. Instead, this position was taken in response to the bargaining posture of the Union, which Derrick viewed as "unreasonable." He asserted that though there was additional room for movement on the part of the Company at that time, its own position would depend on several factors, central to which would be the flexibility that the Union was able to manifest. Other factors, according to Derrick, which influenced the 6.5-percent proposal, including business conditions[40] and the weak bargaining posture of the Union. Most significant, however, was the observation by Derrick that the corporation had been settling contracts in that year in the range of 8 percent and 7 percent, and that in his own estimation he could not be certain that any settlement with the Union at the Washington plant would be in the 8-percent range. Derrick's testimony plainly suggests that 8 percent would be the ceiling on any wage settlement, a conclusion that derives collateral support from his own expressed goal that "a modest contract should be achieved."

Derrick related that he did not participate in the decision to grant the employees a 10.5-wage increase some 2 weeks after recognition was withdrawn, as a different "channel of approval" controlled working conditions in unorganized plants. Russell Adams confirmed that once he was informed that the Union no longer represented employees at the Washington plant, determination of their compensation fell within the jurisdiction of his office. Adams was mindful of the 6.5-percent offer made to the Union on January 28, but he denied involvement in the formulation of that offer. As for the 10.5-percent increase, Adams claims that it was founded on a survey of wages paid by several manufacturing facilities in the area and economic conditions in the "market" in which the plant is located. Like Derrick, he acknowledged that 1980-1981 had been a particularly difficult year for the Atwood & Morrill plants in Washington, North Carolina, and Salem, Massachusetts, and that an 8-percent increase was viewed as appropriate with respect to both.[41] However, based on the survey, it was indicated that at the Washington plant, the scale was about $1 behind comparable jobs in the area. Adams therefore adopted the view that to maintain skill levels, a higher increase than 8 percent was necessary. According to Adams, initially his superiors at Xomox and Emerson did not agree, but ultimately they were persuaded based on savings to be realized from the elimination of grievance fees, legal fees, and arbitration that could be added to the 8-percent figure to achieve parity in Washington with what others in the labor market were paying for comparable work.

In the circumstances, I cannot agree with the General Counsel and Charging Party that the increase afforded in [38] Contrary to an assertion by Respondent, it is noted that the fact that recognition was lawfully withdrawn on February 23, did not afford it "an absolute right" thereafter to impede the election process by conferring benefits.

[40] Derrick claims to have "consulted" with management at the plant, divisional, and corporate levels concerning "the condition of the business at that time."

March 1981 is to be deemed unlawful because it exceeded that incorporated in the last company offer in the aborted January negotiations. There was no allegation that the breakdown in those negotiations was attributed to bad faith or other improper motivations that could be imputed to management. Furthermore, I credit the testimony of Derrick that at the time the negotiations were suspended there was room for movement on the Company's part and that from its point of view further exchanges were to be made, with the onus on the Union to show some movement.[42] Such a bargaining strategem is not unique and to assume that it placed a ceiling on what the Company could later provide would rest on faulty assumption that management had exhausted its concessions with respect to wages as of January 28 and should be penalized because it held back, waiting for the Union to manifest flexibility. Equally lacking in merit is the General Counsel's proposal that because the Union was not apprised that the Employer was willing to make substantial further concessions, one should assume that the Employer was not willing to do so. This assumption ignores the fact that as of January 28 negotiations were not viewed by Derrick as having concluded, but had reached a point where the parties were so far apart that sound negotiating tactic was taken as demanding that management not reveal its hand until concession was made by the other side.

This does not mean, however, that I am willing to accept the balance of Respondent's evidence as furnishing a credible explanation for this increase granted on March 10, 1981, only 2 weeks after the Company had withdrawn recognition. First, I find it difficult to believe that in the interim a new wage policy was devised by separate labor relations functionaries within the Emerson Enterprise and that there was no serious consultation as to what wage strategem the Company would adopt at Washington between Adams, who ostensibly was to fashion a new wage policy, and Derrick, who had just been released from collective bargaining covering that very plant. In any event, that union activity was the decisive factor in defining the amount of the increase is admitted in Respondent's own evidence. Management's concern for competitive rates, a factor that combined humane and practical elements, while of empirical concern to Respondent on March 10, following the recent repudiation of the Union, went unmentioned by Derrick in his description of the considerations entering his formulation of wage offers to be and actually made to the Union. For Respondent, there is no escaping the disparate considerations relied on by Adams and Derrick. Evident from these differences was the fact that the focus at Washington was one of greater generosity once that plant had gone nonunion. The net result was a reward founded on that very fact. Thus, the March increase, being of unprecedented size, coming as it did only 2 weeks after recognition was withdrawn, and having been granted to a bargaining unit still bearing the wounds of substantial layoffs, conveyed graphically to employees that their "lot" would be better cast without union representation. During the pendency of a question concerning representation, employers are free to campaign on the basis of existing benefits, but management may not on a discretionary basis make upward revisions in established patterns in conferring additional benefits. The latter is precisely what occurred here, and the identity of those who might have wielded corporate power to that end is entirely irrelevant.[43]

Based on the foregoing, it is concluded that the 10.5-percent increase conferred on employees on March 10 was not shown by Respondent to be justified by considerations other than union activity and, accordingly, Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Furthermore, as Respondent has failed to adduce proof concerning the propriety of its March 10 grant of an additional holiday and broadened sickness and accident benefits,[44] I find that these changes, effected during the pendency of the question concerning representation, also were calculated to influence employee choice in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[45]

[42] There is no allegation that Respondent's failure to offer an increase in excess of 6.5 percent during the January negotiation was violative of Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

[43] Serious question exists whether savings realized by an employer through elimination of a union represents a suitable justification for a preelection wage increase. In this regard, the Board has held that an employer may not legitimately campaign against representation by propagandizing that without a union more money would be available to spend on employees. See Dow Chemical Co., 250 NLRB 748, 750 (1980), enfd. denied 660 F.2d 637, 646–647 (5th Cir. 1981).

[44] The wage increase and other benefits conferred on March 10, 1981, on August 13, 1982, by amendment to the consolidated complaint, were added to par. 9 as an alleged violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. At the same time, Respondent's action with respect to canteen privileges remained confined to par. 16 of the complaint and for purposes of this proceeding was alleged soley as unilateral action violative of Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Accordingly, as no notice was afforded to Respondent that its motive was in any way placed in issue in connection with the canteen issue, it understandably furnished no justification for that change. Accordingly, any such charge was neither alleged nor fully litigated, and hence is not the subject of a finding here.

[45] The complaint alleges, and the General Counsel and Charging Party insist, that the wage increases in question violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. As indicated at the hearing by me, that section of the Act regulates conduct detrimental, rather than beneficial to employee interests. In this respect, cases such as Service Garage, 247 NLRB 943 (1980), and Associated Milk Producers, 255 NLRB 750 (1981), are distinguishable, as the conduct complained of in each related to the withholding of a schedule increase, action clearly detrimental in nature. Also off base is the notion advanced by the General Counsel that an 8(a)(3) violation could influence the scope or appropriateness of a remedial order, or the validity of a possible election. This remedy is controlled by the nature of the unlawful conduct and its impact on protected rights, rather than technical compartmentalization or a process in which conduct is labeled as a violation of one section of the Act or another. See Drawo Line Co., 234 NLRB 213, 214 fn. 1 (1978). Also noteworthy in this connection is the assertion in the Charging Party's posthearing brief that the grant of benefits on March 10, 1981, did constitute "adverse action" and hence violated Sec. 8(a)(3) as charged in the complaint. It is argued in this respect that Respondent maintained "a carrot and stick" approach, offering the Union less in the contract renewal negotiations, and then after repudiation of the Union rewarding employees with the "carrot" a greater increase. The Charging Party submitted that this is "more than [an] 8(a)(1) violation." However, even under this view, it was in January 1981, not March 1981, that the "stick" was ministered. Furthermore, although the former might well have been challenged in an amendment to the charge in Case 11–CA–9787 filed on February 3, 1982, the complaint, though subsequently amended, made no such reference, but was limited to a challenge to the "carrot" conferred on March 10, 1981. In short, control over the scope of the complaint is the exclusive prerogative of the General Counsel under well-established Board authority. See Winn-Dixie Stores, 224 NLRB 1418, 1420–1421 (1976).

IV. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, it shall be recommended that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I have found above that as of February 23, 1981, the Union no longer represented a majority of the employees, and on that date Respondent withdrew recognition, lawfully, on considerations furnishing a reasonable basis not only for belief that the Union had lost its majority, but establishing that fact. I have also found that Respondent thereafter violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by on March 10, 1981, granting a wage increases of unprecedented size. It is in this light that I consider the General Counsel's further contention that the bargaining relationship be resurrected on the basis of a remedial bargaining order consistent with the dictates of NLRB v. Gissel Mfg. Co., supra. In this respect, the General Counsel relies on cases such as Michigan Products, 236 NLRB 1143 (1978), to the effect showing that the Union continued to represent a majority. In Michigan Products, supra, the incumbent union was rejected in a Board-conducted election, but the loss of majority was viewed as a byproduct of the employer's unfair labor practices that "had as its objective the elimination of the Union as the collective-bargaining representative." Hence, the election was a nullity and the incumbent union "enjoyed the presumption of continued majority status." No such conclusion is warranted on the instant record. The key element distinguishing the instant case from Michigan Products, supra, and other authority cited by the General Counsel[46] is the fact that here the proof demonstrates an actual loss of majority,[47] which, while not induced by unlawful conduct, occurred prior to any serious unfair labor practice. The presumption of continuing majority was rebutted with finality, and having taken full account of the unlawful grant of benefits on March 10, 1981, the conduct is viewed as lacking the quality that would render dispensable reestablishment of the Union's majority, either factually or by operation of law, as a predicate to a remedial bargaining order. Accordingly, as the Union had not reestablished its majority status at the time of the independent 8(a)(1) violation founded on the wage increase of March 10, 1981, and as that violation, though serious, would not be considered as the sufficiently "pervasive" or "egregious" as to warrant a minority bargaining order,[48] no basis exists for an affirmative order for reestablishing the relationship repudiated by employees between February 19 and 21, 1981.

In the total circumstances, not only do I dismiss the 8(a)(5) allegation predicated on the withdrawal of recognition, but like action is taken with respect to allegations in the complaint that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act after February 23, 1981, by unilaterally increasing wages and benefits of employees about March 10, 1981, by, on March 20, 1981, refusing to negotiate with the Union concerning health and safety matters, and by, on May 1, 1981, unilaterally restoring the canteen rights of its employees.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Unions are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by, on June 17, 1980, during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement, granting a 20-cent-wage increase to an employer without the assent of the Union.

4. Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by, on March 10, 1981, granting a wage increase to employees under conditions calculated to induce them to refrain from designating the Union as their representative for collective bargaining.

5. The unfair labor practices found in paragraphs 3 and 4 above constitute unfair labor practices having an effect on commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

ORDER GRANTING MOTION TO REOPEN RECORD AND FOR FURTHER HEARING

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On September 30, 1987, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision, Order, and Certification of Representative in the above-entitled proceeding, finding that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with unspecified reprisals for union activities and by creating the impression of surveillance of employees' union activities and had violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by refusing to permit employee Marilu Marquez to rescind her resignation and by discharging employee Gloria Garcia in retaliation for Marquez' union activities.[1] Thereafter, on January 22, 1988, the Respondent filed a motion to reopen the record and a separate motion for a protective order. The General Counsel then filed an opposition to the motion for a protective order, but stated therein that she did not oppose the motion to reopen the record.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

In its motion to reopen the record, the Respondent contends that it has obtained newly discovered evidence that should cause the Board to reverse its findings of fact and conclusions of law and find that the Respondent has not violated the Act. In support of its motion, the Respondent has attached an affidavit from witness Raisa Musa Quinones (Musa), in which she appears to recant certain testimony that she gave at the unfair labor practice hearing in this proceeding. At the hearing Musa testified that on May 3, 1985, Jaime Rico, the Respondent's treasurer and a supervisor of the Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, told her that he had discovered that employees wanted to bring a union into the Company, that Marilu Marquez was in charge of everything, that he regarded Musa as a good employee, and that she should not get involved in the union activity. In our decision, we used Musa's credited testimony to find that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) as detailed above and that it had knowledge of and animus toward Marquez' union activities. The Respondent has appended a translation of Musa's affidavit to its motion to reopen the record. The relevant parts of this translation, set out verbatim, follow:

> I testified in the administrative case # 24–CA–5160 held on December 16, 17, and 18, 1985 because my personal well-being and security were threatened by Marilu Marquez and Gloria Garcia and I now wish to correct my testimony declaring the following:
> On May 1, 3, 1985 nor at any other time, did Jaime Rico threaten me with retaliation or with rewards in relation to my employment or union activities.
> Jaime Rico did not tell me that it was not for my benefit to participate in union activities.
> Jaime Rico did not tell me that Gloria Garcia or Marilu Marquez were involved in the union.
> Jaime Rico nor any officer of Waterbed World has pressured me nor has promised me anything of value so that I would now make these declarations nor have I been offered employment.
> Jaime Rico did not tell me not to get involved with the union.

The Respondent contends that reopening the record is necessary because it argues that Musa's testimony formed the Board's only basis for finding that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Regarding the 8(a)(3) finding, the Respondent further contends that in the absence of Musa's testimony, the Board could not have inferred that the Respondent either knew of Marquez' union activities or harbored animus toward her for these activities at the time of the decision to discharge Garcia and to refuse to permit Marquez to rescind her resignation.

The evidence the Respondent now seeks to introduce may tend to show, among other things, that Marquez and Garcia threatened Musa's well-being and security to induce her to testify falsely at the unfair labor practice hearing; that Musa testified falsely at that hearing; that Jaime Rico did not threaten Musa with retaliation or rewards with regard to her employment; that Jaime Rico did not tell Musa that it was not to her benefit to be involved in union activities; and that Jaime Rico did not tell Musa that Garcia or Marquez was involved with the Union.

After carefully reviewing the record, the judge's decision, the Board's decision, and the motion, we find that Musa's affidavit raises substantial questions of whether an important witness testified falsely about material issues in this case. Accordingly, we shall grant the Respondent's motion to reopen the record and we shall remand the proceeding to the judge to reopen the record, to take additional testimony to resolve the issues of credibility raised by Musa's affidavit, and to issue new findings of fact and conclusions of law in a supplemental decision consistent with his resolution of the issues.

As noted above, the Respondent also seeks a protective order from the Board in which the Board would order the parties not to disclose the information in the motion to reopen to Marilu Marquez or Gloria Garcia. In support of this motion, the Respondent cites portions of Musa's affidavit, quoted above, contending that Garcia and Marquez threatened her well-being and security to support its contention that confidentiality is required to protect Musa from "annoyance and oppression." The General Counsel has opposed the motion, contending that the Board is not empowered to grant such a protective order and that the Board is empowered only under appropriate circumstances, and for good cause shown, to petition the United States district court for such an order. The General Counsel also contends that the Respondent has not shown "good cause" to warrant petitioning the court for a protective order. Without passing on the General Counsel's arguments, we deny the Respondent's motion, without prejudice to a subsequent motion for appropriate relief. Our reasons for denying the motion follow.

First, we do not believe that holding the contents of the motion to reopen confidential would be proper—or even possible—under the circumstances of this case. Musa's affidavit appended to the motion has raised serious questions regarding not only the factual bases of the Board's decision in this case, but also the credibility of testimony taken at the hearing. Such questions can only be resolved through the hearing process. Second, we note that Garcia and Marquez are not charging parties. However, "[a] discriminatee who has not filed his own charge is not a party within the Board's definition but . . . in a real sense has been regarded as a party in a long line of Board decisions." Unga Painting Co., 237 NLRB 1306, 1307 (1978). In recognition of the strong interest of discriminatees in Board proceedings, the Board recognizes only limited circumstances under which they can be prevented from hearing the testimony of other witnesses:

> Specifically, alleged discriminatees should be excluded only during that portion of the hearing when another of the General Counsel's or charging party's witnesses is testifying about events to which the discriminatees have testified, or will or may testify, either in the case-in-chief or on rebuttal, unless, in the judgment of the Administrative Law Judge, there are special circumstances warranting the unrestricted presence of discriminatees or total exclusion when not testifying.

Ibid. (fn. omitted).

Therefore, in view of the Board's policy affording a discriminatee the right to hear testimony except under certain circumstances, and in light of the scanty and conclusory nature of the averments in the Respondent's memorandum and supporting affidavit on which the request for a protective order is based, we view any relief in the nature of a protective order foreclosing Garcia and Marquez from knowing of the contents of the motion to reopen as unwarranted at this time.[2]

Last, although we share our colleague's concern for the seriousness of the allegations now before us, we think it premature at this stage of the proceedings to send the record to the Department of Justice. In our view, the better course is to await the judge's supplemental decision with its further findings of fact and credibility resolutions, and our own disposition of that decision, before we consider what possible future course, including the referral of this case to the Justice Department, to pursue.

IT IS ORDERED that the proceeding is remanded to Administrative Law Judge Elbert D. Gadsden for the purpose of holding a hearing to receive additional testimony from Raisa Musa Quinones and other appropriate evidence relating to the credibility issues and other issues raised by Raisa Musa Quinones' December 15, 1987 affidavit.[3]

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that, at the conclusion of the hearing, Judge Gadsden issue a supplemental decision containing findings of fact, credibility resolutions, and conclusions of law. The supplemental decision shall be served on the parties, after which the provisions of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations shall be applicable.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that Respondent's motion for a protective order is denied without prejudice for the reasons stated above.

[2] Our Order here, however, should not be construed as precluding the judge upon a motion at the hearing for deciding in his discretion to sequester witnesses based on a showing that special circumstances exist warranting sequestration under Unga Painting, supra.

[3] Member Johansen views as most serious any allegation that witnesses in Board proceedings are threatened in order to affect their testimony and/or that witnesses have lied under oath either in Board hearings or in affidavits presented to the Board. Accordingly, he would send the entire record in this proceeding to the Department of Justice for whatever action that agency may deem to be appropriate in light of all the circumstances in this case.

DECISION ON REVIEW AND ORDER TO DISMISS

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

On December 30, 1985, the Regional Director for Region 33 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in this proceeding in which he found, inter alia, that the Board had jurisdiction over the Employer under National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979), because the Employer retained sufficient control over its operations and labor relations to engage in meaningful bargaining with the Union.

Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Employer filed a request for review of the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election. The Employer contended, inter alia, that the Regional Director erred (1) in finding that the Employer retained sufficient authority and control over its operations and labor relations policy to engage in meaningful negotiations with the Union and (2) in finding that the public officials for the State of Iowa are not responsible for directing and overseeing the Employer's contract at the Iowa State Penitentiary, which would preclude the Board from asserting jurisdiction over the Employer.

By order dated January 28, 1986, the Board granted the Employer's request for review pending the Board's decisions in Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986), and Long Stretch Youth Home, 280 NLRB 678 (1986). The election scheduled for January 28, 1986, was held, and the ballots cast in the election were impounded.

By order dated June 30, 1986, the case was remanded to the Regional Director for further consideration consistent with the Board's decisions in Res-Care, Inc. and Long Stretch Youth Home. The record was reopened and the parties were permitted to submit supplemental briefs in support of their respective positions. The Employer relied on the record as it existed and filed a supplemental brief reasserting its position that the Board does not have jurisdiction. The Union asserted no position regarding the reopening of the record and did not file a supplemental brief.

The Regional Director issued a supplemental decision on August 4, 1986, reaffirming his prior conclusion that the Employer retains sufficient control over its labor relations to engage in meaningful collective bargaining with the Union and directed that the impounded ballots be counted. The Employer filed a request for review of the Regional Director's Supplemental Decision and Order directing the counting of impounded ballots. By Order dated December 9, 1986, the Board granted the Employer's request for review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case with respect to the issues under review and has decided to dismiss the petition.

The essential facts are as follows. The Employer, Correctional Medical Systems (CMS), provides onsite medical and health care services to inmates and preemployment exams to employees at the Iowa State Penitentiary (ISP). ISP is a maximum security prison, which houses approximately 800 inmates.

In 1973 the inmates at ISP instituted a civil rights action against the prison officials. As a result of this action, a consent order was entered mandating changes in the delivery of health care services to ISP inmates. McBride v. Farrier, No. 73-242-2 (S.D. Iowa 1981, amended consent order). The order required the Iowa State Department of Corrections to procure an independent contractor to provide quality health care services at the Penitentiary to begin on or before October 30, 1981. The order directed the State to solicit bids from potential contract health care providers and submit those bids to the court-appointed monitors for review and approval. The consent order also required ISP to continue to employ an independent health care provider until the State is able to demonstrate to the court's satisfaction that the same level and quality of health care can be provided to the inmates by ISP health care professionals. The consent order specifically set the initial parameters for staffing the infirmary facility, including job descriptions and classifications, the number of employees within each classification, the full-time or part-time status of employees, and the licensing and educational requirements for each of the individuals employed.

The consent order required the establishment of a medical audit committee responsible for managing and evaluating the delivery of health care services. This committee is composed of the ISP warden, the health care unit administrator, the director of nurses, the chief of dental services, the pharmacist, and the medical records administrator. The consent order prescribed that formal policy and procedures be developed internally for the communication and resolution of inmate and staff complaints. It also details the types of duties to be performed by the health care unit employees and which employees should perform which duties.

Pursuant to the McBride v. Farrier consent order, the State of Iowa issued a Request for Proposals (RFP) on July 1, 1981, to solicit bids for the provision of comprehensive health care services by an independent contractor for the inmates at the penitentiary. The RFP specified the job classifications, the hours of work per week for each classification, and the number of employees in each classification. The State reserved the right, in the RFP, to interview and approve the hiring of the medical director, nursing director, the pharmacist, and health care unit administrator. The RFP also required the successful contractor to retain and continue to employ all health care personnel that were currently employed by ISP for at least 1 month after receiving the contract and thereafter to treat those employees in accordance with the Iowa Merit Employment Department rules on employee transfer and/or reduction of work force.

On July 1, 1981, CMS submitted a bid, which was accepted, and a 1-year renewable contract was executed on October 30, 1981. The contract was thereafter renewed at 1-year intervals until June 30, 1985.

The State of Iowa issued a second RFP in February 1985 soliciting new bids for the provision of health care services at the institution. On March 18, 1985, the State issued an addendum modifying the second RFP. The modification required all prospective bidders to submit a proposal consisting of technical and financial components and containing organizational charts, job descriptions, salary ranges for all staff positions, and a staff manning table including the required number of employees in each required position for certain specified hours per week. The addendum further required the submission of a line-item budget showing the hourly pay rate and fringe benefit costs per hour for each job classification and the number of man-hours to be worked in each classification. The line-item budget is required to reveal all overhead, general, and administrative services, and all other direct costs. The budget must also show as separate line-items all other ancillary costs such as maintenance and repairs, office supplies, postage, uniform allowance, insurance, data processing, accounting, legal services, state and Federal taxes, and a set management fee.

The RFP designates the warden as project manager to be responsible for the day-to-day administration of the contract and directs that the consultants for the Department of Corrections will provide professional review and assessment of the provider's operations within their area of expertise. The Department of Corrections consultants are employed by the State of Iowa and are responsible for providing guidance and management oversight to the CMS staff.

The RFP requires the contractor to prepare and submit to the Department of Corrections monthly reports that specify any deviation by position, title, or hours worked from the staffing requirements of the contract. If at any time the contractor fails to maintain qualified personnel in each of the 22 positions as required by the consent decree for 30 consecutive calendar days, the scheduled installment payment for that period will be reduced by one-twelfth of the annual salary and benefits of the previous incumbent in the vacant position. The Department of Corrections and the warden exercise reviewing authority over the employment of the medical director, director of nursing, pharmacist, and administrator. The resumes of these individuals are forwarded to the warden for his approval, and he must interview them prior to their staff appointment. The RFP requires that a list of all personnel assigned to the facility be submitted to the State for approval. In addition, the State has reserved the right to request the replacement of any CMS personnel believed unable to carry out the responsibilites of the contract, or believed to present an unacceptable breach of the legitimate security requirements at the institution. All contractor employees must pass a background investigation conducted by ISP prior to their employment at the facility. The RFP requires the contractor to submit to the warden for his approval a personnel manual applicable to all health care contract employees. The manual specifies the terms and conditions of employment, the employee probationary period, definition of seniority, rules of conduct, provision for progressive discipline and discharge, vacation and holiday benefits, and sick leave. CMS is not permitted to make any changes in these conditions of employment without the express written approval of the warden.

The Employer submitted a bid and proposal in response to the State's second RFP and on June 3, 1985, a new 1-year contract was executed and made effective through June 30, 1986. The new contract incorporates the State's RFP and addendum, the Employer's proposal, and the McBride v. Farrier consent order. The contract specifically prohibits the Employer from making any changes in the agreement without the State's consent. As mandated by the consent order, a medical audit committee monitors the day-to-day operations of the health care unit. The medical audit committee now comprises the warden, the court-appointed monitors, and several other employees and supervisors of the Employer, all of whom must approve of any policy and/or operational changes at the institution.

The Regional Director in his original Decision and Direction of Election concluded that the Board should assert jurisdiction because the Employer retained the necessary degree of independence from the State of Iowa in setting its overall labor-relations policy, which enables the Employer to effectively bargain with the Union within the meaning of the "right of control" test as set forth in National Transportation, supra.[1] The Regional Director reconsidered his original conclusion in light of the Board's recent decisions in Res-Care, Inc., supra, and Long Stretch Youth Home, supra, and reaffirmed his decision that the Employer retains sufficient control over the essential terms and conditions of employment to enable it to engage in meaningful collective bargaining with a labor organization. We disagree.

In Res-Care, Inc., supra, and Long Stretch Youth Home, supra, 678 the Board reaffirmed the basic "right of control" test enunciated in National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979), for determining when it is appropriate to assert jurisdiction over an employer providing services to or for an exempt entity. In applying the test, the Board stated in Res-Care that the examination would not be limited to the control over the essential terms and conditions of employment retained by the employer, but would also extend to an examination of the "scope and degree of control exercised by the exempt entity over the employer's labor relations, to determine whether the employer in issue is capable of engaging in meaningful collective bargaining." 280 NLRB at 672. The Board held that "meaningful bargaining" cannot be accomplished unless the employer has "the final, practical say regarding wages and benefits" afforded its employees. Id. at 674. Applying these principles, the Board reached different results in Res-Care and Long Stretch Youth Home.

In Long Stretch Youth Home, supra, the Board concluded that it was proper to assert jurisdiction because the control retained by the employer over the essential terms and conditions of employment of its employees was sufficient to enable it to engage in meaningful collective bargaining with a labor organization. The exempt entity in Long Stretch reviewed the annual proposed budget for the youth home's functions and services. The agency did not issue any minimum-maximum salary ranges, but suggested some cost guidelines for each job classification, and also suggested that no more than 65 percent of its gross operating budget be allocated for salaries. The employer was responsible, however, for setting its own minimum standards and qualifications for employees, and the exempt entity had little or no control over the determination of employees' wages, vacation, sick leave, or other benefits.

In Res-Care, the Board reached the contrary conclusion and refused to assert jurisdiction. In that case, the employer operated a job corps center pursuant to a contract with the United States Department of Labor (DOL). The contract mandated that DOL review and approve the minimum/maximum wage ranges, as well as the specific levels of various employee benefit packages. The contract prevented the employer from independently setting initial wages, granting a wage increase higher than the approved maximum, or providing benefits greater than those contained in the approved benefit package. The exempt entity, DOL, exercised ultimate discretion over the basic economic terms and conditions of employment. Res-Care was compensated by DOL on a cost-plus-fixed-fee basis, i.e., the total of all line items as listed in the operating budget including wage and benefit levels proposed by the employer and approved by the exempt entity, plus the employer's proposed fixed fee and other "allowable costs" as defined by DOL. Upon DOL's acceptance and approval of Res-Care's bid, the proposed figures became the contract price and were set forth in the final contract. Res-Care was not permitted to pay wages or benefits to employees above the approved maximums and to do so would result in a determination by DOL that the increase was a "disallowable cost" that would reduce Res-Care's installment payment under the contract. On these facts, the Board concluded that the employer was precluded from engaging in meaningful bargaining because it did not have sufficient discretion to set wages and benefits for its employees.

In asserting jurisdiction over CMS, the Regional Director drew upon comparisons with the facts of Long Stretch Youth Home and sought to distinguish Res-Care from the case before us. We find, however, that the Employer's situation here more closely parallels that of the employer in Res-Care. Thus, the contract between ISP and CMS incorporates the McBride v. Farrier consent decree, the State's Request for Proposals, the addendum requiring a line-item budget, and the Employer's proposal, with the provision that no contractual changes can be made without written approval and permission of the State. As described earlier, these documents leave very little to CMS's discretion. The wage and benefit levels for CMS employees are specifically identified in the contract for each job classification. The cost for each position is dictated by the wage ranges, the wage rates, the hours of work per week for each position, the hourly costs for fringe benefits, and the resulting total for all compensation costs. Final approval for the proposed levels of employee compensation rests with the State and ISP has the authority not only to limit the total budget, but also to limit the maximum amount which is paid to CMS for employee compensation. CMS cannot change the fringe benefit package for employees, nor can it implement new benefits. While CMS can increase the wages, its increases cannot exceed the total amounts prescribed for wages in the contract. Any moneys not expended on wages and benefits as allocated must be returned to the State.

[1] In National Transportation, the Board rejected the "intimate connection" test and adopted a twofold approach to determining when assertion of jurisdiction over an employer providing services to or for an exempt entity is appropriate. The approach set forth in National Transportation examines whether (1) the employer itself meets the definition of "employer" within the meaning of Sec. 2(2) of the Act and, if so, (2) the employer has sufficient control over the employment conditions of its employees to enable it to bargain with a labor organization as their representative.

The Regional Director, while noting the existence of a line-item budget, concluded that the State, by limiting the total budget, does not exert control over labor relations. In so doing, the Regional Director failed to make the distinction drawn by the Board between placing an "effective ceiling on [employee compensation] expenditures by limiting the private employer's total budget" as in Long Stretch Youth Home, supra, 280 NLRB at 682 fn. 14, and "direct limits on employee compensation" by means of a budget that specifies maximum amounts for employee compensation," as in Res-Care, supra, 280 NLRB 670 at 674 fn. 22. The Regional Director's conclusion that employee compensation here is not tied to the budget is, therefore, incorrect, as is his conclusion that the Employer has control over its employees' wages.

Further, the consent decree specifies the minimum standard operating procedures and staff requirements for the ISP health care unit. The State's RFP sets forth the necessary staffing requirements and descriptions of the job classifications along with what would constitute certain full-time equivalent positions. The job classifications, the number of employees in each classification, and the hours of work for each employee are effectively controlled and limited by ISP through its control of the budget. Unlike in Long Stretch Youth Home, in which the level of control exercised by the exempt entity over the staffing component did not require that the employer fill certain positions, and the contract price had no direct relation to salaries, CMS must adhere strictly to the staffing requirements of the contract.

The Regional Director concluded that the control ISP exerts over the terms and conditions of the CMS employees is limited primarily to its concerns about security, and ISP is not directly involved in the hiring, management, or discipline of the health care unit employees. The Regional Director found that ISP would become involved only in the discharge of an employee who presented a security risk to the institution. The record reveals, however, that on two occasions the warden requested that certain CMS personnel be discharged and his mere request was honored without question or reference to a legitimate breach of prison security.

With regard to benefits, the Regional Director stated that as with wages, "total compensation costs" are identified in the bid. However, the Regional Director concluded that the exempt entity does not possess the "final, practical say" regarding benefits because there was no evidence that the warden exercised his authority to veto changes in the Employer's personnel manual. This finding is in error. The Board stated in Long Stretch Youth Home, that its decision to assert jurisdiction was not based on the failure of the exempt entity to exercise its authority to disapprove the employer's wage/benefit proposals, but on the absence of any such authority. Long Stretch Youth Home, supra, 280 NLRB at 681 fn. 12. In that case, the exempt entity required only that the employer have personnel policies and that certain benefits be provided; it did not specify their content, and thus did not retain authority to disapprove benefit proposals. Here, by contrast, the costs of benefits is included as a line item in the budget, and the personnel manual, which includes provisions for vacation and holiday benefits, leaves of absence, sick days, and tuition reimbursement, must be approved by the warden. Accordingly, we find, contrary to the Regional Director, that there are significant limitations imposed by ISP on the Employer's control over its labor relations.

Considering all the foregoing factors, we conclude that the Employer does not possess sufficient control over the employment terms and conditions of its employees to enable it to engage in meaningful collective bargaining with a labor organization. Accordingly, we conclude that it would not effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction over the Employer, and we shall dismiss the petition.[2]

[2] The Employer attempted to establish that CMS is a political subdivision of the State and shares ISP's Sec. 2(2) statutory exemption. The Regional Director did not consider this issue nor the cases cited in support

ORDER

The petition is dismissed.

CHAIRMAN STEPHENS, concurring.

Because of the unique circumstances brought about by the inmates' civil rights action against Iowa State Penitentiary (ISP) officials, I agree with my colleagues that jurisdiction should not be asserted over the Employer and that the petition in this case should be dismissed. In contrast to the situation presented in Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986), the government authority involved here is not purely theoretical and unlikely to be exercised. To the contrary, the consent order in McBride v. Farrier, No. 73-242-2 (S.D. Iowa 1981, amended consent order), sets specific requirements for all aspects of the delivery of health care services to prison inmates. The consent order further requires, among other things, that a medical audit committee comprised of the warden of ISP, court-appointed monitors, and several employees and supervisors of the Employer oversee the day-to-day operations of the health care unit. Any change in policy or operations must be approved by the committee. It is clear that, at the present time, the delivery of health care to the inmates of ISP by any Employer is subject to strict supervision by the court and, pursuant to the court's order, ISP officials. Given this close and comprehensive involvement of exempt entities in labor relations matters I agree that we should not assert jurisdiction over the Employer.

of this position. We find that the Employer is not a political subdivision of the State.

The Board has long extended the exemption for political subdivisions to entities that are, inter alia, administered by individuals who are responsible to public officials or to the general electorate. NLRB v. Natural Gas Utility District, 402 U.S. 600 (1971). "Administration" in this context is construed as responsibility for day-to-day operations. Resident Home for the Mentally Retarded, 239 NLRB 3 (1978). The Employer argues that it meets this test because its operations are controlled by the warden, who is appointed by the commissioner for the Iowa State Department of Corrections, who is appointed by the Governor.

We find no merit in the Employer's argument. The record shows that the health care unit administrator who is employed by CMS has responsibility for the day-to-day operations. While the warden's involvement with CMS is such as to constitute one of the factors supporting our conclusion that the Employer lacks sufficient control to engage in meaningful bargaining, there is no indication that the health care unit administrator is directly appointed by the warden or fully responsible to the warden for day-to-day administrative matters. Finally, the record does not support a conclusion that the warden administers the health care unit. Accordingly, we conclude that the Employer is not entitled to the exemption for political subdivisions.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On February 3, 1988, Administrative Law Judge William L. Schmidt issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions, as modified,[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Francis J. Fisher, Inc., Denver, Colorado, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act when, at an employee meeting in November 1986, its owner and president told employees that there would be no union after March 1987 and its vice president concluded the meeting by telling employees to decide what they wanted and come to him. In agreeing with the judge's conclusion, however, we do not rely on his finding that such remarks by the Respondent tend to cause employees to be "apprehensive and fearful" in exercising their Sec. 7 rights; rather, we find that such remarks reasonably tended to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their Sec. 7 rights.

The judge relied on the court's opinion in Teamsters Local 175 v. NLRB, 788 F.2d 27 (D.C. Cir. 1986), denying enf. of Bell Transit Co., 271 NLRB 1272 (1984), for the general proposition that an employer is required to maintain the status quo established by an expired collective-bargaining agreement until the parties reach a new agreement or bargain to impasse. The General Counsel, in her answering brief, contends that Bell Transit, in which a valid impasse was found after only three bargaining exchanges, is distinguishable on its facts. Whether or not Bell Transit is distinguishable from the instant case, we overrule it to the extent it holds that impasse can be found on the basis of subsequent events—e.g., a failure to ratify a contract proposal or an ultimate failure to reach an agreement—rather than on the state of negotiations at the time of the unilateral action. We additionally overrule the Board's analysis in that case to the effect that an impasse and tentative agreement may exist simultaneously.

Michael J. Belo, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Gus Achey, Esq., of Denver, Colorado, for the Respondent.

289 NLRB No. 104

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM L. SCHMIDT, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this matter on 9 July 1987[1] at Denver, Colorado. The proceeding is based on a charge filed 10 March by International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America, AFL-CIO[2] Local 13 (Charging Party or Union) alleging that Francis J. Fisher, Inc. (Respondent or Employer) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Pursuant to that charge the Regional Director for Region 27 of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB or Board) Region 27 issued a complaint on 23 April alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act when it: (1) bypassed the Union and dealt directly with employees the Union represents on 24 November 1986; (2) refused to bargain in good faith with the Union since 15 January; and (3) unilaterally altered wages and working conditions on 9 March. The complaint also alleges Respondent independently violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when its owner and president Jean Sharkey told employees on 24 November 1986 that as of March there would be no more union and its vice president Don Klaversma solicited employees for information concerning the working conditions they desired in March.

On 30 April Respondent filed a timely answer wherein it admitted certain allegations of the complaint and denied others, including the unfair labor practices alleged.

Having carefully considered the record, the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified and the parties' posthearing briefs, I now make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE EVIDENCE

A. Relevant Background

Respondent is an old Denver firm established in 1889 that sells construction materials.[3] In 1935 ownership of Respondent passed from the heirs of its founders to the Goody family and the Union, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, and became the representative of Respondent's drivers and warehousemen. The collective-bargaining relationship between Respondent and Union proceeded peacefully for the next 50 years. The most recent agreement, having a term from 1 March 1984 to 1 March 1987, was concluded following five bargaining sessions in 1984.[4]

---

[1] If not specified all further dates refer to the 1987 calendar year.

[2] On 1 November 1987 the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the name of the Union has been amended to reflect that change.

[3] Respondent sells to the retail and nonretail trade. Annually its sales have exceeded $500,000 and its direct inflow exceeded $50,000. Accordingly, Respondent meets the Board's announced standard for exercising jurisdiction over the labor dispute involved here.

[4] Throughout this decision are references to an agreement expiring 8 March. It is the same agreement. As found below, the parties orally extended the agreement from its 1 March expiration through 8 March.

For about 20 years prior to 1982 Jean Sharkey and her husband, Walter M. Goody, Jr., successfully operated the business. In large measure this success was due to a personal arrangement permitting Goody the exclusive right to distribute a waterproofing product manufactured by Thoro Systems, a firm ultimately consumed in a merger with the Beatrice Company. With the resultant boom this arrangement produced, Respondent expanded beyond its historical roots in Denver by adding a branch outlet in Casper, Wyoming.

Good times and humans are not eternal. In 1982 Goody died. The exclusive arrangement for the lucrative waterproofing product ended with his life. In addition to her personal loss, Sharkey was left to deal with the business ramifications of Goody's death.

The effects were not immediate but in 1984, Respondent was confronted with competitors for its principal product. By 1985 Respondent's income statement reflected a loss exceeding $81,000.[5] The following year's income statement reflected a $36,000 loss on net sales, which were $258,000 lower than those of 1985.[6] The January 1987 statement reflected a $6100 loss. According to Sharkey the loss had risen to approximately $30,000 by May 1987.

Certain efforts to retrench Respondent's operations were taken in response to these losses. They included:

1. The Casper branch was closed and its capital equipment was relocated to Denver or sold.

2. The number of bargaining unit employees in Denver was reduced from five to three between 1984 and the end of 1986. In January 1987 one additional bargaining unit employee was laid off.

3. By April 1987 Respondent relocated its Denver operation from quarters requiring a lease payment in excess of $9000 per month to a location where the lease payment is $1600 per month.[7]

4. In mid-January 1987 the pay of the five salaried office employees, including Klaversma and Sales Manager Clarence Robert, was reduced.[8] This was accomplished by a variety of methods. The elimination of Robert's commission earnings resulted in a $600 per month pay reduction. Bookkeeper Marcie Bishop's salary was reduced by $400 per month. Klaversma's and Tenice Goodman's pay were not reduced but their hours of work were extended. Sharkey relinquished her salary altogether in favor of her son who was hired for sales work. Finally, Respondent's profit-sharing plan for nonunit employees was eliminated. Following these salary actions, the two remaining unit employees were Respondent's highest paid employees by a significant margin.

5. Several vehicles were sold in 1986 and early 1987. Those sold in January 1987 produced income in the amount of $4800 and thereby reduced the loss for that month from $10,900 to $6100.

During this retrenchment period, Sharkey made no moves that affected the unit employees' contractual benefits. After participating in the 1984 labor negotiations, Sharkey's perception was that on the conclusion of the 1984–1987 agreement she would be free to legally adjust the unit labor costs promptly as she was of the view even as late as the hearing that she would not be obliged to adhere to the agreement in any manner once it expired.

In the meantime, Sharkey remarried and relocated her personal residence to Indiana. However, she returns to Denver for approximately 1 week per month to oversee Respondent's operations. In her absence, Klaversma is the principal executive in charge of the operation. There is little or no evidence that he is authorized to conduct Respondent's business with the Union.

B. The Alleged Unfair Labor Practices

1. The 8(a)(1) allegations

On 11 November 1986 Sharkey met with the unit employees primarily to reassure them that Respondent was not going to close its doors or declare bankruptcy as widely rumored. In addition to Sharkey, Klaversma and the three unit employees, Richard Einertson, Paul LeGault, and Paul Vestal, were present.

According to LeGault, Sharkey reassured the employees that "the company was not for sale and stuff like that." However, Sharkey did inform the employees that the company was "hurting financially" and that the nonunit employees "hadn't had raises in a certain period of time." Sharkey appealed to the employees to pull together so they could "make a go out of the company."[9]

LeGault testified that after Sharkey spoke, Einertson asked her if "we were going to go without the union." Sharkey responded to Einertson saying "for us to get together and figure out what we wanted . . . and let [Klaversma] know . . . that we'd work something out to go without the union." Einertson then asked if the unit employees "would get a chance to vote on this or anything." In response, Sharkey said the employees would not have a chance to vote as, apparently, "there would be no union contract after March lst."

Because the pension plan was of concern to LeGault, he asked Sharkey about that matter. Sharkey responded that "something would be done about a profit-sharing plan."

[5] More precisely the loss was $81,487.24. Nearly 43 percent of this loss could be attributed to a bad debt writeoff in the amount of $35,016.85 for the month of December 1985, the final month of Respondent's fiscal year. By contrast, the bad debt writeoff for December 1986 was $2913.05. The total bad debt writeoff for 1985 was $46,413.83. The 1986 income statement does not indicate the total of that writeoff for that year.

[6] Respondent's net sales (gross sales plus returns and allowances minus trade discounts) in 1985 were $1,371,250.77. The net sales in 1986 were $1,112,674.33.

[7] This finding is based on Mrs. Sharkey's testimony. However, the 1985 and 1986 income statements reflect rent payments of $62,716.72 and $68,988.40, respectively, or considerably less per month than Sharkey stated at the hearing.

[8] The General Counsel attempted to establish—without success—that Robert was a supervisor. Robert, who is essentially an outside salesman, possesses and exercises only routine authority. Although Sharkey would expect Robert to exercise common sense in Klaversma's absence by sending an intoxicated driver home, such situations have never arisen.

[9] All five individuals who testified concerning this meeting are in substantial accord concerning this aspect of the meeting.

LeGault also recalled Klaversma requested that the unit employees let him know what the drivers wanted after they had an opportunity to get together.

Like LeGault, Einertson testified that Sharkey spent the first part of the meeting reassuring employees that she intended to keep the business going. Following a discussion concerning holidays, Einertson asked "about negotiations come March lst . . . ." Sharkey replied "that come March lst . . . we would be going non-union—there would be no union as of March lst." None of the employees responded but Klaversma said that the employees should "come to me and tell me what you want."

As for the pertinent part of the meeting concerning the Union, Vestal testified that Einertson asked "What about the union?" Purportedly Sharkey replied that "come March there will be no union." Later, at the end of the meeting, Klaversma told the employees "to let . . . the Company know what [the unit employees] wanted."

Sharkey testified that she was "not real sure" if there was any discussion about the Union at this meeting. She said she "just [did not] really know."

Klaversma recalled that following Sharkey's introductory remarks one (unspecified) driver asked: "What about the union?" Klaversma testified that he "really did not remember what [Sharkey's] reply was at the time" but "[t]hey went on discussing that, and I really didn't get that much involved in that one." When asked directly if Sharkey had said that when the contract ended in March there would be no union, Klaversma responded: "I don't recall her saying that, specifically, no." As for remarks the drivers attributed to Klaversma suggesting that he solicited proposals about working conditions after the contract ended, Klaversma testified that he only asked the employees to tell him about their complaints so he would not have any morale problems.

2. The 8(a)(5) allegations

For a number of years Respondent has retained the Mountain States Employers' Council (MSEC) to conduct its labor negotiations. In mid-December 1986 Gus Achey—an MSEC representative who normally handled Respondent's labor negotiations—sent a written notice to the Union's president terminating the existing agreement effective 1 March, its expiration date. The document is a typical "opening letter" in which Achey also invited the Union to arrange "a meeting to discuss a new Agreement."

By mid-January 1987 the Union met with Respondent's employees and drafted a list of proposals for a new agreement which were hand-delivered to Achey at MESC. In late January 1987 Union Representative George Del Monte wrote to inform Achey that the Union "is prepared to meet for the purpose of negotiating an agreement with [Respondent]." About the same time Del Monte reached Achey on the telephone and was informed Respondent would be unable to meet until 27 February, the date of Sharkey's next scheduled return to Denver. Because Sharkey was unavailable until that late date, Achey agreed to extend the agreement to 6 March and tentatively agreed to meet with the Union on 2 and 5 March.[10]

In late February, Sharkey arrived back in Denver as planned. On 1 March she met with MSEC representative Joe Downing to review Respondent's financial predicament and formulate its proposals.[11] By the conclusion of this meeting, Respondent planned to propose the following:

1. Reduce the hourly pay of unit employees from $9.30 to $6.50 per hour.
2. Delete pension contributions by Respondent.
3. Delete the maintenance-of-standards clause (contract article 5).
4. Change the time and one-half premium pay for overtime work from all hours after 8 per day to 40 per week.
5. Switch unit employees from the Union's health and welfare plan to the Respondent's plan established for non-unit employees.
6. Establish a vacation moritorium until the end of the year, Respondent's slow season.
7. Limit the contract term to 7 months (or 1 October).

The Union's proposals delivered to Respondent in mid-January were dramatically different. They provided

1. Increase hourly pay by 40 cents in each year of a three-year agreement.
2. Increase the Respondent's pension contribution by 14 cents per hour each year of the agreement.
3. Require Respondent to maintain health and welfare coverage at no less than the current level.
4. Maintain all other contract provisions.

The following day, 2 March, the Respondent and union negotiators met for the first bargaining session. Downing was Respondent's primary spokesman, aided by Sharkey and Marcie Bishop, the Respondent's bookkeeper. Del Monte spoke for the Union. He was assisted by fellow business agent Ray Tefrey.

During the first portion of the meeting Downing explained the Respondent's financial position at some length, providing the union agents with copies of its income statements for the 1985 and 1986 calendar years as well as its January 1987 income statement, the last available. Although Del Monte could not specifically recall the extent of the losses suffered by Respondent for that period, he clearly remembered Respondent's claim that it was losing money and that the office employees' salaries had been reduced by one means or another. After stressing that any increases in wages and benefits were out of the question and the need for immediate financial relief,[12] Downing slowly set forth Respondent's proposals, enabling the union agents to write them down. Discussions of the Respondent's proposals focused primarily on the relative merits of the health and welfare plans for unit and nonunit employees. During this exchange the union agents were informed that the purpose of this proposal was to realize savings that might accrue under the company plan by enlarging its group coverage. After approximately an hour and a half, the session was adjourned until 5 March.

[10] There is evidence that Sharkey was somewhat upset at Achey's action of extending the agreement.

[11] Achey enlisted his colleague Downing as a substitute because of the press of other business.

[12] Del Monte recalled that Downing said something had to be done by Monday, 9 March.

Between the two bargaining sessions, the union representatives met with the unit employees to review the Respondent's proposals with them.[13] As explained by Del Monte, the union agents "wanted to know from [the employees], and get some direction from them, on what was the bottom line, what was the least they felt that they could work for and what conditions they wanted us to insist would be maintained. As a result of this meeting, the union agents were instructed to first seek a wage freeze and if that was not possible then they could work for a "little less than they were making at the time." However, the employees "didn't feel that they could . . . survive on what the company had offered." In addition, the employees indicated that they could "reluctantly agree to the overtime-after-forty proposal."

The second bargaining session was held on 5 March at the Union's offices. At the outset of this session the Union proposed a wage freeze, which was promptly rejected. The Union then proposed to reduce the wage rate to $8.90 per hour and agreed with the overtime-after-forty proposal. Downing responded that substantially more relief was required. A discussion ensued concerning the Union's willingness to assist Sharkey in filing applications with the city of Denver and the State of Colorado for certification as a minority contractor, a status that presumably would accord Respondent some type of preferential treatment in doing business with those governmental entities. Sharkey, however, had already sought such certification in the past 2 years. The union agents then questioned Respondent's agents closely about the nonunit health plan. That discussion disclosed that Respondent was uncertain of the savings that would be realized from adding the unit employees to the nonunit group coverage. For this reason the union negotiator[14] asked Respondent to extend the agreement while this information was obtained from Respondent's insurance carrier.

At some point in this 1-1/2- to 2-hour meeting Respondent asked for a caucus from which they emerged with a counterproposal. This counterproposal differed from the Respondent's earlier proposal in that (1) the demand to include unit employees in the nonunit health plan was dropped; (2) the vacation moratorium was dropped; and (3) the contract term was shortened from 1 October to 15 September. Downing stressed that the reason for the switch in the health plan proposal was that time was of the essence in obtaining relief. Downing further stated that the Respondent's audit reports showing business conditions for the busier summer months would probably be available by 12 September in time for review by the Union for negotiation of a new agreement. Downing stated that this proposal was the Respondent's final proposal which it intended to implement on 9 March.

The Union responded by suggesting that the unit employees could probably earn more on unemployment compensation than by working at the Respondent's proposed wage rate. Downing told the Union that if the employees chose to leave, the Respondent would not contest their claim for unemployment compensation and that this offer would remain open while the employees were given an opportunity to see how well they could survive on the lower wage rate. Del Monte also recalled that the Union asked if Respondent would consider making the employee pension contributions. Downing responded that employees would have to pay that cost themselves.[15]

The Union also proposed extending the existing agreement until there was an opportunity to have its accountants audit the Respondent's books. Although Respondent agreed to make its books available for audit at any time, Downing told the Union that the Respondent was not in a position to await an audit before it made changes in its wage rates. The Respondent also agreed to make its books available for an audit in September but declined to commit itself to increase wages in September if it was making money because of its tax deficiencies and debt situation.[16]

Del Monte recalled that the union agents (he did not specify which ones) expressed the view that further negotiations were needed—that there had not been sufficient time to consider Respondent's proposals—and that they did not believe an impasse existed. Nevertheless, the 5 March meeeting concluded with the Respondent's request that the Union seek ratification of the Respondent's final proposal. The union agents told Respondent's negotiators that they would take Respondent's proposals to the employees to be voted on but that they could not recommend such an agreement. Nevertheless, Downing provided them with his home number and asked the Union to notify him if the Respondent's proposal was ratified. Downing told the Union agents that if the Respondent's proposals were not ratified, they would be implemented the following Monday anyway. Downing extended the existing agreement through 8 March.

Downing recalled that after the 5 March meeting there were two relatively brief telephone exchanges between Del Monte and himself, one on 5 March and one on 6 March. During one of these exchanges, he agreed that the Respondent would pay prorated vacation pay to the unit employees if they chose to leave and draw unemployment insurance against the Respondent's account. He also recalled that Del Monte again expressed the view that the negotiators were not at an impasse. In effect, Downing felt that in light of the Union's reluctance to agree to its proposals and the limited wage reduction ratified by the employees at the Threewit-Cooper Company,[17] one of Respondent's principal competitors, the Union would not agree to a contract that put Respondent in a significantly better position than this competitor.

[13] Presumably this session was attended by at least Vestal and Einertson. Whether LeGault—who had been laid off approximately 45 days earlier—attended is unknown.

[14] The Union's principal spokesperson at this portion of the meeting appears to have been Ray Tefrey who did not testify.

[15] Del Monte said Respondent's stand on the pension contributions was a major matter with the two employees involved as neither had worked the 10 years necessary in covered employment to have a vested interest in the Union's pension plan. At the time of the hearing Vestal and Einertson had worked for Respondent over 7 years.

[16] While the income statements in evidence reflect a variety of tax payments as operating expenses, they do not indicate if such payments were sufficient to meet Respondent's tax liabilities. The statements reflect no obvious loan or interest payments.

Del Monte recalled that the first telephone conversation occurred during the afternoon of 5 March. He said that he told Downing that the Union had a counterproposal and that further negotiations were needed as the parties were not at impasse.[18] Downing apparently disagreed as he told Del Monte that Respondent had made its final proposal.

On the morning of 6 March, Del Monte again telephoned Downing to request that negotiations continue. Del Monte proposed a meeting for 19 March but apart from the fact that no such meeting was ever agreed on, Downing's response is unknown. Del Monte reported that Downing again stressed that Respondent had made its final proposal.

Del Monte wrote to Downing on 6 March (with a copy to Sharkey and the unit employees.) In the letter, Del Monte repeated his belief that negotiations were not at an impasse. The letter continues: "Due to the limited time allowed by the company for negotiations this Local Union requests further meetings as soon as possible as there are still many issues to discuss and contract articles to address." Del Monte's letter also states that the Union has a counterproposal that it desired to present, suggests a 19 March meeting and requests a response to arrange a time and date for a meeting.

Del Monte received no response to his 6 March letter until approximately 17 or 18 March when Downing called his office and requested to meet at 8:30 a.m. on 19 March. When Del Monte learned of this call he telephoned Downing's office and spoke with a secretary in an effort to arrange a 9:30 or 10 a.m. alternative meeting time on 19 March as he had, in the meantime, made another commitment at 8:30. The alternative times proved unsatisfactory for Downing's schedule so a further meeting between the parties never occurred.

Meanwhile, on 9 March Respondent reduced the unit employees' hourly rate from $9.30 to $6.50, discontinued pension contributions, and began paying overtime premium pay after 40 hours of work per week instead of 8 hours per day. On 10 March, the Union filed the instant charge.

C. Further Findings and Conclusions

1. The independent 8(a)(1) allegations

Section 8(a)(1) of the Act provides that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to "interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees" in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). In essence, Section 7 provides that employees have the right to engage in union or concerted activity for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from such activities.

I find that the account of the employee-witnesses about Sharkey's remark at the November 1986 meeting that there would be no more union after March and Klaversma's followup remarks that the employees should decide what they wanted and come to him are credible. Neither Sharkey nor Klaversma provided a clear-cut denial concerning the reported remarks. Read together, the two remarks convey the message that the Respondent was proceeding to unilaterally dismantle the collective-bargaining system by which employee wages, hours, and working conditions were determined. Announcements of this nature reasonably tend to cause employees to be apprehensive and fearful of persisting against their employer's will in exercising the right they have under Section 7 to bargain collectively. Accordingly, I find the remarks by Sharkey and Klaversma on this occasion to be coercive within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged in the complaint.

2. The 8(a)(5) allegations

Section 8(a)(5) of the Act provides that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "to refuse to bargain collectively with the representative of his employees." (29 U.S.C. § 1158(a)(5).) Section 8(d) of the Act defines the duty to bargain collectively as "the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement or any question arising thereunder." (29 U.S.C. § 158(d).)

Justice Felix Frankfurter, dissenting in NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149, 154–155 (1956), observed that:

> These sections 8(a)(5) and 8(d) obligate the parties to make an honest effort to come to terms; they are required to try to reach an agreement in good faith. "Good faith" means more than merely going through the motions of negotiating; it is inconsistent with the predetermined resolve not to budge from an initial position. But it is not necessarily incompatible with stubbornness or even with what to an outsider may seem unreasonableness. A determination of good faith or of want of good faith normally can rest only on an inference based upon more or less persuasive manifestations of another's state of mind. The previous relations of the parties, antecedent events explaining behavior at the bargaining table, and the course of negotiations constitute the raw facts for reaching such a determination.

Over the years certain more specific principles have evolved that provide flesh for the statutory skeleton set forth above. Among other things, an employer is required to maintain the status quo established by an expired collective-bargaining agreement until the parties reach a new agreement or bargain to an impasse. Teamsters Local 175 (Bell Transit) v. NLRB, 788 F.2d 27 (D.C. Cir. 1986). If an employer unilaterally institutes changes in wages, hours, or working conditions absent an impasse in the negotiations for a new agreement, the duty to bargain in good faith is violated. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962); Stone Boat Yard v. NLRB, 715 F.2d 441, 444 (9th Cir. 1983).

[17] According to Downing, the Threewit-Cooper employees ratified an agreement providing for a 30-cent-per hour wage reduction and overtime premium pay after 40 hours on 5 March.

[18] The terms of the counterproposal are not known. Nor does it appear that Del Monte attempted to report the counterproposal terms to Downing during this conversation or at any later time.

In addition to foregoing basic ground rules establishing the starting point for negotiations, it has been observed that the duty to bargain in good faith contemplates "cooperation in the give and take of personal conferences with willingness to let [the] ultimate decision follow a fair opportunity for the presentation of pertinent facts and arguments." NLRB v. Jacobs Mfg. Co., 19 F.2d 680, 683 (2d Cir. 1952). Good-faith bargaining precludes laying plans for comprehensive changes and timing their announcement or implementation so as to preclude any meaningful negotiation. J. P. Stevens, 240 NLRB 579 (1979). To these ends the courts long ago established the requirement that an employer pleading an inability to pay furnish the bargaining representative with information sufficient to substantiate such claims. NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., supra; NLRB v. Jacobs Mfg. Co., supra.

Here the 9 March unilateral changes in wages and benefits are undisputed. The sole question concerns the presence or absence of a bargaining impasse when these changes occurred. The existence of an impasse is a fact question. In Hi-Way Billboards, 206 NLRB 22, 23 (1973), the Board stated:

> A genuine impasse in negotiations is synonymous with a deadlock; the parties have discussed a subject or subjects in good faith, and despite their best efforts to achieve agreement with respect to such, neither party is willing to move from its respective position. [footnotes omitted].

In Taft Broadcasting, 163 NLRB 475, 478 (1967), the Board identified numerous factors that serve to aid in determining the existence of an impasse:

> Whether a bargaining impasse exists is a matter of judgment. The bargaining history, the good faith of the parties in negotiations, the length of the negotiations, the importance of the issue or issues as to which there is disagreement, [and] the contemporaneous understanding of the parties as to the state of negotiations are all relevant factors to be considered in deciding whether an impasse in bargaining existed.

Regardless, an employer may not "parlay an impasse resulting from its own misconduct into a license to make unilateral changes." Wayne's Olive Knoll Farms, 223 NLRB 260, 265 (1976).

Overall, certain circumstances here suggest the negotiations may have been practically doomed before they began. First, there were several signals that a significant upheaval was likely especially where, as here, the unit employees enjoyed the highest pay rates. Over the period of the recently expired agreement, the size and scope of Respondent's business operation was steadily shrinking. The Casper branch was closed, capital equipment was sold, the unit employment was shrinking, and rumors were afloat that the enterprise was going under. In January as the Union and the unit employees were formulating proposals for wage and benefit increases, one additional unit employee was laid off, salary cuts ranging from $400 to $600 per month were imposed on two of the four unrepresented employees, the hours of the other two were extended without added compensation, and the owner relinquished her own salary in favor of another full-time salesperson albeit that person was her son. Added capital equipment was sold to reduce January losses and Respondent was in search of other lower cost quarters. These factors signaled the probability of concession bargaining.

Second, when negotiations did commence, the Respondent's dire financial circumstances were detailed for the Union's negotiators and the urgency of Respondent's need for immediate relief was emphasized. The salient feature of Respondent's proposal, which lends credence to the urgency of the situation, is, the fact that Respondent was proposing a short-term agreement of 6 or 7 months' duration rather than a long-term commitment.

Third, although some modifications in position were made by both Respondent and the Union at the second session, progress toward a wage and benefit adjustment of the magnitude sought by the Respondent was much slower. Del Monte conceded in his testimony the Union's unwillingness to consider a cut in wages of the magnitude sought by the Respondent. Del Monte's report of the unit employee attitude as reflected in the direction given the Union agents between the two bargaining sessions to seek a pay freeze or a concession in the range of 20 or 30 cents per hour strongly indicates that they too were unwilling to readily accept Respondent's proposed pay. The General Counsel attempts to deflect attention away from this central fact by arguing that Respondent's wage proposal was arbitrary and capricious based on Sharkey's testimony that it was within the range of wage rates at nonunion firms in the area. That argument misses one central point, to wit, the wage reduction Respondent sought to impose on the unit employees was also within the range of cuts already imposed on nonunit employees about 2 months earlier.

Fourth, at the conclusion of the second bargaining session the Union specifically stated its unwillingness to recommend the Respondent's final proposal. This fact, coupled with the concession made that employees could quit to draw unemployment without a contest from Respondent and the limited nature of concessions in the about-to-be-ratified agreement with one of Respondent's competitors, lends some credence to Downing's assessment that the parties were at an impasse.

Despite the high probability that attempts to negotiate a new agreement here would produce an impasse, I am unable to conclude that an impasse—as the term has previously been used by the Board and the courts—occurred so quickly. The question for me to decide is not whether an impasse would occur but rather whether an impasse did occur and, if so, when. Although the number and extent of the bargaining sessions are not controlling considerations,[19] they are factors which, as the Taft Broadcasting case suggests, are significant. When those factors are coupled with the magnitude of the concessions sought by Respondent, the bargaining here simply does not reflect the type of fixed resolve on both sides normally found in impasse situations.

Instead, the facts here show that the Union approached negotiations with a compromising attitude. In the 3 or 4 hours of face-to-face negotiations, the Union abandoned nearly all of its original proposals, accepted the Respondent's position on overtime premium pay, discussed a potential pay reduction albeit not of the magnitude Respondent sought, achieved agreement for an alternate course of action if employees were unable to "live" on the pay scale Respondent proposed, and achieved concessions from Respondent concerning the health and welfare plan and the vacation moritorium. In addition the Union sought an additional meeting to present another proposal. Objectively viewed, these circumstances strongly suggest that the parties were not yet completely deadlocked. Rather, they suggest that at least the Union's position remained fluid while the parties engaged in face-to-face negotiations.

Other atmospheric factors also detract from a conclusion that the parties arrived at a deadlock after "exhaustive" negotiations. Thus, because of Sharkey's unavailability, the parties did not commence negotiations until 2-1/2 months after Respondent sent its termination notice and 1-1/2 months after the Union made its initial proposal. When negotiations did commence, Respondent artifically compressed the time available for negotiations into a 1-week period. Moreover, Respondent insisted on the Union's acceptance of huge concessions without providing the Union with an opportunity to have Respondent's financial records evaluated by independent experts. This was at the very time when the Union was in the process of concluding an agreement with one of Respondent's competitors which involved concessions of a much smaller magnitude.[20] Although Respondent did provide the union agents with the financial statements for the previous 2 years plus the month of January, it is reasonable to infer in light of the Union's request for a broader independent analysis that its negotiators were not competent business analysts. In this circumstance, it would be unreasonable to conclude that the Union requested further substantiation of Respondent's financial position merely to prolong negotiations. Rather, an expert analysis could have provided the union agents with a more persuasive basis to educate unit employees for the need to be more realistic about their expectations concerning an agreement or to provide them with more convincing arguments in further negotiations with Respondent. Moreover, certain aspects of Respondent's financial records in evidence indicate that an expert analysis would be appropriate on the Union's part. Finally, Sharkey's misapprehension that the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement could be abrogated at the end of its term like any ordinary contract suggests that the Respondent's limitation on the bargaining process resulted from a predetermined plan and not from an objective assessment of the Union's bargaining flexibility.

For the foregoing reasons, I find that although obtaining an agreement as circumstances existed here would have been quite difficult, the parties had not yet reached a complete deadlock when Respondent implemented the new wage rates and abolished the pension contributions of 9 March. Accordingly, by doing so, Respondent violated its duty to bargain in good faith as defined in Section 8(a)(5) and (d) of the Act.

II. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth above, occurring in connection with the Respondent's business operations, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several states and tend to lend to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All truck drivers and warehousemen, excluding office and clerical employees, salesmen, executives, foremen, and all supervisory employees with the authority to hire, discharge, promote, discipline, or otherwise effect changes in the status of employees.

4. By telling employees that there would be no union after March 1987 and requesting that they inform Respondent of the working conditions they desired after March 1987, Respondent engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By unilaterally changing the wages and benefits of employees on 9 March without agreement of the Union or without reaching an impasse in negotiations concerning such changes, Respondent engaged in an unfair labor

[19] For example, in Betlem Service Corp., 268 NLRB 354 (1983), the Board adopted Judge Ricci's conclusion that the parties there were at impasse following two formal negotiating sessions. However, in that case, the union adamantly refused to consider any agreement other than a new agreement negotiated with another employer. There the Board stated:

> Generally, [we] will not find that an impasse has occurred unless the negotiations between the parties have been exhaustive. Here, the parties had engaged in only two formal bargaining sessions with subsequent contact through two telephone conversations. We agree with the judge, however, that the Union's refusal to consider any agreement other than the new local agreement caused impasse early in the negotiations.

But cf. NLRB v. Jacobs Mfg. supra; Servis Equipment Co., 198 NLRB 266, 269 (1972).

[20] The Respondent's most recent agreement with the Union contains no "most favored nations" clause. Whether the Threewit-Cooper agreement contained such a clause is not known. Regardless, the Union could not have been expected realistically to agree on a $2.80 per hour wage reduction on the very day it sought employee ratification to an agreement with Respondent's competitor calling for only a 40-cent-per-hour wage reduction.

practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

6. The unfair labor practices specified in paragraphs 4 and 5, above, affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(7) of the Act.

REMEDY

To remedy the unfair labor practices found above, Respondent must cease and desist its unlawful conduct and take the affirmative action specified below to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

Affirmatively, Respondent must bargain in good faith with the Union if requested to do so. Additionally, Respondent must restore and maintain the terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees to those specified in the collective-bargaining agreement, which expired 8 March 1987 until a new agreement is concluded or a valid impasse in bargaining occurs.

The Respondent must also make unit employees whole for the loss of pay they incurred as a consequence of the unlawful change in their wage rate on 9 March 1987, with interest. The amount of backpay due each employee shall equal the difference between their pay as calculated using the wage rate in the expired agreement and the amount they actually received for the period beginning on 9 March 1987 and ending on the date Respondent restores the appropriate wage rate. The appropriate method of determining backpay is specified in Ogle Protection Services, 189 NLRB 682, 683 (1970). The appropriate method of determining the interest on the backpay due is specified in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Respondent must also make pension plan contributions on behalf of the unit employees retroactively to 9 March 1987. The method of determining the amount of those contributions and any interest thereon is specified in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213 (1979).

Finally, Respondent must post the attached notice to inform employees of their rights and the outcome of this matter.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[21]

ORDER

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing before an administrative law judge at which we were provided with the opportunity to present evidence and argument, the National Labor Relations Board concluded that we violated the National Labor Relations Act. To remedy this matter the National Labor Relations Board has ordered us to post this notice and comply with its terms.

The National Labor Relations Act gives employees the right to organize themselves, to join or assist unions, to engage in collective bargaining with their employers through representatives freely chosen by a majority of employees in an appropriate bargaining unit, to engage in other group activities for the mutual aid and protection on the job, and to refrain from any or all of the above activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with Local 13, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America, AFL-CIO as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All truck drivers and warehousemen, excluding office and clerical employees, salesmen, executives, foremen and all supervisory employees with the authority to hire, discharge, promote, discipline, or otherwise effect changes in the status of employees.

WE WILL NOT change the terms and conditions of employment established in our agreement with Teamsters Local 13 which expired on 8 March 1987 until a new agreement or a valid impasse in bargaining is reached.

WE WILL NOT tell employees there would be no union when our collective-bargaining agreement with Teamsters Local 13 expires and request that employees tell us directly about the terms and conditions of employment they want.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request by Teamsters Local 13, bargain in good faith concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment for our employees represented by that union and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

WE WILL restore and maintain the terms and conditions of employment contained in our expired agreement with Teamsters Local 13, including the wage rates and pension benefits, until a new agreement or a valid impasse in bargaining is reached.

WE WILL make unit employees whole, with interest, for the loss of pay they incurred because we unilaterally established new wage rates on 9 March 1987 before an agreement or impasse in bargaining with Teamsters Local 13 was reached.

WE WILL make appropriate pension plan contributions on behalf of the unit employees retroactively to 9 March 1987, with interest if required, because we unilaterally discontinued pension contributions on that date before an agreement or impasse in bargaining with Teamsters Local 13 was reached.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On October 21, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Walter H. Maloney Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in November 1986 when Jackie Bulson spoke to Charging Party Thomas C. Stout. During their conversation Bulson asked Stout, inter alia, about the identity of employees involved in an organizational effort, and Stout's opinion of the union activity. Bulson further told Stout that she would relay the information Stout gave concerning the identity of the employees who were organizing to the plant manager but would leave Stout's name out of the report. The Respondent excepts to the judge's finding of violations based on Bulson's remarks, contending that Bulson was not a statutory supervisor at the time of this conversation. We find merit in the Respondent's exception.

The Respondent is a manufacturer of shifters for Ford automobiles. During November 1986, Bulson, the welding department leadperson on the first shift, was also assigned to work 2 additional hours on the second shift in order to train Stout in his duties as a robotics technician. Although the judge found that Bulson was a supervisor during her normal shift, as well as during her overtime work with Stout when the alleged unlawful conversation took place, we find that her duties and responsibilities were insufficient at that time to establish her as a supervisor under the Act.[2]

As the work leader of 12 employees on the first shift, Bulson turned on the machines in the department, provided supplies, charted and gauged parts, answered questions, and submitted production cards and production sheets for her shift. The record does not show that Bulson's responsibility for assigning work entailed the exercise of independent judgment, since assignments were made by first seeing what jobs were ready to be done and which employees had reported to work, and then directing the workers to operate the machines necessary for the jobs at hand. There was no evidence demonstrating that Bulson exercised discretion in assigning work to employees or determining the priority of work. Bulson did have authority to allow employees to leave work early due to illness or medical appointments, although she could not authorize days off. She had no power to hire or fire, but did participate in oral warnings for excessive absences. However, while she identified cases when a warning might be appropriate, no warning was given unless her supervisor and the plant manager concurred, and even then Bulson and her supervisor together discussed the problem with the employee and signed the forms documenting the warning. Bulson testified that such oral warnings were rare and that her recommendations were not always adopted by her superiors. Finally, Bulson indicated that she did not handle problems with employees who would not perform their duties, but rather would inform her supervisor of the matter.

The foregoing evidence indicates that Bulson's assignment of work to employees was routine and that her role in giving oral warnings did not demonstrate the exercise of discretion or independent judgment. Further, her allowing employees to leave work early if they were ill or had medical appointments is insufficient to establish supervisory status. We therefore conclude that Bulson was not a supervisor in November 1986 and that the Respondent did not coercively interrogate Stout and place employee union activities under company surveillance in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Delete Conclusions of Law 2 and substitute the following:

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We note that in the last sentence of sec. I,B, par. 6, of his decision, the judge inadvertently named Joann Nelson rather than Jackie Bulson as the person to whom Debbie Griffis Vincent and Kenny Miller complained about the lack of premium pay for their shift.

[2] We note that from early January 1987 Bulson served in positions which the Respondent admits were supervisory positions. This fact, however, is insufficient to affect our finding that at the time of her conversation with Stout in November 1986 Bulson was not a statutory supervisor.

or voted to support a union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act."

ORDER[3]

The Respondent, Kent Products, Inc., White Cloud Division, White Cloud, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees with plant closure and discharge if they engage in a strike or vote to support a union.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at the Respondent's White Cloud, Michigan plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER H. MALONEY JR., Administrative Law Judge. This case came on for hearing before me at Grand Rapids, Michigan, on June 25, 1987, on an unfair labor practice complaint,[1] issued by the Regional Director for Region 7 and amended at the hearing, which alleges that Respondent Kent Products, Inc., White Cloud Division,[2] violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. More particularly, the amended complaint alleges that the Respondent instructed employees not to engage in concerted protected activities, threatened to close the plant if a union were voted in, interrogated employees concerning their union activities, and discharged Charging Party Thomas C. Stout because he engaged in concerted, protected activities. The Respondent denies each of these allegations and asserts that it discharged Stout because Stout engaged in a fight on company property that was provoked, at least in part, by disparaging statements and scandalous accusations that he had made about a fellow employee. On these contentions the issues were drawn.[3]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ALLEGED

Respondent operates a manufacturing facility in White Cloud, Michigan, where it produces auto parts for the Ford Motor Company. Recently Respondent was purchased by the Sparton Corporation. At White Cloud it

[3] The judge's recommended Order includes a visitatorial clause allowing the Board to obtain discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in the event that the Order must be enforced through contempt proceedings. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[1] The principal docket entries in this case are as follows:

Charge filed by Thomas C. Stout, an individual, against the Respondent on February 17, 1987; complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 7, against the Respondent on March 26, 1987; Respondent's answer filed on April 4, 1987; hearing held in Grand Rapids, Michigan, on June 25, 1987; briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent on August 17, 1987.

[2] I find that the Respondent is a Michigan corporation that maintains its principal place of business in White Cloud, Michigan, where it is engaged in the manufacture and sale of automotive parts. During the fiscal year ending July 1, 1986, in the course and conduct of this operation Respondent purchased at its White Cloud, Michigan plant directly from points and places located outside the State of Michigan goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000. Accordingly, the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

employs approximately 125 production and maintenance employees. They were formerly represented by a labor organization, but, at some point in time not disclosed in the record, the Union was decertified.

Until January 1987, the Respondent maintained a two-shift operation. The first shift reported at 7 a.m. and left at 3:30 p.m. The second shift reported at 3:30 p.m. and stayed until midnight. The second shift received a 10-cent-per-hour shift premium. Because production was backlogged and the Respondent's robotic machines were not utilized 8 hours each day, Plant Manager Vince Sweezey, in consultation with certain supervisors, decided to put the plant on a three-shift basis and posted a notice to that effect. The notice, dated January 9, 1987, read:

> Please be advised effective January 12, 1987, the robots will have an added third shift. Please note the following schedules.
> 3:00 a.m. to 11:00 a.m. 1st shift no premium
> 11:00 a.m. to 7:00 p.m. 2nd shift 10 cent premium
> 7:00 p.m. to 3:00 a.m. 3rd shift 15 cent premium

Charging Party Thomas C. Stout was transferred to the new first shift from the former second shift. By virtue of this transfer he stood to lose his shift premium.[4] His reaction to the shift change constitutes a significant portion of this case.

Stout was hired by the Respondent in July 1986, as a robotics technician and was placed under the supervision of Maintenance Supervisor Frank Gavinski. He also came into frequent contact with Supervisors Jackie Bulson and Joann Nelson.[5] During the fall of 1986, Bulson was assigned to give Stout special training as a robot maintenance man because he was having difficulty learning the job. After finishing her regular tour of duty as a first-shift leadlady in the welding department, she would return to the plant in the evening during Stout's shift and give him 2 hours of assistance and training in robotics maintenance and repair.[6]

I credit Stout's testimony[7] that, during one of these evening training sessions in November, Bulson asked Stout if he had heard anything in the shop concerning a union. She said she wanted to know who was spreading unionization "rumors" and who was organizing. Stout asked if he would get into trouble if he told her. She assured him that he would not. Stout then mentioned the names of Nick McGraw, Simon Quintanilla, and Bill Seply as union sympathizers, saying that he had discussed unionization with them. She then asked Stout about his own feelings but he declined to reply. She told Stout that she would relay the information that he had given her to plant management but would leave Stout's name out of her report. Bulson reported her conversation with Stout to Nelson, and both of them took the information to Sweezey. When Sweezey learned of the rumor, he phoned his supervisor, Gary White, the manufacturing manager for Kent Products, and relayed the information to him. White asked Sweezey how plant morale was faring. When Sweezey said he thought that morale was good, White told him simply to "sit tight" and not react.

About the time that the shift change notice was posted,[8] a number of employees objected to the new 3 a.m. starting time and the fact that this shift carried with it no shift premium. They began to criticize the change among themselves. Among those who were opposed to the change were Debbie Griffis Vincent, Laurie Pace, Scott Carpenter, and Stout. Vincent and fellow employee Kenny Miller went to see Bulson about the change. They told her that they thought it was unfair that they should be asked to report to work at 3 a.m. and not receive any shift premium for their trouble. Bulson replied that the 3 a.m. shift was considered the first shift so employees assigned to it were not eligible for a premium. After returning to their duty stations, they were criticized by Supervisor Gary Clark for taking their complaint to Nelson rather than to him.

Stout asked Vincent and Miller what had happened. They related that they had made a complaint about the shift change and were chewed out for doing so by Clark because he felt they should have come to him rather than to Bulson. Stout said that he would take the complaint to Nelson and he did so. After voicing to Nelson and Clark the complaint that the shift change was unfair because it deprived 3 a.m. shift employees of a shift premium, Nelson told him that Sweezey had designated the 3 a.m. shift as the first shift and that it would have no premium connected with it. Stout said that he thought it was unfair because the new shift, which began at 3 a.m., was actually part of an old shift that paid a shift premium. He suggested that they ask Sweezey how he would like to get up at 3 a.m. in order to be at work when he was used to getting up at 10 a.m. The two supervisors told Stout that they would relay his complaint to Sweezey and in fact they did so.

[4] In fact, because of a clerical error, Stout was not actually deprived of his shift premium during the week in which the three-shift operation was in effect.

[5] Gavinski exercised general oversight of maintenance personnel. He could and did evaluate and reprimand employees for shortcomings in their job performance. The record reflects that he was empowered to suspend employees and did in fact suspend Stout. I conclude that Gavinski is a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Joann Nelson carried the title of supervisor of the pressroom and welding department, which consists of about 35 employees. She can discipline and discharge employees. I conclude that she is a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. From January 6, 1987, until June 1, Jackie Bulson was an acting supervisor on the second shift. After June 1 she was given the title of supervisor. At some period of time in 1986, she was also an acting supervisor. During the months of October, November, and December 1986, she was a leadperson on the first shift. As lead welder, she performed quality-control work, set up work in her department each day, made sure that the 12 employees in that department had supplies, and that they properly filled out production cards and production sheets. She earned 5 percent more in this position than other employees. Although claiming that she did not administer discipline, she could give oral warnings, the first step in the Respondent's five-step progressive discipline system, with the consent of her own supervisor. She regularly assigned work each day to the employees under her supervision. Based on these factors, I conclude that Jackie Bulson was a supervisor both when she was a leadperson and when she was given titles indicating higher supervisory authority.

[6] Bulson did not cease to be a supervisor because she worked overtime in the evening instructing Stout. She was paid her regular wage for this extra service, and there is no reason to believe that she had less authority during evening hours than she exercised during the day.

[7] Bulson was not an impressive witness. She was biased, not only in an institutional sense but in a personal one. She was intimately involved in the events that led up to Stout's discharge. She repeated Stout's questionable remarks to Simon Quintanilla, Stout's antagonist in the fight which led to the discharge of both men. But for her act the fight would never have taken place. Moreover, the propriety of her relationship with Quintanilla was seriously challenged by Stout, who made remarks to her that reflected badly on her character. Accordingly, I would discredit any controverted testimony that she gave.

[8] There is some conflict in the testimony as to whether Stout's complaint about the shift change took place immediately before or immediately after the Monday on which the change took place. It is immaterial to this case whether he complained just before or just after the event.

An hour or so later Stout had a lengthy discussion with Gavinski. He had previously asked Gavinski for a raise and, in response to that request, Gavinski went to Stout's personnel records and looked at Stout's resume. The resume was a lengthy one. Instead of merely reciting Stout's previous jobs, the resume went into great detail concerning the job content of the position that Stout had vacated in order to come to work for the Respondent, itemizing 11 different elements or components in his former position. Gavinski told Stout that he did not think that his performance to date for the Respondent had measured up to the expectations that the Company had when it first saw his resume.[9] Stout told Gavinski that he thought that all employees, including himself, who worked on the newly constituted first shift should receive a shift premium and mentioned that he had brought the same complaint to the attention of other supervisors. Gavinski replied that, if Stout had talked about it with other supervisors, the matter was surely being taken care of. I credit Gavinski that he did not tell Stout that he should just watch out for himself and further find that he did not tell Stout on this occasion that he could fire him if he wished. I discredit Stout and credit Nelson with respect to a statement, assertedly made by Nelson to Stout after his conversation with Gavinski, to the effect that Nelson told Stout that he would have been better off to have kept his mouth shut. Nelson denied even having made this statement.

On January 19, the Respondent discontinued the three-shift operation, which had been in effect the previous week, and returned to the two-shift operation it previously utilized. Various reasons for the discontinuance of the new shift arrangement were given in the record, but it appears clear that Stout's protest and the unhappiness of first-shift workers played a large role in the Company's decision to go back to its former practice.

Sometime in mid or late January, Stout told Vincent, Pace, and Carpenter that he would bring up the dispute over the pay premium at the next company meeting. About this same point in time, Stout spoke with Bulson concerning the shift premium dispute. I credit his testimony to the effect that he complained to her that the failure of the Company to pay a shift premium on first shift was a raw deal and both he and others were upset about it. In the course of his protest he stated, "Now you can understand why some people had union sympathies." Bulson replied that, if employees voted to unionize, the Company would close the plant, any people who went on strike would lose their jobs, and the Company would just reopen under another name.

About midnight on January 20-21, just before Bulson was leaving the plant for the evening, she had a brief conversation with Stout. In the course of that conversation, Stout referred to employee Quintanilla by an obscene variation of his name and suggested to Bulson that she and Quintanilla were a "hot little number."[10] She denied the accusation, saying that Stout must be "on drugs." She asked Stout where he obtained this information. He replied that he had heard it in the shop, both from Quintanilla himself and from another employee, John Winks. Stout suggested that, if she did not want this matter to get back to her husband, she should stop seeing Quintanilla. According to Stout's version of the conversation, she said she was going to do so. According to Bulson, she denied to Stout any such relationship ever existed. In any event, on her way home from work she stopped at Charlie's Bar, where Quintanilla was drinking beer with two or three individuals, and recounted to Quintanilla the conversation between Stout and her.

Quintanilla went to the plant about 4 a.m. and sought out Stout. There is no factual dispute that Quintanilla had been drinking or that he was not authorized to be on company property at that time since he was off duty.[11] Quintanilla accused Stout of having a "big mouth" and stated that he was always causing trouble. As he made this accusation, he began poking Stout in the chest. Stout pushed his hand away and Quintanilla hit Stout in the mouth, causing him to fall into a bandsaw. Stout was dazed but got up and saw Quintanilla come toward him threatening to "beat the living shit" out of Stout. Stout warned Quintanilla to get out of the shop before both of them were fired. Quintanilla replied that it was just one person's word against the other as to who threw the first punch, but eventually he left the plant through the back door.

Stout noticed that he was bleeding and decided to go to the hospital for treatment. He called Bulson at her home, reported what had happened, and told her that he was in the emergency room. She said that he could not leave the others on his shift unsupervised. Stout suggested that she put Phil Vincent in charge and she agreed. He also said he knew that a fight would occur if she repeated to Quintanilla what he had said to her earlier in the evening.

About 10 a.m. Stout received a call at his home from Gavinski, who told him that he was being put on suspension pending an investigation. Stout insisted that the fight with Quintanilla was not his fault and told Gavinski that he was retaining counsel. He also told Gavinski that he did not think that he would be able to work the balance of the week because of the injuries he had sustained. According to Gavinski, the purpose of the call was to get Stout's version of the incident. Gavinski observed in the course of his testimony that various reports that he had received concerning the fight basically jibed. Stout told Gavinski that he was going to file a complaint against Quintanilla with the Newaygo County sheriff's department. In fact he did so and Quintanilla was brought to trial for assault. No criminal action was taken against Stout.

[9] I credit Gavinski that, during this interview, he did not accuse Stout of falsifying his resume.

[10] Stout admits most of the conversation, as reported by Bulson, but denies he used the word "hot."

[11] Quintanilla did not testify so Stout's version of this incident is uncontradicted in the record.

On January 27, Sweezey sent identical letters to Stout and Quintanilla that read:

> After review of the situation that occurred on January 21, 1987, White Cloud Products has no other alternative than to follow the Employee Handbook, page 6, paragraph 2 and item #4 and item #10.
> As of today January 27, 1987 your name has been removed from the Seniority List at White Cloud and your employment has been terminated.

The paragraph in question covers grounds for discipline. Item 4 is "disorderly conduct" and Item 10 is "unprovoked assault."

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. Violations of Section 8(a)(1) by Threats and Interrogation

I have found that early in November 1986, Supervisor Bulson asked Stout if he had heard anything in the shop concerning unionization and asked him specifically who was spreading unionization "rumors." She also asked Stout what his own feelings were on the subject. Stout expressed apprehension that he might get into trouble by answering her questions. She assured him that he would not but did tell him that she would be passing the information along to higher management without using his name. In fact, she did relay the information she received from Stout to higher management, including the name of one or more individuals mentioned by Stout as union activists. By these statements and actions, the Respondent engaged in coercive interrogation and in placing the union activities of employees under company surveillance in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Having discredited Stout's assertion that Nelson told him that he would have been better off keeping his mouth shut instead of protesting the failure of the Respondent to pay a shift premium, I would dismiss so much of the amended complaint, which alleges a violation of the Act in this regard.

In response to a complaint from Stout about why employees might want to unionize, Bulson told him that, if the employees voted to unionize, the Company would close the plant, strikers would lose their jobs, and the Company would reopen under another name. These statements constitute threats to take reprisal for union and protected activities that violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. I so find and conclude.

B. Stout's Concerted Protected Activities

There is no question that the shift change and the failure of the Respondent to pay shift premiums to employees scheduled to report for work at 3 a.m. caused considerable consternation among those who were adversely affected. Vincent and fellow employee Kenneth Miller protested the matter to Bulson. When they got nowhere, they discussed the problem and their unsuccessful efforts with Stout and he also protested the matter to Nelson. In turn she carried the protest to the plant manager and the grievance was ultimately resolved in the employees' favor. Stout also raised the question with Gavinski. The Respondent admits that Stout's complaint was, at least in part, responsible for the elimination of the three-shift schedule and its return to a two-shift schedule. It is clear from these facts that Stout engaged in concerted protected activities with his fellow employees and the Respondent was well aware of this fact. It is also undeniable that Stout's protests took place not long before he was discharged.

C. Stout's Discharge

Despite the fact that Stout engaged in concerted protected activities and made prounion remarks not long before his discharge, it remains incumbent on the General Counsel to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that Stout's sentiments and activities were responsible, at least in part, for his termination. Although the General Counsel has presented an arguable position, I am forced to conclude that the Respondent was not asserting a pretext when it fired Stout, that its stated reason for terminating him was also its real reason, and that the portion of the amended complaint alleging a discriminatory or illegal discharge of Stout should be dismissed.

Admittedly there is a certain lack of abstract logic in asserting that each of two participants in a fight has engaged in an unprovoked assault on the other. The facts appearing in this record and the facts ascertained by the Respondent in the course of its own investigation of the incident demonstrate that Quintanilla, not Stout, was the aggressor in the fight that occurred on the morning of Stout's suspension. At the time of the fight Stout was working at his assigned duties, whereas Quintanilla, who was under the influence of alcohol, came on company property without authority, sought out the Charging Party, and started accusing him and poking him in the chest. That these facts make out an assault by Quintanilla on Stout under the criminal statutes of the State of Michigan is a matter of concern for the prosecuting attorney for Newaygo County. It is the Board's province to examine the links in the chain of causality that lead to Stout's discharge and to see if protected concerted activities or union activities were among those links. In the absence of such causality, the Respondent may discharge Stout for good reason, bad reason, or no reason at all, even if it appears that he was the victim and not the perpetrator of an assault.

Had the Respondent discharged Stout and retained Quintanilla, a good argument for pretext could be made out, but such was not the case. If Stout bore no responsibility at all for the events immediately preceding his discharge, it could be argued that the Respondent was merely lying in wait for an irritating employee on its list of undesirables to make a mistake. Having been presented with an occasion to act by virtue of a fight, which occurred in its plant, the Company then took advantage of the incident to rid itself of an employee whom it wished to fire for totally unrelated reasons. However, Stout himself set in motion the chain of events that led to the fight. He had, on more than one occasion, referred to Quintanilla in a vulgar manner. Within a few hours before this fight Stout confronted his immediate supervisor with the accusation that she was seriously misbehaving with a fellow employee and warned her of the consequences of her alleged actions. Even the slightest reflection should have made Stout realize that such remarks could have explosive consequences. The Respondent was well within the bounds of prudence in believing that such accusations and talebearing could have and would have serious adverse consequences on the morale in its shop. The fact that Quintanilla was guilty of a criminal assault and that Stout was his victim does not bar the Respondent from concluding that it did not want scandalous accusations being circulated in its plant and wished to prevent such talk from generating similar incidents in the future. In the chain of causality that led up to the January 21 incident, union activities and concerted protected activities played no part, but Stout's inflammatory comments played a large part. In light of these considerations, I conclude that concerted protected activities on the part of Stout did not bring about his termination. Accordingly, I would dismiss so much of the amended complaint that alleges that it did.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Kent Products, Inc., White Cloud Division, is now and at all times material has been an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. By coercively interrogating employees concerning their union and concerted protected activities and the union and concerted protected activities of other employees; by threatening employees with plant closure and discharge if they engaged in strikes or voted to support a union; and by placing the union and concerted protected activities of employees under company surveillance, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. The aforesaid unfair labor practices have a close, intimate, and adverse effect on the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I will recommend that it be required to cease and desist and to take other affirmative actions that are designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. The General Counsel has requested that the Board's Order include a visitatorial clause permitting the Board to obtain discovery in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in the event that the order in this case has to be enforced through contempt proceedings. I will recommend such an order. I will also recommend that the Respondent be required to post the usual notice, advising its employees of their rights and of the results in this case.

ORDER REMANDING PROCEEDING

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On June 9, 1982, Administrative Law Judge James L. Rose issued the attached decision finding that the layoff of certain permanent striker replacements did not create any vacancies to which unreinstated economic strikers would be entitled under Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), and dismissing the complaint which alleges that the Respondent's failure to recall unreinstated strikers ahead of the laid-off striker replacements violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The General Counsel filed exceptions to the judge's decision and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in answer to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On May 26, 1988, the Board issued a Decision and Order in Aqua-Chem, 288 NLRB 1108, setting forth the criteria to be used in determining whether a layoff has resulted in the departure of a striker replacement under Laidlaw, and allocating to parties their respective burdens of proof on this issue.

The Board has decided to remand this proceeding to the judge for the purpose of allowing the parties an opportunity to present evidence on this issue in accordance with the Board's holding in Aqua-Chem, and for his further consideration consistent with that decision.[1] Subsequently, the judge is instructed to issue a supplemental decision, including findings of fact with credibility resolutions, conclusions of law, and a recommended Order, consistent with this remand Order. Copies of such supplemental decision shall be served on all parties, after which the provision of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations shall apply.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting.

I disagree with my colleagues' conclusion that a remand is warranted in this case. The Respondent recalled, ahead of unreinstated economic strikers, five striker replacements who had been laid off for periods of 14 to 16 months. In accordance with my concurring opinion in Aqua-Chem, 288 NLRB 1108 (1988), and contrary to my colleagues, I would not place the burden on the General Counsel to prove that the layoff of these striker replacements created "vacancies" to which the unreinstated strikers were entitled to be recalled. Instead, I find that the Respondent had the burden of establishing that there was a substantial business justification for failing to recall the unreinstated strikers after a layoff of such a long duration resulting solely from a prolonged shortage of work. Further, I find that the Respondent had ample opportunity during the hearing to make such a showing, but that the evidence demonstrates that it failed to do so. I see no purpose to be served by giving Respondent—more than 6 years after the judge's decision in this case—a second chance to prove that these layoffs did not create vacancies within the meaning of Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969). In my view, the long, indefinite layoffs here constituted a sufficient interruption of the employment relationship so as to warrant the recall of the unreinstated strikers.

Accordingly, I would reverse the judge and find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by failing to recall the unreinstated strikers.

W. Gene Heard, Esq. and Coleman Garrett, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Louis A. Fuselier, Esq. and Jeffrey A. Walker, Esq. (Fuselier, Ott, McKee & Moeller, P.A.), of Jackson, Mississippi, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried before me on March 17, 18, and 19, 1982, at Macon, Mississippi, on the General Counsel's complaint, which alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., by failing to reinstate certain economic strikers.

The Respondent generally denied that it engaged in any unfair labor practices and specifically contends that its treatment of the strikers was in accordance with established principles set by the Board and courts.

On the record as a whole,[1] including my observation of the witnesses, briefs and arguments of counsel, I make the following

[1] Given the rule in Aqua-Chem placing the burden on the General Counsel to show that permanent replacements who were subsequently laid off had no reasonable expectation of recall, we believe that, notwithstanding the passage of time, it is appropriate to give the General Counsel the opportunity to meet that burden here.

[1] The General Counsel's motion to correct the transcript is, without objection, granted and is included in the formal papers as G.C. Exh. 1(p). The Respondent's motion to receive into evidence its Exh. 5 is granted and is included with the exhibits.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution primarily of architectural bricks for use in commercial construction at its Macon, Mississippi facility. In its conduct of this business, the Respondent annually ships from its Macon facility goods, products, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Mississippi and annually receives directly from points outside the State of Mississippi goods, products, and materials valued in excess of $50,000. From these facts, I conclude that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, Southern Council of Industrial Workers, Local Union 2272 (the Union) has for a number of years represented employees of the Respondent in a basic production and maintenance unit. It has negotiated on behalf of these employees with the Respondent concerning wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and has been a party with the Respondent to a series of collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which is effective from September 24, 1979, to September 23, 1982.

On these facts, I conclude that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

With minor and largely immaterial exceptions, the facts giving rise to this dispute are uncontested. In the summer of 1979, representatives of the Union and the Respondent began negotiations for a collective-bargaining agreement to succeed the one then in existence. After several meetings the employees determined to press their additional bargaining demands, which had been rejected by the Company, by engaging in an economic strike. The strike began at midnight September 11 and ended on Friday, September 21 (according to the General Counsel's witnesses), or Sunday, September 23 (according to the Respondent's witnesses). In any event, the parties did meet on September 23, entered into a stipulation settling the strike, and agreed to a new contract. And on September 24 the Respondent began to reinstate the strikers.

However, during the strike the Respondent had hired some permanent replacements; thus when the Respondent had reached a full complement of employees, there remained without jobs 37 strikers who had been permanently replaced. These individuals were advised to sign a form indicating whether they wished to be recalled in the event of a job vacancy and those who did so were placed on a preferential hiring list. To the date of the hearing only one had been called back to work, inasmuch as during the intervening period, due to the downturn in the economy, the Company has not been operating even at its prestrike capacity.

On January 30, 1980, five individuals, all of whom had been hired during the strike, were laid off. In March and May 1981 these individuals were recalled to the jobs from which they had been laid off.[2]

In recalling these individuals, the Company did not consider any of the strikers who had not yet been reinstated although in every case the nonreinstated strikers had company seniority superior to that of any of the five laid-off replacements. Further, some of the nonreinstated strikers had in fact worked in the departments to which the replacements were recalled. Though there is no evidence that any nonreinstated striker was specifically qualified to do the particular job from which the replacement had been laid off and recalled, there is also no evidence they were all unqualified. By and large the nonreinstated strikers had worked for the Company many years. In any event, the Respondent concedes that it did not consider recallings, even if qualified, nonreinstated strikers to these jobs. The laid-off replacements were given preference over nonreinstated strikers.

B. Issues

The General Counsel contends that because these five replacements had been laid off in excess of 15 months, the positions to which they were recalled were really job vacancies. Thus to give them preference over any nonreinstated striker was tantamout to granting the striker replacements superseniority, which necessarily discriminated against the strikers and was violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221 (1963).

The Respondent contends that it had the right to replace permanently individuals who engaged in an economic strike, NLRB v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333 (1938), and that as long as it does not discriminate against the strikers in its recall of them, it has not violated the Act, NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375 (1967). Further, the Respondent contends that it did in fact recall the strikers in accordance with the procedures set forth by the Board in Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970).

C. Analysis and Concluding Findings

The relative rights of economic strikers to their jobs and of employers to continue business during a strike is well settled in Mackay, Fleetwood, Laidlaw, and numerous subsequent cases. Generally, an employee may not be discharged or otherwise discriminated against for having engaged in a strike. However, an employer may operate its business, and may do so by offering permanent jobs to individuals who are willing to work during a strike. When a strike ends, an employer need not discharge the replacements to make room for the strikers. Thus a striker may not be discharged but may be permanently replaced. When a striker is permanently replaced, he is entitled to reinstatement on departure of the replacement only until he becomes a permanent employee elsewhere. Of course, as the Board and Supreme Court noted in Erie Resistor, the employer may not discriminate against strikers by giving replacements or those who abandon the strike, for instance, an additional 20 years' seniority. Nor may strikers otherwise be treated disparately from replacements, nonstrikers, or those who abandon the strike. Transport Co. of Texas, 177 NLRB 180 (1969); Wisconsin Packing Co., 231 NLRB 546 (1977). Nevertheless, absent disparity of treatment, a striker who has been permanently replaced only has the right to be reinstated if there is a job opening and then only until he has become permanently employed elsewhere.

[2] This finding is based on the unequivocal, generally credible, and uncontroverted testimony of Charles S. Barrett, the Respondent's administrator, even though documentary evidence seems to indicate that two of them were recalled to different jobs. That is, Eddie Tutt and Fred Ivy replaced strikers in the finished products department yet the recall notice for each was to a job in the production department. As indicated, I resolve this apparent discrepancy in favor of the specific testimony of Barrett. I note that this matter was apparently not considered of particular significance by the parties, which enhances Barrett's reliability. His demeanor was positive, and on this, his testimony was specific. The recall notices are ambiguous and are not really dispositive of which job the individual was recalled to. Finally, on brief the General Counsel does not contest this fact.

These cases deal with two similar, but distinct, concepts—the conditions under which strikers are entitled to reinstatement and, the right of strikers not to be discriminated against (either before or after reinstatement).

The matter deals basically with the former. It is argued that by recalling replacements who had been laid off about 15 months instead of nonreinstated strikers, in effect the Respondent granted the replacements superseniority. The General Counsel contends that the senior qualified nonreinstated striker should, in each case, have been offered the job. There is no contention that the striker who was specifically replaced on one of these jobs is entitled to it.

The General Counsel contends that a job vacancy is created when a company determines to end a layoff caused by economic considerations. Either the layoff and subsequent reactivation of the job amounts to departure of the replacement (as in Laidlaw) or implies a vacancy resulting from expansion of the work force (as in Fleetwood). In either case strikers were entitled to consideration.

The General Counsel does not suggest that a layoff of short duration would create a vacancy but only a "layoff of several month's duration caused by a prolonged shortage of work, constitutes a sufficient interruption of the employment relationship which would warrant recall of both unreinstated strikers and strike replacements on a nondiscriminatory basis."

It should be noted at this point that the issue litigated in this proceeding is quite narrow and concerns whether when a striker replacement is laid off and then recalled to his job there is a "vacancy." This case does not involve the rights of strikers generally—nonreinstated or otherwise. For instance, the manner in which the Respondent has handled the filling of job openings caused by resignation or discharge or the creation of a new job is not in dispute. With such openings the Respondent first posts the job for bid among employees currently working. If no currently working employee bids on the job or none is qualified, then a notice is sent to all employees on layoff. If that produces no qualified bidder, then the Respondent sends a notice of the job opening to the nonreinstated strikers. Thus the Respondent admits that with regard to job openings, it has treated nonreinstated strikers differently from current employees or employees on layoff. The General Counsel, however, specifically stated at the hearing that this policy is not alleged to be violative of the Act.

On the essentially undisputed facts before me, I conclude that the five individuals involved in this matter were laid off from a specific job and each was recalled to his/her respective job. There were no job vacancies for which the nonreinstated strikers need have been considered.

When an employee is laid off he is not deemed terminated if he had "a reasonable expectation of recall." Thus his recall is not to a job vacancy. Such was the Board's holding in Bancroft Cap Co., 245 NLRB 547 (1979), in which it was specifically held that the length of the layoff is relevant in determining whether a vacancy existed. In Bancroft the layoffs were from 2 to 7 days and caused by a shortage of materials.

Here the five striker replacements were on layoff for 15 months. Such is clearly relevant to the question of whether they had a reasonable expectation of recall and whether they were recalled to a job vacancy. The longer the hiatus the more indication that they had no reasonable expectation of recall and when recalled, it was to a vacancy and not to their respective jobs.

However, length of time is not dispositive, particularly given the current state of the national economy. Other factors are also relevant. First, the fact that one is laid off rather than terminated implies some expectation of recall. The cause of the layoff would also tend to prove whether the employee might expect to be recalled—whether, for instance, the lack of work causing a layoff appears permanent (as with buggy whips) or temporary (as with automobiles). Here the layoff resulted from a general downturn in the construction industry—not obsolescence.

That these laid-off employees waited 15 months for recall does not end their expectation for recall. To the date of the hearing the nonreinstated strikers had waited 2-1/2 years, yet expect to be rehired. The collective-bargaining agreement provides that seniority will be lost after 9 months on layoff (a provision that the Respondent does not apply). Though such would tend to diminish one's expectation of recall, it would not necessarily end that expectation.

It is also relevant whether the employee on layoff is recalled to the job he had, or to another one. Here the uncontested and generally credible evidence is that striker replacements were recalled to the specific jobs from which they were laid off.

It would seem not to matter whether an employee's absence from work was a day, a month, or a year if during that period his job was not performed by anybody else and he was specifically recalled to that job. If those are the facts, and I must conclude they are in this case, then the layoff did not create a job vacancy nor did the Company's determination to recall the individual laid off. Again, this matter does not involve competing for jobs either newly created or occasioned by discharge or resignation.

As to the specific facts here, nonreinstated strikers were not treated differently than any other group of nonworking employees. Laid-off replacements were not considered a class and given preference. Rather an individual was given the first opportunity to return to the job from which he was laid off and in each case accepted. Although it happens that each of the laid-off employees here were striker replacements, that was not, apparently, a factor. They could have been laid-off reinstated strikers with the same result.

Thus Giddings & Lewis, 255 NLRB 742 (1981), enf. denied 675 F.2d 926 (7th Cir. 1982), cited by the General Counsel, is distinguishable from this matter. In Giddings & Lewis, the Board was concerned with the promulgation of a comprehensive seniority policy and not with the specific situation of given individuals laid off from and recalled to particular jobs. Under the seniority policy announced in Giddings & Lewis, regardless of how the job vacancies came about, striker replacements on layoff would be given preference to nonreinstated strikers. The Board concluded the policy was violative of the Act. The Seventh Circuit disagreed, holding that a layoff does not terminate the employment relationship and a layoff does not create "a 'vacancy' in the work force which would entitle a striker to reinstatement."

Although I am, of course, bound by the Board's decision I do not believe it is controlling here. The Respondent's general treatment of striker replacements vis-a-vis nonreinstated strikers was not litigated. Rather, this case concerns only whether specific employees who had been laid off could be recalled to their particular jobs without the opportunity to compete being given nonreinstated strikers.

Without regard to the question of whether there were "job vacancies," the issue is whether the last incumbent is entitled to paramount consideration when the Respondent determines to reactivate a job. To conclude, as I do, that such is permissible does not put strikers in a subordinate class. Indeed, another time the laid-off employees might be reinstated strikers.

When strikers are put in a separate and subordinate class from nonstrikers, such inherently discriminates against one for having engaged in protected activity. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967). Here, as to the matter litigated, strikers were not considered separately. Classes were not established based on one's participation in protected activity.

Establishing classes based on participation in protected activity was the basis of the Board's holding in Giddings & Lewis. There the company promulgated a policy whereby nonreinstated strikers were placed in a subordinate class to laid-off employees (presumably replacements as well as others) for purposes of bidding on job openings. That case did not deal with the situation of individuals on layoff being recalled to the specific jobs they had. In fact the Board held that the company was free to set criteria for job bidding so long as such did not relate to having engaged in protected activity.

Here the only criterion used for selecting the individuals for recall was their incumbency in the particular job. Such does not relate to having engaged in or refraining from protected activity nor does such inherently discriminate against strikers.

Thus I conclude that the recall of one on layoff to the job he had does not imply there was a vacancy, nor is such inherently discriminatory against strikers in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Accordingly, I will recommend that the complaint be dismissed.

In view of this, I need not consider the Respondent's additional defenses: that its conduct was not inherently destructive of employee rights; that the Union waived the nonreinstated strikers right to be recalled ahead of laid-off replacements; that somehow the strike was unprotected because the employees had changed their collective mind about what it was they wanted; that the matter should be deferred to arbitration; that the nonreinstated strikers for whom the General Counsel seeks relief have been offered and have refused substantially equivalent jobs; and that there was no showing of a casual connection between the recall procedure and the fact that five nonreinstated strikers were not offered the specific jobs.

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

July 14, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBER JOHANSEN AND BABSON

Upon a charge filed by the Union June 11, 1987,[1] the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint on July 16 against Superior Industries, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. Although properly served copies of the charge and complaint,[2] the Respondent has failed to file a timely answer.[3]

As no timely answer was filed and no extension of time to answer was requested or granted before the due date, the General Counsel on September 21, 1987, filed a Motion for Summary Judgment with attached exhibits.[4] On September 25 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted.

The Respondent filed a response on September 30, 1987.[5] On October 23, 1987, the Charging Party filed a brief in support of the Motion for Summary Judgment. Also, on October 23 the Respondent filed a second response.[6] On October 26 the General Counsel filed a motion[7] to reject the Respondent's first response. On November 20 the Respondent filed an errata/response with respect to its October 23 response.[8] On December 7 the General Counsel filed a response[9] to the Respondent's second response and errata/response. On December 9 the Charging Party filed a brief in support of the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment. On December 14 the Respondent filed a motion.[10] On December 21 the Charging Party filed a response to the Respondent's December 14 motion. On January 4, 1988, the Respondent filed a

[1] All dates refer to 1987, unless otherwise indicated.

[2] G.C. Exh. 55(B), "Affidavit of Service of Complaint and Notice of Hearing," states that the complaint was served by certified mail on July 16, 1987, on the Respondent (postal receipt No. 375,938), the Respondent's attorney (postal receipt No. 375,939), the Charging Party (postal receipt No. 375,940), and the Charging Party's attorney (postal receipt No. 375,941).

Exh. 4 of the General Counsel's "motion to reject" (infra fn. 7) shows photocopies of signed postal receipts, Nos. 375,938 and 375,939, for both the Respondent and the Respondent's attorney. Both receipts show a date of delivery of July 17, 1987.

[3] On August 24, 1987, Superior Industries sent a letter to the Regional Office in answer to the complaint. The letter stated that the Respondent was "without knowledge" with respect to pars. 1, 3, 4, and 5 of the complaint; denied pars. 2 and 6 through 14; opposed the remedy sought; and "affirmatively challenged, opposed, denied, and appealed" the Board's May 21, 1987 Decision and Certification of Representative.

[4] The Motion for Summary Judgment's certificate of service form, dated September 16, 1987, indicates that the motion was served by certified mail on the Respondent's attorney (postal receipt No. 375,821) and on the Charging Party's attorney (postal receipt No. 375,822). Service of the motion, by ordinary mail, was made on the Respondent, on the Charging Party, and on the Respondent's attorney (at a second address).

Exh. 3(B) of the General Counsel's "motion to reject," infra, shows a photocopy of the signed postal receipt (No. 375,821) for the Motion for Summary Judgment, sent to the Respondent's attorney, with a date of delivery of September 17, 1987.

[5] The Respondent's response is entitled "preliminary opposition to General Counsel's motion to transfer case to and continue proceedings before the Board [and motion to reconsider grant of same] and for summary judgment, petition to revoke notice to show cause and/or motion to postpone due date to show cause." Refer to fn. 7, infra.

[6] The Respondent's second response is entitled "Motion to Show Cause Why Summary Judgment Summary Judgment [sic] Should Not Be Granted." The response was served by ordinary mail on the Board, the Charging Party, and the Charging Party's attorney, but not on the Regional Office.

[7] The General Counsel's motion is entitled "Motion To Reject Respondent's Preliminary Opposition to General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment."

In its "preliminary opposition," the Respondent made three allegations why the Motion for Summary Judgment was defective. Allegation 1 maintained that the General Counsel failed to served the Motion for Summary Judgment (with exhibits) on the Respondent. In its motion to reject, the General Counsel states that the Motion for Summary Judgment and the exhibits were packaged together. Postal receipt No. 375,821 evidences service of the motion and its exhibits. Thus, they were served by certified mail on the Respondent's attorney. Allegation 2 maintained that the complaint was not served on the Respondent's attorney. As stated in fn. 4, supra, the complaint was served by certified mail on the Respondent's attorney and was delivered on September 17, 1987. Allegation 3 maintained that the General Counsel omitted documents from its exhibits to the Motion for Summary Judgment. The General Counsel provided 59 exhibits (most multipart). The Respondent has made a bare assertion and has failed to indicate which documents were omitted.

Accordingly, we find that the Respondent's preliminary opposition is lacking in merit and we grant the General Counsel's motion to reject.

[8] The Respondent's errata/response corrects the title of its October 23 second response. The corrected title reads: "Cause Why Summary Judgment Should Not Be Granted." This document contains 1-1/4 pages of text, a proof of service sheet (unsigned), and a corrected title page.

The errata also contains the assertion that the photocopy of the postal receipt card showing receipt of the complaint by the Respondent's attorney "appears to be falsified." The Respondent offers no evidence to support its allegation of falsification.

[9] The General Counsel's response is entitled "Motion To Strike Respondent's 'Cause Why Summary Judgment Should Not Be Granted And Corresponding Errata/Response,' or Alternately, Motion To Consider General Counsel's Within Response And Opposition Thereto."

The General Counsel moves the Board to strike the Respondent's response to the Notice to Show Cause because it was defective under Sec. 102.114 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. The Respondent failed to serve the Regional Office with its response to the Notice to Show Cause until November 16 and the Respondent's proof of service sheet, attached to the combined "cause why" and "errata/response" documents are unsigned.

The General Counsel is a party in this case and should have been timely served. However, in light of the fact that the General Counsel was ultimately served and has responded to the Respondent's allegations we find that no prejudice exists. See Sec. 102.114(a)(2), as amended. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's motion to strike.

[10] The motion was entitled "motion to set time for responses to General Counsel's motion to strike Respondent's cause why summary judgment should not be granted." On December 16 the Executive Secretary extended the filing deadline to January 4, 1988.

response.[11] On February 9, 1988, the Charging Party requested that the Board expedite the case.[12]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 14 days from the service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 14 days of service, "all of the allegations in the Complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board."

The Respondent contends that its failure to file a timely answer was excusable. The Respondent alleges that "good cause" exists for excusing the lateness of its answer. The alleged grounds are that the Respondent relied on the General Counsel's service sheet, which showed service of the complaint on the Respondent's attorney, and expected that its attorney would file an answer. According to the Respondent, its employment supervisor was on vacation during a portion of this time and on his return from vacation he allegedly was told by the Respondent's attorney's office that the office never received the complaint and notice of hearing and that the Respondent's attorney was on vacation.

In its October 23/November 20 response to the General Counsel's Notice to Show Cause, the Respondent argued that the Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted for several reasons: (1) the complaint was not served on the Respondent's attorney; (2) the Motion for Summary Judgment was not properly served on the parties; (3) good cause existed for the delayed filing of the answer; (4) the Respondent was not "specially reminded" of the requirement to file an answer to the complaint;[13] (5) the Respondent's late answer raised factual issues requiring a hearing;[14] (6) the Board's August 6 denial of the Respondent's "motions to reconsider and reopen the record" did not address "newly discovered evidence" contained within certain motions to the General Counsel.

We find that "good cause" does not exist for excusing the late filing of the answer. We find that the Respondent's submissions do not constitute good cause within the meaning of Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations.[15] Both the Respondent and the Respondent's attorney were served with the complaint by certified mail, the signed postal receipts were returned to the Regional Office, photocopies of the signed postal receipts are in the record, the Respondent has failed to offer evidence of its allegation of a falsified postal receipt, the parties, at the least, had notice of the Motion for Summary Judgment, and the Board cannot consider motions made to the General Counsel.

In the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely answer, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent, a California corporation, manufactures cast aluminum wheels and automobile accessories at its principal place of business in Van Nuys, California, where it annually sells and ships goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[11] The document is entitled "Response To Motion To Strike Respondent's 'Cause Why Summary Should Not Be Granted' And Corresponding 'Errata/Response,' Or, Alternately, Motion To Consider General Counsel's Within Response and Opposition Thereto."

[12] The Charging Party stated that it was willing to waive any question of timeliness regarding the Respondent's October 23 submission. Timeliness is a procedural question and cannot be waived by a party.

The Respondent filed a response to the Charging Party's motion on February 25, 1988; the response was rejected by the Executive Secretary on February 29, 1988.

[13] The Respondent argues that Sec. 10280.3 of the Casehandling Manual requires the General Counsel to "specially remind" a respondent when an answer is late. Contrary to the Respondent, the Casehandling Manual contains guidance, not rules. The "Purpose of Manual" section states:

> This manual has been prepared by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board pursuant to his authority under Section 3(d) of the Act. It is designed only to provide procedural and operational guidance for the Agency's staff in administering the National Labor Relations Act, and it is not intended to be a compendium of substantive or procedural law, nor a substitute for a knowledge of the law. The guides are not General Counsel or Board rulings or directives and are not a form of authority binding upon the General Counsel or upon the Board.

We note that in Sherwood Coal Co., 252 NLRB 497 (1980), a case in which summary judgment was granted in circumstances similar to this case, there is no indication the General Counsel specially reminded the respondent to file an answer to the complaint.

[14] The Respondent's late answer, which is not before us, cannot raise issues warranting a hearing.

We have considered the present case in light of the "good cause" standard articulated in Sec. 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. See NLRB v. Zeno Table Co., 610 F.2d 567 (9th Cir. 1979).

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Certification

Following the election held on August 30, 1984, the Union was certified on May 21, 1987, as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees, including leaderpersons, inspection employees, quality assurance technicians, shipping and receiving employees, warehouse employees, bobtail drivers, and tool and die makers, employed by the Employer at its facilities located at 7800 Woodley Avenue, 14617 Keswick Street, 14721 Keswick Street, and 14728 Raymer, Van Nuys, California 91406; excluding all other employees, electronics technicians, radiologists, chemists, draftsmen, tractor trailer drivers (long haul), office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Union continues to be the exclusive representative under Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. Refusal to Bargain

Since June 3, 1987, and continuing to date, and more particularly by letters dated June 3, 19, and 23 and by phone calls on June 12, 16, 17, 22, and 26, the Union has requested, and is requesting, the Respondent to bargain collectively with respect to the terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees. Since June 3 the Respondent has refused to bargain collectively with the Union.

Since June 19, 1987, the Union has requested the Respondent to furnish it with information; such information is necessary and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees. Since June 19 the Respondent has failed and refused to provide the information requested by the Union.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By refusing since June 3, 1987, to bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of employees in the appropriate unit and by refusing since June 19, 1987, to provide the Union with the requested information, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist, to bargain on request with the Union, and, if an understanding is reached, to embody the understanding in a signed agreement; and to provide the Union with the requested information.[17]

To ensure that the employees are accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of the certification as beginning the date the Respondent begins to bargain in good faith with the Union. Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817 (1964); Burnett Construction Co., 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Superior Industries International, Inc., Van Nuys, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW Amalgamated Local No. 645 as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(b) Refusing to provide the Union with requested information that is necessary and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit concerning terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

The Charging Party also requested the Board to reconsider its decision in Ex-Cell-O Corp., 185 NLRB 107 (1970). The Charging Party argues that the Respondent's defenses are frivolous.

The Charging Party's request for extraordinary remedies is denied. (b) Provide the Union with requested information that is necessary and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(c) Post at its facilities in Van Nuys, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[18] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On December 1, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, H. B. Zachry Company, Chesapeake, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Paula S. Schaeffer, Esq., for the General Counsel.

William E. Twomey, Jr., Esq. (McGuire, Woods, Battle & Boothe; David R. Simonsen, Esq., Maris M. Wicker, Esq. and Thomas P. Murphy, Esq., on the brief), of Richmond, Virginia, for the Respondent.

Robert L. Dameron, Esq. (Blake & Uhlig, P.A.), of Kansas City, Kansas, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge. Respondent H. B. Zachry Company stipulated that about 20 August 1985, it did not hire Barry D. Edwards, a qualified boilermaker welder, who had applied for that position, "because Respondent believed it could lawfully refuse to hire a paid, full-time professional union organizer such as" Edwards. The complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et. seq.[1] Respondent denied that it violated the Act in any manner.

Respondent admits, and I find, that it is a Delaware corporation with an office and place of business in Chesapeake, Virginia, where it has been engaged in construction work and is the general contractor for constructing and repairing boilers for Virginia Electric and Power Company on its property in Chesapeake. During the year preceding 3 June 1986, Repsondent has purchased and received at its Chesapeake facility construction site products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside Virginia. I conclude, as Respondent admits, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. I also conclude, as Respondent admits, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

In an earlier unfair labor practice proceeding, H. B. Zachry Co., 261 NLRB 681 (1982), the Board found that Respondent had violated the Act in numerous respects, including the discharge of Edwards in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1), and ordered Respondent, among other things, to reinstate Edwards to his former job at the Mayo project near Roxboro, North Carolina, with full backpay. The administrative law judge wrote, at 685:

> Edwards began work at the site on March 28, 1980, as a journeyman boilermaker welder after successfully completing welding tests for heavy and light wall construction with results termed "one of the prettiest test he'd [the company official] ever seen of many he'd administered—and done expediently, faster than most." Respondent stipulated that Edwards was a competent welder, and Edwards testified that Welding Foreman Dick Johnson complimented him on his work and the pains he took with it, as well as the help Edwards extended to coworkers about 2 weeks after Edwards started on B-boiler. General Foreman Pack also complimented Edwards on his work, a week or two later telling Edwards he "showed a lot of craftsmanship." Edwards, moreover, was never reprimanded in the course of his employment by Respondent.

At the time when Respondent was obligated to reinstate Edwards, its work at the Roxboro facility had finished, and so Edwards never obtained employment there; he applied for employment at Respondent's Chesapeake job in December 1984, and January, February, and July

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We agree with the judge's finding that the appropriate remedy for the Respondent's unlawful refusal to hire employee Edwards should include an offer of employment and backpay. In so doing, we note that the Respondent in excepting to this portion of the remedy relies on the same asserted justifications for its refusal to hire Edwards which the judge rejected. We further noted that the Respondent has not established that it has a policy or past practice of not hiring employees based on such reasons.

[1] The relevant docket entries are as follows: International Brotherhood of Boilermarkers, Local 30, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forges and Helpers, AFL-CIO (Union) filed an unfair labor practice charge on 4 November 1985; and a complaint issued on 12 December 1985, which was amended on 3 June 1986 and at the hearing, which was held in Norfolk, Virginia on 30 July 1987.

1985, without success. The final refusal of Respondent to hire him occurred on 20 August 1985. Edwards' uncontradicted testimony was as follows:

> . . . I applied for work early in the morning because I knew they were hiring employees. And I addressed the personnel lady at the personnel trailer in the parking lot. And she told me that the boilermaker superintendent, [Jerrell] Barnes, would be coming out in a little while to interview applicants and he was needing tube welders, and if I was interested in going to work I should talk to him.
> A few minutes later, approximately within an hour [Jerrell] Barnes came out, told me he was needing tube welders, he was having a hard time obtaining people that could pass a welding test, wanted to know if I'd ever been certified on tubes before, and I told him yes. I showed him some certification papers that I had from various companies. And he told me that he needed to take my name and Social Security Number and he'd get me cleared through security and he would check with the welding technician to see that the test booth was open and when it came open he would give me a welding test. He told me to hang around, it would be about 45 minutes to an hour.
> He came back out about an hour later and he had another gentlemen with him by the name of Clarence Wade, who was the general foreman on the boilermaker craft, and he asked me had I ever worker for Zachry, and I told him yes. And he told me, he says, "When?"
> I said 1980 or '81, the best of my memory.
> And he said, "Well, I put your name in to the gate and Vepco, Virginia Power Company, okayed it through their security, but when we put it into the computer it came up with a star beside it, says not eligible for rehire," indicating I'd had some trouble in Roxboro in 1980.
> He asked me about this incidence [sic] and I told him at that time I had been discharged unlawfully, it went to an NLRB hearing, the Administrative Law Judge ruled on it in my behalf, it had been appealed and the appeal had been upheld, and I had been ordered to be reinstated to the job and I was there willing to go to work and wanting a job.
> He told me as long as my name was on that list not for rehire that he didn't have any authority to hire me and the only one that could take my name off that list was George Fewox.
> Q. And who is George Fewox.?
> A. He was the project manager at the Mayo job site back in 1980, but my understanding now he's a district representative for Zachry.
> . . . .
> Q. So were you ever hired at H. B. Zachry?
> A. No, ma'am, I was never hired.
> Have you continued to apply for jobs at H. B. Zachry?
> A. Yes, ma'am.

Edwards' application for employment graphically corroborates his testimony. Across its front is a thick dark slash, and in equally dark letters "DO NOT HIRE," followed by "ANYTIME per Jerrell Barnes."

Section 2(3) of the Act makes no distinction between employees, employees who are opposed to labor unions, employees who favor labor unions, and employees who are full-time paid union organizers. The Act merely states: "The term 'employee' shall include any employee, and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer, unless the Act explicitly states otherwise. The Board views the word "employee" as a member of the working class generally. Giant Food Markets, 241 NLRB 727, 728 fn. 3 (1979); Little Rock Crate & Basket Co., 227 NLRB 1406 (1977); Oak Apparel, 218 NLRB 701 (1975). A job applicant is entitled to the protections of the Act, and the decision to hire that applicant must be made without consideration of the applicant's concerted and protected union activities. Copes-Vulcan, Inc., 237 NLRB 1253, 1257 (1978), enfd. in relevant part 611 F.2d 440 (3d Cir. 1979).

This principle has been specifically applied to full-time paid union organizers who, although their ulterior purpose may be to organize the unorganized, are merely applying for a job, just like any other employees, are to be judged on their abilities as employees, and are forbidden by the Act to be judged on their union sympathies. Pilliod of Mississippi, Inc., 275 NLRB 799, 811 (1985); Palby Lingerie, 252 NLRB 176, 182 (1980); Margaret Anzalone, Inc., 242 NLRB 879, 888 (1979); Henlopen Mfg. Co., 235 NLRB 183 fn. 1 (1978), enfd. 599 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1979); Anthony Forest Products Co., 231 NLRB 976 (1977); Oak Apparel, supra.[2] Respondent raises no question about Edwards' physical capabilities to perform safely to job of boilermaker welder; and Edwards met Respondent's other criteria for employment, to wit, experience and past employment by Respondent. The only reason for not hiring him was because of Edwards' status with the Union. Since 1 January 1987, Edwards was a representative of the International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, but before, since 1983, he was a full-time paid organizer for Local 30. Respondent knew it. Eugene Hammond, Respondent's vice president, industrial relations, admitted knowing that Edwards was a union organizer because that is what he was doing at Roxboro and "he's been ineligible for rehire by H. B. Zachry since that time." It is, therefore, clear that counsel for the General Counsel has, at the very minimum, established a prima facie case that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

I note the establishment of a prima facie case because under the Board's test enunciated in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982); approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), where a dual motive, and a prima facie violation of the Act has been established, the burden then shifts to Respondent "to demonstrate that the same action would have been taken even in the absence of the protected conduct." Wright Line, supra, 251 NLRB at 1089. Here, however, the only evidence of what caused Respondent not to hire Edwards is contained in his testimony, and that is that Barnes put Edwards' name "into the computer [and] it came up with a star beside it, says not eligible for rehire." Barnes, the person who refused to hire Edwards, did not testify, and the record is barren of any explanation of why Respondent, which needed qualified boilermakers and which conceded that Edwards was a qualified boilermaker, should have blacklisted Edwards, other than (1) Respondent's admission of its belief that "it could lawfully refuse to hire a paid, full-time, professional Union organizer"; (2) its maintenance of a list of the alleged discriminatees involved in the unfair labor practice proceeding, which culminated in the Board's decision at 261 NLRB 681, which list included Edwards separately as both an employee and organizer and was accompanied by instructions that the individuals on that list were not to be rehired;[3] and (3) the fact that Edwards had previously testified in that Board proceeding.

[2] Respondent's reliance on the dissent of Member Kennedy in Oak Apparel has no merit. Obviously, his views were rejected, and they have never been adopted by the Board. Similarly, NLRB v. Elias Bros. Big Boy, 327 F.2d 421, 427 (6th Cir. 1964), to the extent that it finds paid union organizers are not employees, does not represent Board law. The Second Circuit in Henlopen Mfg. Co., supra, 599 F.2d at 30, agreed with the Board.

Accordingly, on the basis of what happened on 20 August 1985, and the information that was available to Barnes, this is not a dual-motivation case in the classic sense, one motive illegal, and the other legitimate. If there are two motives, they are both illegal, one under Section 8(a)(3), because Edwards engaged in union activities, and the other under Section 8(a)(4), because Edwards was involved in the prior Board proceeding and was still being punished for his testimony, participation, and success in that proceeding. I find, in these circumstances, that Respondent violated the Act in both respects, as alleged in the complaint.

Furthermore, assuming that there is actually a dual motivation[4] and that I ought to consider Respondent's claims of other legal justifications for its action, I find them without merit because I found Hammond, Respondent's sole witness, unreliable. Respondent's primary contention in its brief is that it will not hire anyone who had other full-time employment. Actually, what Hammond testified to was that Respondent's policy was to "prohibit persons who [are] employed full-time elsewhere during the daytime to be employed by" Respondent. Because Respondent's normal workdays are from Monday to Friday, "during the daytime," I find it difficult to imagine how and when the alleged policy would be applied because an employee could not work full-time for two employers during the same working hours. So really, what Hammond testified to was nonsensical and was simply a method of attempting to avoid Respondent's stipulation of the reasons it did not hire Edwards, quoted at page 1, above.[5] The entire record persuades me that "full-time" was not the salient part of the stipulation; rather, it was because Edwards was a union organizer (who also happened to be on the union's payroll as a full-time employee), who would, in Hammond's words, be disruptive on the jobsite, that Respondent did not hire him. Respondent produced no document that supported Hammond's alleged policy against hiring persons employed full time by others, and Respondent's own hiring policies omit this policy. In addition, Hammond's testimony supporting the existence of this policy (pp. 142-143 of the official transcript) was vague, hesistant, and, I find, unbelievable. Furthermore, other than the repetition of the adjective "disruptive"—which is synonymous for union activity—Hammond's rationale makes no sense because he conceded that one of Respondent's employees could work a second job on weekends because that did not interfere with his work for Respondent. Edwards' earlier employment by Respondent indicates that his Section 7 activities did not interfere with his work for Respondent, and there is no reason to anticipate that it would have interfered at the Chesapeake project.

Obviously, I am not at all persuaded with Respondent's newly found defense that it will not hire persons who are employed full time elsewhere. So many times, and in so many different ways, did Hammond repeat Respondent's motivation that it would not hire a paid union organizer. Indeed, he admitted that Respondent had an unwritten policy against hiring union organizers as early as 1980; and if Respondent had known then that Edwards was a paid union organizer and union president, Respondent would not have hired him in 1980. When Hammond referred to those whom Respondent would not hire, he did not refer to their "full-time" status; he talked about "professional union organizer" or "paid professional union organizer." His fears were directed not to the fact that such employees would report to work exhausted, or would not report at all, but what they would do when they were supposed to be working for Respondent, to wit, "we would find it most disruptive to co-employees working on the site"; and "[w]e did not need [Edwards] on the job since we know that he's a paid employee of the Boilermakers and would cause nothing but problems upon our job site." Edwards, as a paid union organizer, Hammond explained, would be more disruptive on the jobsite than an unpaid union organizer because he would leave his work area, would talk to people during working hours, and would slow down employees' work performance. These reasons having nothing to do with whether Edwards is employed full time or part time or no time elsewhere. They have only to do with Edwards' protected Section 7 rights to organize employees. Those rights, as noted above, are protected for all employees; and Respondent may not simply ignore them because it believes that the Act is not in Respondent's best interest.

[3] Two other employees whom the Board had ordered reinstated in its prior decision, Frank and Garland Keatts, applied for boilermaker welder position about 19 August 1985 (the day before Edwards applied) at Respondent's Chesapeake jobsite and successfully completed preemployment welding tests on that date, but Respondent did not hire them, although it hired other applicants. The names of both employees were on the same list referred to above, and the parties stipulated that "Respondent's failure to erase that list directly resulted in Respondent's refusal to hire Frank and Garland Keatts." Respondent's refusal to hire them and Edwards were incorporated in the same unfair labor practice charge filed 4 November 1985, and the refusal to hire them was was originally alleged as a unfair labor practice in the complaint herein. However, by letter dated 5 December 1985, Respondent offered employment to both Keatts, who started working for Respondent in Chesapeake about 11 December 1985. All allegations of the complaint, except those that referred to Edwards, were withdrawn at the opening of the hearing.

[4] Hammond testified that the reason Respondent would not hire Edwards "today" (the day of the hearing) is that Edwards is a paid union organizer "today." If he were not, Respondent "might possibly" hire him. Although Hammond's statement was less than completely definite, nonetheless nothing was said about all the other alleged reasons, now urged by Respondent, why Edwards should not have been hired. Only his position as a paid union organizer was the asserted obstacle to his employment. In addition, in answer to my hypothetical question about an applicant for employment, who was a most capable employee, but a rabid union adherent, not a paid organizer, who openly admitted a desire to organize Respondent's employees, Hammond could not answer whether Respondent would hire him because: "When a person comes on board and makes those kind of statements, it makes one think." It appears that Respondent had such union animus that no union adherent, no less organizer, was eligible for employment.

[5] I recognize that Respondent, by entering into the stipulation, did not waive any other arguments that it sought to litigate. However, it would have been simple enough for Respondent to have stipulated that it refused to hire Edwards only because it believed that he had a full-time job elsewhere, omitting any emphasis on the fact that the full-time job was with the Union. It did not, and Hammond's emphasis on Edwards' full-time employment as a union organizer was the only issue that motivated Respondent not to hire him.

The gist of Respondent's argument is that Edwards owes Respondent a duty or loyalty, which he cannot have if he is a union organizer. That is simply unfounded, in fact and in law. Respondent's cited decisions hold only that merely because an employee favors union organization, an employee is not insulated from discipline for not doing his or her job. They do not hold that an employer is free to hire only those employees who are opposed to union organization or to discipline employees solely because of their Section 7 activities.

Respondent's additional defenses require little comment. First, Respondent contends that it has a no-solicitation rule and that Edwards was engaging in "a ruse to enter [Respondent's] private property with the sole purpose of attempting to defeat its property rights," because it was entitled to exclude nonemployee union organizers from its private property, citing NLRB v. Babcock Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1956). The simple answer is that Edwards was not attempting as a nonemployee to gain access to Respondent's premises. He was attempting to obtain employment; and, he had been hired, he would have the same Section 7 rights as any other employee. Respondent's argument would permit it and all other employers to utilize no-solicitation rules to discriminate in their hiring policies against any union sympathizer in order to keep that sympathizer off their property. I know of no support for this argument, which flies in the face of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

Second, Respondent contends that it refused to hire Edwards to avoid the creation of an inference that it supported the Union and to avoid financial assistance to the Union, in violation of Section 8(a)(2) of the Act. The first point may have been more persuasive urged had Respondent not already been found in violation of the Act. It is rather brazen for it to so urge when the Board has previously found that, among other things, it had engaged in surveillance and created the impression of surveillance of its employees' union activities, it has threatened employees with discharge and discharged them for engaging in union activities, it had refused to employ a prospective employee because he was related to employees who supported the Union, and it had more strictly enforced its work rules because the employees engaged in union activities. Respondent's second point, that had it hired Edwards, it would be paying him for his union organizing duties, is simply not so. It would be paying Edwards solely for his work performed for Respondent. Finally, there is absolutely no support in the record that these reasons motivated Respondent to refuse to hire Edwards. Rather, the record amply supports my finding that Respondent did not hire Edwards not because it wanted to avoid favoring the Union but because it sought to ensure that it would do nothing to help any union organizational attempt.[6]

Third, Respondent contends that it would not have hired Edwards because he did not report his present and prior employment by the Union on his application form and because Respondent had in its files a 1983 psychological evaluation, prepared for another employer, which recommended against hiring Edwards on a nuclear power plant project because of his alleged unstable mental condition. Like so much else in this proceeding, I find no evidence that these contentions played any role in Respondent's decision. Hammond testified that about a week after Edwards was refused employment, he spoke to Fewox and told him that he did not have to hire paid union organizers. He never asked him what Edwards had put on his application; and Hammond, in relating the conversation, seems never to have discussed the application. Rather, the sole reason for affirming Barnes' decision (if Hammond ever had the conversation) was that Edwards, as a union organizer, "would cause nothing but problems upon our jobsite." Equally important, the Chesapeake job was not a nuclear power project and, if the evaluation had any substance, it applied solely to a nuclear site and nothing more. Furthermore, Hammond seems to have thought that the evaluation was insubstantial because he buried it in Respondent's Roxboro file and not in Edwards' personnel file. He had not looked at it from 1983 until the day before the hearing in this proceeding when he also saw for the first time Edwards' application for employment.

Fourth, as to that application, Respondent contends, in conformity with the rejected dissent in Oak Apparel, supra, 218 NLRB at 701: "It is logical to infer . . . that the duration of Edwards' employment with each nonunion employer will be determined by the course of the organizational process, rather than by the duration of the contract's project." But, because Hammond had not seen Edwards' job application until immediately before the hearing, I am unpersuaded that he relied on Edwards' past work record, which shows, in any event, that Edwards left most of his jobs because they had been completed, thus belying any inference to the contrary.

[6] NLRB v. Vernitron Electrical Components, 548 F.2d 24 (1st Cir. 1977), cited by Respondent, is inapposite. There, the employer assisted the union by shepherding employees by department to meeting with the union organizers, by paying the employees their wages during the meetings, by monitoring the employees' execution of authorization cards, and by speedily recognizing the union in order to ensure that recognition would continue, in the face of erosion after the employer-assisted organizing ceased. The "confluence" of these actions, which supported the Board's findings of violations of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (2), is clearly different from a single acceptance of an employment application from one known union organizer.

In sum, I find no motive other than the illegal motives found above that caused Respondent to refuse to hire Edwards and conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.[7] These unfair labor practices, occurring in connection with Respondent's operations described above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section (1), (3), and (4) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act. Respondent has finished its work at Chesapeake location and so I cannot order employment of Edwards on that project. However, Respondent gives its employees the opportunity, when one project is finished, to obtain employment at another of its projects, provided that jobs are available. Furthermore, the Board has recently directed that, as standard relief in construction industry cases, discriminatees should be ordered to be reinstated and, if an issue should arise with respect to that relief, the issue should be resolved in compliance proceedings. Dean General Contractors, 285 NLRB 573 (1987). Accordingly, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer Edwards full and immediate employment in the position of boilermaker welder or a substantially equivalent position and to make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by reason of Respondent's failure to hire him on 20 August 1985, by paying him a sum of money equal to that which he normally would have earned absent Respondent's unfair labor practices, less earnings during such period,[8] to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest in accordance with New Horizons of the Retarded.[9] Because the Chesapeake job has been completed, I shall order Respondent to mail the usual notice to the employees who were employed by Respondent at the jobsite at any time. In addition, because Respondent appears to have learned little from its earlier experiences before the Board and continues to violate the Act, I shall recommend a broad order, pursuant to Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

The General Counsel also requests a visitatorial clause, authorizing the Board to engage in discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure so that it will be able to monitor compliance with the Order recommended herein, if adopted by the Board and enforced by a court of appeals. The Board heard oral argument on this issue in September 1986 but has not yet ruled. In the meantime, it has uniformly denied the relief in individual cases, without explanation; and I will not recommend that the visitatorial clause be included in the relief, until the Board instructs otherwise.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

Respondent, H. B. Zachry Company, Chesapeake, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to hire employees because of their membership in or activity on behalf of International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Local 30, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, Blacksmiths, Forgers and Helpers, AFL–CIO or any other labor organization.

(b) Refusing to hire employees because they have filed charges or given testimony under the National Labor Relations Act.

(c) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Barry Edwards full and immediate employment in the position, or its substantial equivalent, in which he would have been employed on 20 August 1985, without prejudice to any seniority or other rights or privileges he would have acquired and make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against him, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Mail to all employees employed on 20 August 1985 by Respondent at its Chesapeake, Virginia jobsite copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix,"[11] copies of which will be provided by the Regional Director for Region 5.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[7] Even if I found the existence of a different motive, I am persuaded that such a motive would be a mere pretext seized on by Respondent to avoid hiring Edwards.

[8] Concededly, the amount involved may be minimal because Edwards probably continued to receive pay from the Union or the International throughout the period. However, Edwards would have been entitled to retain any amount paid by a construction firm as overtime or a bonus.

[9] 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Interest will be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621.

[10] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On November 23, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel also filed exceptions and a supporting brief, to which the Respondent filed a reply.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[2] findings,[3] and conclusions[4] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Shaw's Supermarket, Inc., Portland, Maine, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election conducted on January 20, 1987, in Case 1-RC-18882 is set aside and this case is severed and remanded to the Regional Director for Region 1 for the purpose of scheduling and conducting a second election at such time as he deems the circumstances permit a free choice on the issue of representation.

[1] On November 2, 1987, the Teamsters International Union was readmitted to the AFL-CIO. Accordingly, the caption has been amended to reflect that change.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] We agree with the judge's finding that Vice President of Distribution Wyatt's statement at the January 15, 1987 employee meetings that "employees would be guaranteed minimum wages and workmen's comp[ensation] and that's where our collective-bargaining process would begin," amounted to an unlawful threat of regressive bargaining with a resulting loss of benefits. In so doing, we conclude that Wyatt's several references to collective bargaining as a "give-and-take" process, his example of how a union in another warehouse bargained away a profit-sharing plan in exchange for a pension plan, and his statement that the Respondent would start with minimum wages and workmen's compensation and "build from that point," do not constitute assurances that the Respondent would not require the Union to give up existing benefits or dispel the impression that what employees ultimately receive through collective bargaining is dependent on what the Union can induce the Respondent to restore. Thus, in contrast to the Employer's statement in La-Z-Boy, 281 NLRB 338, 340 (1986), that it was "ridiculous" to think the company would pay minimum wages regardless of the outcome of negotiations, Wyatt's statements do not give employees the unambiguous message that they will not initially be stripped of all existing benefits through collective bargaining. Indeed, Wyatt's statement that the employees would be "guaranteed" minimum wages and workmen's compensation and that the parties would have to "build" from that point conveys the opposite message, i.e., that collective bargaining begins with the loss of existing benefits and proceeds with a struggle by the Union to get those benefits restored.

[4] We correct two misstatements made by the judge. Objections and an unfair labor practice charge had been filed concerning an election conducted October 23, 1982, but were later withdrawn. No reliance was placed on these events. Further, the evidence shows the second letter from the Respondent about the election that mentioned the Respondent's expansion plans was sent to the employees at some point before the election, but not that it was sent 1 week before the election as the judge stated. The judge's error does not affect the decision inasmuch as the evidence shows that in any event the employees had access to the content of both letters before the election.

Finally, in the absence of exceptions we adopt pro forma the judge's recommendation that Objection 3, parts 2, 4, 5, and 6, be overruled.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL O. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Portland, Maine, on 30 June 1987 based on an unfair labor practice charge filed on 23 February 1987 by Teamsters Union Local 340, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (the Union or Local 340), and a complaint issued by the Acting Regional Director for Region 1 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) on 9 April 1987. The complaint alleges that Shaw's Supermarkets, Inc. (Respondent or the Company), violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by threatening employees with various reprisals in the event that they selected a collective-bargaining representative. Respondent's timely filed answer denies the commission of any unfair labor practices. The allegations of the complaint were consolidated for hearing with the Union's objections to conduct affecting the results of an election in Case 1-RC-18882, which had been conducted on 20 January 1987, as set forth in a Report on Objections and Challenges, which issued on 4 April 1987.[1]

[1] By stipulation, the challenges were withdrawn and a revised tally of ballots issued. The revised tally showed that there were 46 ballots cast for representation by the Union, 1 ballot cast for the Independent Foodhandlers and Warehouse Employees, an intervenor, and 71 ballots, a majority of the valid votes cast, for neither Union.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and submit briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were submitted by the General Counsel and the Respondent.

Based on the entire record, including my observations of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

Findings of Fact

I. THE RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS AND THE UNION'S LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS— PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The Respondent is a corporation engaged in the retail sale and distribution of groceries, frozen food, and related items with a warehouse facility in Wells, Maine. Jurisdiction is not in issue. The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that Respondent is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that Teamsters Union Local 340, a/w International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Respondent operates a chain of 48 retail grocery stores in Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, with warehouse facilities in East Bridgewater, Massachusetts (where its corporate headquarters are located), and Wells, Maine. The Wells warehouse, the only one involved in these proceedings, was opened in about 1985, replacing a warehouse in Portland, Maine. It consists of approximately 250,000 square feet of space, predominantly devoted to frozen foods. Respondent has approximately 2000 employees, about 130 of whom work in the Wells unit. Of these, about 90 are full-time employees; the remainder work part time. The Wells warehouse operates on a three-shift basis with the hours staggered between the frozen food and dry grocery sides. The warehouse manager is Stephen Kumka; Charles Wyatt is the vice president of distribution. Respondent admits the supervising status of Wyatt and Kumka. Wyatt is based in East Bridgewater and visits the Wells warehouse about once a week.

The Wells employees are not currently represented by any labor organization. The election involved here was the third conducted among the employees since this warehouse, and its predecessor in Portland, opened in 1982. No unfair labor practice charges or objections were filed concerning the prior campaigns or elections, both of which resulted in votes against union representation. The employees at East Bridgewater have been represented for about 35 years by the Independent Food Handlers and Warehouse Employees Union, (IFWE). IFWE intervened in Local 340's most recent petition.

B. The 23 December 1986 Letter—Alleged Threat to Cancel Expansion Plans

The Respondent has plans to expand the Wells warehouse by about 230,000 square feet and its employees have been aware of those plans since at least late summer or early fall of 1986. By December 1986, some preliminary planning had been done with an engineering group and a consulting firm.

Sometime around early December 1986, Local 340 filed a representation petition; IFWE intervened. On 23 December 1986, Respondent posted a letter addressed to all of its Wells employees pointing out that, "for the third time in four years, [we are] going to be subjected to another organization drive by both Teamsters Local 340 and . . . IFWE." It went on to state:

> We want to get this election behind us as soon as is reasonably possible. As you are aware, we have plans for expansion here at Wells. In part, those plans are based upon our confidence in our employees here at Wells; we are similarly confident that our employees will reject the sales pitch of both these Unions and that we can then turn our mutual efforts to make this the best of its kind of operation from the point of view of both our employees and the company.

The letter concluded with information about when the election would be held.

In a second letter, undated but identified by Wyatt as having been sent to the employees about a week before the election, Wyatt stated:

> In the relatively short time we have been here at Wells, we've accomplished a lot together. The Company is growing and we all hope to grow along with it. We are firmly committed to expansion here at Wells and working together we are going to be able to provide more jobs and more promotional opportunity. We do not want to be distracted from that goal by endless negotiations and possible strikes, etc.

C. Wyatt-Swanson Conversation

In early January, day-shift employee Dean Swanson raised some questions concerning the upcoming election that Kumka could not answer. Kumka referred them to Wyatt and, when Wyatt came to the warehouse around 9 January 1987,[2] he spoke with Swanson, an employee he had known for 6 years. The conversation took place in the aisle where Wyatt met Swanson. They spoke for about 2 hours, covering such topics as overtime, insurance benefits, and the Company's allotment for work shoes. In the course of discussing collective bargaining, Wyatt told Swanson that Respondent's employees enjoyed the best benefits in the industry for that area. He suggested that the wages and benefits were so good that the employees would not be able to get anything better through collective bargaining. According to Swanson, when Swanson suggested that the two prior union campaigns had a lot to do with the present level of benefits, Wyatt got upset and stated that he could guarantee that the employees would get no greater benefits through union representation because the Union would have to bargain with him and he was not willing to give any better benefits than they had at that time.

[2] All subsequent dates are 1987 unless otherwise specified.

Wyatt denied telling Swanson that he would guarantee that a union would get them no greater benefits; he claimed (and Swanson confirmed) that he asked Swanson whether Swanson really believed that he could do better by turning his affairs over to a "third party." Kumka, who had been present during parts of the conversation, was not present during this portion.

In his pretrial affidavit, Swanson made no mention of having upset Wyatt with the contention that Respondent had granted its present level of benefits because of the earlier union campaigns. This, however, was a significant aspect of Swanson's testimony before me. It would tend to explain why an otherwise careful campaigner (as I find Wyatt to be) might threaten to be adamant in bargaining to the point of having a closed mind. Noting that omission, the possibility that Swanson interpolated such a threat from Wyatt's question, and my impressions as to the credibility and recollective abilities of the witnesses, I find that the General Counsel has not sustained her burden of proving that Wyatt made the threat Swanson attributed to him. Accordingly, I shall recommend that the allegation of paragraph 7(c) of the complaint be dismissed.

D. The Meetings

On January 15, Wyatt held meetings with the employees of each shift, as he had done during each of the prior campaigns. Respondent does not dispute that the purpose of these meetings was to persuade the employees to vote against union representation. Each of the meetings was "on-the-clock" and the employees were instructed to attend by their supervisors.

The meeting with the first-shift employees took place between 1 and 3 p.m. with about 35 employees, Wyatt, Kumka, and about 4 other supervisors present. Wyatt began this meeting, as he began each of them, by introducing himself, explaining that he had come to answer their questions and address their concerns about the election, which was scheduled for the following Tuesday, and stating that he hoped that they had or would decide to vote for neither Union in the election.

Wyatt then took questions from the employees. An employee asked what collective bargaining was or what it meant to the employees at Wells. According to Wyatt, he told them that collective bargaining was a system of give and take, that demands would be put on the table by a "third party,"[3] and it would be up to the employer to negotiate back and forth concerning the demands and work restrictions that were being discussed. As he testified:

> I told the group, as I told all groups, that if they were to turn their affairs over to a third party that the employees would be guaranteed minimum wages and workmen's comp[ensation] and that's where our collective-bargaining process would be.[4]

At the time he made this statement, Respondent was paying up to $11.70 per hour plus differentials to the full-time employees and about $5 per hour to the part-timers.

Several questions were asked about profit sharing, particularly whether the profit sharing that they presently enjoyed would be in jeopardy as a result of collective bargaining. Wyatt explained that profit sharing could be a negotiable item and described how IFWE had negotiated away profit sharing in favor of a pension plan at East Bridgewater, funding that plan from accumulated profit-sharing funds. He denied threatening the employees with the loss of profit sharing.[5]

Someone questioned whether the Teamsters could guarantee job security; Wyatt answered that neither the Teamsters nor any other union could guarantee job security. He pointed out several Maine firms with Teamsters contracts that had gone out of business, stating, however, that he was not claiming that they had done so because of the Union. He said that it had happened as a possible result of deregulation or the economy; he only cited them as examples to show that union representation did not prevent plant closings.

In response to a question about Respondent's expansion plans, Wyatt stated that those plans were proceeding along, that he expected some sitework to be done in early spring and that the expansion would be completed, or at least enclosed, by late fall and operational by the spring of 1988.[6]

[3] Wyatt repeatedly referred to selection of a union as bringing in a "third party," a disparaging and less than fully accurate description of the role of a collective-bargaining representative. Wyatt, having served on the IFWE's negotiating committee when he was a unit employee in East Bridgewater, knew that unions act in a representative capacity and are no more "third parties" than employer's counsel or consultants.

[4] Although some employees described his statement with slightly different terms, I am satisfied that this is essentially what he said.

[5] Swanson claimed that he asked Wyatt the foregoing questions; Wyatt named other employees as having done so. As Swanson recalled it, he asked Wyatt if Wyatt meant that "if the employees . . . went into a union that the employees could lose their profit sharing and all the other employees in the program would keep it, and all of our money would be put into the account?" Wyatt allegedly replied, "Yes, we wouldn't, but we could." Assuming, arguendo, that such a statement would constitute a threat of loss of the profit-sharing plan, thus necessitating a resolution of credibility, I find that I cannot credit Swanson. Swanson acknowledged that he was seated in the back of the room, between two noisy vending machines, and could not hear everything that was being said. Moreover, the General Counsel offered no corroboration of Swanson's testimony from among the 35 employees who were present and Kumka credibly corroborated Wyatt. Similarly, I cannot credit Swanson's assertion that, in response to a further question about the effects of voting a union in, Wyatt stated, "[I]f a union came in we could just close the place up." Such a patent threat is totally out of character with Wyatt's carefully phrased answers and no employee corroborated Swanson or contended that Wyatt made any such remarks in the three other meetings held that day.

[6] As of the hearing date, construction had not begun. According to Wyatt, Respondent had not received the necessary approvals from the Department of Environmental Protection and was awaiting its permits.

The meeting continued with some discussion of the insurance benefits enjoyed at Wells as compared to East Bridgewater and Wyatt's role in IFWE when he had been a unit employee. He was asked how he could now urge employees to reject unionization when he had once been a union officer. He replied that Respondent paid the best wages and benefits of, or at least paid wage and benefits comparable to, anyone in the industry and, because of that, he believed that they had earned the right to maintain a union-free environment and not be subjected to such work restrictions as they had at East Bridgewater. He told the employees that the first contract would be the hardest to negotiate and concluded the meeting by stating his hope that they would make the right decision.

According to Wyatt and Kumka, the meeting with the frozen food department employees of the second shift was essentially a repetition of the first-shift meeting described above. Rather than take as many questions, Wyatt told the employees what had been asked at the first meeting and repeated his answers. According to employee Kenneth Sylvester, however, Wyatt answered a question from Thea Jongerden about the effect of collective bargaining on their profit sharing by stating that "it could be lost, a good possibility that it would be lost." Sylvester recalled no discussion about negotiations at East Bridgewater with IFWE affecting the profit-sharing plan there and testified, contrary to his affidavit, that he recalled no statements about profit sharing being on the table or subject to collective bargaining. He also recalled Wyatt stating that there was no movement on the expansion program because of the upcoming election, that the Teamsters were not partial to part-timers, who could lose their jobs, and that a layoff was not likely because business was picking up "but there could possibly be one." He also recalled a part-time employee, Ralph DuChamb, asking about work standards, called reasonable expectations or REs. Kumka allegedly answered that REs were a nonnegotiable item in the contract. He recalled no discussion of management's right to measure productivity.

Wyatt and Kumka denied making the statements attributed to them by Sylvester and, as noted above, assert that Wyatt only repeated the remarks he made in the first meeting. Kumka could recall no discussion of REs in any meeting other than the last.

No testimony was offered concerning Wyatt's meeting with the dry grocery employees of the second shift.

Wyatt met with all the third-shift employees about 11 p.m. He and Kumka testified that it followed essentially the same pattern as the second-shift frozen food department meeting. In this meeting, however, a question was raised about the work standards; Kumka answered, telling employees that the REs were negotiable but that he believed that management had a right to have a performance measurement system in place in order to fairly measure the performance of its employees. He credibly denied ever telling employees that the work standards were not negotiable. An employee asked whether part-time employees would lose their jobs if either the Teamsters or IFWE got in. In reply, Wyatt told the employees of his experience with one of Respondent's subcontractors whose employees were represented by the Teamsters. Under that contract, there were no part-timers; employees not called in to work were treated as if they were casuals, on layoff when not working.[7]

Analysis and Conclusions

As set forth above, I have found insufficient credible evidence to support the General Counsel's contentions that Wyatt or Kumka threatened employees with plant closure (complaint pars. 7(a)(i), loss of profit sharing par. 7(a)(iii); the taking of bad-faith bargaining positions pars. 7(a)(v), (vii), and 7(c); or layoffs of either full or part-time employees pars. 7(a)(vi) and (viii)). Accordingly, I shall recommend that these allegations be dismissed.

The General Counsel asserts that Respondent's 23 December letter, by creating a nexus between the Employer's expansion plans and the employees' rejection of the unions, constituted a subtle threat to cancel or reconsider those plans if the employees selected a collective-bargaining representative.[8] In agreement with Respondent, I cannot find the message of this letter to be coercive. The letter expresses confidence in, or satisfaction with, the employees in the Wells work force. It states that because of that confidence, the Employer is planning to expand the facility and goes on to state, "we are similarly confident that our employees will reject the sales pitches of both these unions and that we can turn our mutual efforts to make this the best of its kind of operation from the point of view of both our employees and the company."

The General Counsel argues that there would be no reason for Respondent to connect a discussion of the expansion plans with a statement about voting against unionization unless those plans were contingent on the employees' negative vote. This, I believe, is a strained interpretation of the letter, one which might be warranted in a context heavy with animus and other coercive conduct, but not in this case. A lawful interpretation, at least as plausible as that offered by the General Counsel, is that Respondent, in its effort to persuade employees that they did not need union representation, was merely endeavoring to show that they were appreciated and that the future was already bright. This becomes the more logical interpretation of the letter when it is read in conjunction with the subsequent letter, issued about a week before the election. In that letter, Respondent stated that it was "firmly committed to expansion," words hardly suggestive of threatening contingencies.[9] Further, this second letter pointed out what expansion meant to the employees, more jobs and greater promotional opportunity, emphasizing Respondent's position that the employees did not need a union.

[7] Mark Dubois, an employee who had been discharged in February (unfairly to his way of thinking), testified that Wyatt said that "there probably could not be any [profit sharing] or it could be less . . . that [the expansion] definitely would come to a halt," that the Company would just have to "wait and see" what would become of part-timers if a union got in, and that Kumka said that he would set the work standards and they would not be "privy to negotiations." Noting the demeanor of the witnesses, the contradictions between the testimony and the affidavits of Sylvester and Dubois, the contradiction of Dubois' contention concerning the halting of the expansion plans (which is contained in Respondents' second letter), asserting a firm commitment to expansion, evidence establishing a basis for bias by Dubois against Respondent arising from the circumstances of his termination, the lack of corroboration of their testimony by anyone else present at the same meetings, and the probability that both employees read more into Wyatt and Kumka's words than they really contained, I credit Wyatt and Kumka's versions of the second- and third-shift meetings.

[8] I have found the evidence that Wyatt threatened employees with delay or cessation of the expansion plans in the course of the January 15 meetings insufficiently probative or credible to sustain the General Counsel's burden of proof. Accordingly, I shall recommend dismissal of complaint par. 7(a)(iv).

Accordingly, because I find no threat to be implicit in the 23 December letter, I shall recommend dismissal of complaint paragraph 7(d).

Finally, the General Counsel asserts that Wyatt's purported explanation of the collective-bargaining process, as a system of give-and-take where the Employer would begin bargaining at minimum wage and workmen's compensation (the bare legal requirements) and that would be all that the employees would be assured of receiving, threatened the employees with regressive bargaining, and the likely loss of benefits and violated Section 8(a)(1). I agree.

Wyatt's statement, viewed in its most favorable light, is a variation on the "bargaining from scratch" statements with which the Board has been dealing for at least two decades. Of such statements, the Board has held:

> As the Board and the courts have recognized in other cases, in the course of organizational campaigns, statements are sometimes made of a kind that may or may not be coercive, depending on the context in which they are uttered [fn. omitted.] "Bargaining from scratch" is such a statement. In order to derive the true import of these remarks, it is necessary to view the context in which they are made.

Wagner Industrial Products Co., 170 NLRB 1413 (1968). See also Campbell Soup Co., 225 NLRB 222, 229 (1976), and cases cited therein. Statements that "accurately reflect the obligations and possibilities of the bargaining process . . . which do not contain any threats that Respondent will not bargain in good faith or that only regressive proposals will result" will not be found violative. Clark Equipment Co., 278 NLRB 498 (1986). Statements that "effectively threaten employees with the loss of existing benefits and leave them with the impression that what they may ultimately receive depends in large measure upon what the Union can induce the Employer to restore" are objectionable (and violative of Sec. 8(a)(1)). Plastronics, 233 NLRB 155, 156 (1977), and cases cited therein; Belcher Towing Co., 265 NLRB 1258, 1268 (1982).

Two recent cases, almost squarely on point, establish that Wyatt's admitted statements to all the employees were coercive and not merely descriptive of the collective-bargaining process. In Mississippi Chemical Corp., 280 NLRB 413, 417 (1986), a supervisor told employees "that he could not possibly see where a union would benefit employees or see how they could get anything out of it." He "added that all 'they' would do is knock employees down to the minimum wage, take all their benefits and then they would have to bargain from scratch." The Board stated:

> It is clear that Jackson's remark carried with it the express threat that the bargaining from "scratch" would start only after employees had been reduced to "minimum wage" and all their benefits taken away. In this context, Jackson's remark was coercive for it threatened the loss of existing benefits not necessarily the result of good faith bargaining.[10]

Similarly, in Fountainview Place, 281 NLRB 26, 29 (1986), the personnel director stated that if the union was voted in, bargaining "starts out fresh"—"you don't start out with what's in the handbook." As he did this, he held up and waved a copy of the employer's handbook, which set forth all the existing benefits. The Board held that the employer's statement, made in the context of emphasizing the existing benefits by waving the handbook (and in the context of other coercive conduct), conveyed the reasonable impression that the employer would require the union to give up existing employee benefits. That employer's conduct was thus found to constitute an unlawful implied threat. Although the instant case lacks the context of other coercive conduct, Wyatt's statement is similar to that of Fountainview's personnel director; he did not wave a handbook but he told employees how good their present benefits were and stated that if Respondent had to negotiate with the Union, it would begin its negotiations at the bare minimum required by law, minimum wage and workmen's compensation.

Accordingly, I find that by threatening employees that it would bargain regressively, resulting in lost benefits, if they selected a bargaining representative, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1).

The Objections

As noted, the Local 340 filed objections to the conduct of the 20 January election. Its Objection 3, subparts 1 through 6, which were identical with the allegations of the complaint, were consolidated for hearing with the complaint. I have rejected the contentions contained in Objection 3, parts 2 through 6, and recommend that they be overruled.

[9] The following sentence of that letter, "We do not want to be distracted from that goal by endless negotiations and possible strikes," does not necessarily negate Respondent's commitment to expansion or threaten cessation of the plans in the event of unionization. Arguably, it merely offers management's view that negotiations and strikes divert energies from other management functions.

[10] Compare La-Z-Boy, 281 NLRB 338 (1986), in which an employer's statement that "everything was up for negotiations and that minimum wage was the bottom line" was found not to be a coercive threat to bargain regressively inasmuch as the employer told the employees that "it was 'ridiculous' to think the company would pay minimum wage regardless of the outcome of negotiations." No such assurances were given in Mississippi Chemical and none were given here. Even assuming that the employees might, on their own, conclude that it would be ridiculous to think that the employer would reduce full-time wages of $11.70 per hour to $3.35, it would not have seemed ridiculous for them to believe that the Employer might reduce the $5 per hour wage of the part-time employees to that level.

I have found that Respondent threatened employees with a loss of wages and benefits through regressive bargaining in violation of Section 8(a)(1). Pursuant to the Board's usual policy, a new election is to be directed "whenever an unfair labor practice occurs during the critical period since '[c]onduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) is, a fortiori, conduct which interferes with the exercise of a free and untrammeled choice in an election.'" Dal-Tex Optical Co., 137 NLRB 1782, 1786 (1962), quoted with approval in Clark Equipment, supra. It cannot be contended that the conduct here was de minimus and should not result in the election being set aside. These threats, violative of Section 8(a)(1), reached all of the unit employees and were uttered only 5 days before the election. Accordingly, I recommend that the election conducted on 20 January be set aside on the basis of Local 340's Objection 3(1) and a rerun election be conducted.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The General Counsel seeks the inclusion of a visitatorial clause in the recommended Order, authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Order. The circumstances of this case do not warrant inclusion of such a clause. Fountainview Place, supra.

FURTHER CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By threatening employees that it would bargain from scratch starting from a substantially reduced level of benefits, Respondent has threatened its employees with regressive bargaining and a loss of benefits and has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights and has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. The unfair labor practice enumerated in paragraph 1, above, is an unfair labor practice affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. The Respondent's conduct described in paragraph 1, above, interfered with the employees' rights to a free and untrammeled choice in the election conducted on 20 January 1987 in Case 1-RC-18882 and warrants that that election be set aside and a rerun election conducted.

4. The Respondent has not engaged in any unfair labor practices or objectionable conduct not specifically found.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[11]

ORDER

The Respondent, Shaw's Supermarkets, Inc., Portland, Maine, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees that it would "bargain from scratch" starting from substantially reduced levels of wages and benefits if they selected a union to represent them.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its Wells, Maine warehouse facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[12] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint be dismissed in all other respects, and,

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that Case 1-RC-18882 be severed from Case 1-CA-24543 and be remanded to the Regional Director who shall conduct a rerun election at such time as he deems the circumstances permit a free choice on the issue of representation.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On June 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge William F. Jacobs issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union over its decision to subcontract work at its Tioga Surface Mine to another company. We disagree with that finding. In our view, the Respondent fully complied with its statutory duty to bargain over subcontracting.

The collective-bargaining agreement in effect at the time the Respondent subcontracted the work in question contained detailed provisions concerning the subcontracting of mining operations, referred to in the contract as "leasing, subleasing and licensing out of coal lands." The contract provides for the circumstances and conditions under which subcontracting will be permitted and, as is the case with most of the contract's substantive provisions, provides that disputes are to be settled by agreement or by use of a "Settlement of Disputes" procedure culminating, where necessary, in arbitration.

In bare outline, the contract prohibits subcontracting that is for the purpose of avoiding other provisions of the contract or that results in laying off the Employer's employees. Otherwise, subcontracting is permitted, provided that the subcontractor agrees to offer employment first to the Employer's qualified employees who are on layoff status.[2]

When the subcontracting that gave rise to the instant charge occurred, a unit employee filed a grievance that closely paraphrased the language of the first paragraph of the applicable contract provision. The grievance alleged that the Respondent "conveyed, leased, transferred or assigned its Tioga Strip [mine] . . . in an attempt to avoid the application" of the contract. The charge filed shortly thereafter by the Union alleged, inter alia, that the Respondent assigned, transferred, or conveyed "its Tioga Surface Mine to another employer in order to . . . escape its obligations pursuant to the collective bargaining agreement." The complaint that subsequently issued and is before us, however, alleges only an unlawful failure to give the Union prior notice and an opportunity to bargain about the Respondent's subcontracting the work at its Tioga Surface Mine. And it is that subcontracting issue alone that was litigated here. Our analysis of the entire course of events convinces us that when the parties reached agreement over the subject of subcontracting in their 1984 contract the Respondent fulfilled its affirmative obligation to bargain over that subject for as long as the agreement remained in effect.[3] Thus, the parties have agreed specifically on their respective rights and duties concerning subcontracting. By operation of Section 8(d), the parties' substantive agreement relieved the Respondent of the duty to bargain further over the terms on which and the manner in which subcontracting could be done. Consequently, the General Counsel's case is fully rebutted by the established fact that the Respondent bargained to agreement over this subject. The only extent to which we find it necessary to interpret the contract is to determine, as we have, that it is intended to cover the situation that developed when the Respondent chose to exercise its asserted right to subcontract.[4]

Accordingly, we dismiss the allegation that the Respondent failed and refused to bargain over subcontracting in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[5]

[1] In finding that the judge properly rejected the Respondent's confidentiality defense to the allegation of refusal to provide the Union with information it had requested, we note that the Respondent did not assert its claim of confidentiality until shortly before the hearing in this proceeding, and did nothing to test the Union's willingness to treat the information in a confidential manner. The Union's representative, on the record of this proceeding, explicitly pledged to honor the confidentiality of the information. Absent proof that the Union was unreliable in respecting confidentiality agreements, the Respondent's failure to test its willingness to treat the information confidentially weighs heavily against its defense. Pertec Computer Corp., 284 NLRB 810 (1987).

In addition to the judge's reasons for finding the Respondent's offer of alternatives to the form of information requested by the Union to be inadequate, we find that, in any event, the Respondent's delay in offering the information in any form until the eve of the trial, constituted an unlawful refusal to bargain. Interstate Food Processing Corp., 283 NLRB 303 (1987); EPE, Inc., 284 NLRB 191 (1987).

[2] Sec. 1A(h) of the contract, covering this subject, is reproduced in its entirety as "Appendix B" to this Decision and Order.

[3] We contrast this "affirmative" duty with the negative duty, described in Sec. 8(d) of the Act, not to terminate or modify the contract without meeting the conditions specified in that subsection. No violation of that negative duty is alleged in the complaint, nor was such issue litigated.

[4] The Union's representative testified at the hearing that the contract permitted subcontracting under certain circumstances but required the Employer to notify the Union. This accords with our reading of the applicable contract language.

[5] The Respondent argues that we should defer this refusal-to-bargain allegation to the grievance-arbitration procedure. However, the Respondent first raised this contention in its brief to the judge. This was not a timely assertion of the issue. See United Technologies Corp., 274 NLRB 504 (1985), and cases cited there.

APPENDIX B

Section (h) Leasing, Subleasing and Licensing Out of Coal Lands

(1) The Employers agree that they will not lease, sublease or license out any coal lands, coal producing or coal preparation facilities where the purpose thereof is to avoid the application of this Agreement or any section, paragraph or clause thereof.

Licensing out of coal mining operations on coal lands owned or held under lease or sublease by any signatory operator hereto shall not be permitted unless the licensing out does not cause or result in the layoff of employees of the Employer.

(2) For purposes of lawfully preserving and protecting job opportunities for the Employees working or laid off from a particular operation covered by this Agreement, and to assure that work opportunities are not eliminated by lease or license arrangements, the Employer agrees that it will not lease, sublease, or license out coal mining operations which at any time were in operation by that Employer and covered by this Agreement, unless the conditions set forth in the following paragraph are satisfied:

Leasing, subleasing or licensing out of coal mining operations covered by this Agreement shall be permitted where the lessee-licensee agrees that all offers of employment by such lessee-licensee shall first be made (on the basis of mine seniority) to the Employer's classified and laid-off employees at the mine who have not secured regular employment at any other operation of the Employer covered by this agreement, if such employment at the leased, subleased or licensed out operations is for jobs of the nature covered by this agreement, and if such employees are qualified for such jobs. The lessee-licensee shall not be required to make more than one such offer of employment to each such employee.

(3) Acceptance or rejection of such an offer of employment made by a lessee-licensee or any personnel action between the employee and lessee-licensee shall not affect such employee's panel rights with the Employer as established by this agreement.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM F. JACOBS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me on 15 and 16 October 1986 at Charleston, West Virginia. The charge in Case 9-CA-23181 was filed on 5 June 1986[1] by United Mine Workers of America, District 31 (the Union). The charge in Case 9-CA-23263 was filed by the Union on 26 June. The consolidated complaint issued 28 July alleging that Island Creek Coal Company (Respondent or the Company) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act by entering into a contract with another company for the mining of coal at a site that had previously been mined by employees of Respondent in a unit represented by the Union without giving prior notice to the Union or affording the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain concerning such acts or the effects; and by refusing to furnish certain information to the Union concerning the contracting out of unit work. Respondent, in its answer to the consolidated complaint, denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

All parties were represented at the hearing and were afforded full opportunity to be heard and present evidence and argument. The General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs. On the entire record, my observation of the demeanor of the witness, and after giving due consideration to the briefs, I make the following

The Respondent is a coal mining company with underground and surface mines and other facilities located in various States including West Virginia. Respondent sometimes employs its own employees to work its mines, but also subcontractors with other employers to work its mines using the subcontractors' own employees to mine the coal. One location where Respondent has mining rights is at the Tioga surface mine located near Craigsville, West Virginia.

Respondent first mined at Tioga in late 1971. At that time it employed its own employees, all of whom were represented by the Union. These employees not only mined coal but also did whatever reclamation work was necessary and repaired and maintained equipment. Respondent continued to operate the Tioga surface mine in this fashion until 1979.

During the 1970s Respondent worked the Tioga Mine full time, stripping during two shifts and loading on the third shift. Equipment used included endloaders, bulldozers, and a shovel. Employees included equipment operators, a drill crew, powdermen, mechanics, welders, electricians, and maintenance personnel. Coal mined at Tioga was sent to a preparation plant to be washed. Respondent closed down the Tioga surface mine in March 1979.

After closing down the Tioga surface mine, Respondent kept four or five unit employees at the minesite to do reclamation work. Their task was to fill in the pit, plant grass seed, and put the land back into a contour similar to that which it had been before being mine. The reclamation work was completed, for the time being, in June 1979 after which Respondent transferred the remaining employees to one of its other facilities.

In April 1984 Respondent brought 10 or 11 bargaining unit employees back to the Tioga site to do additional reclamation work. They removed topsoil, mined some coal, then covered the pit and seeded. The removal of coal during this period was merely incidental to the reclamation work and not a standard coal mining operation.

In 1985 Respondent obtained a new permit to mine coal in a 170-acre area at Tioga immediately adjacent to the area where its bargaining unit employees had mined during the 1970s. The permit was obtained because Respondent had received a small order for 30,000 to 40,000 tons of coal and because the Department of Natural Resources had brought to Respondent's attention the fact that there was a necessity for further reclamation, at the old Tioga mining site. With these factors in mind, it was Respondent's plan to mine coal on the newly acquired 170-acre site and use the overburden from the site to reclaim the adjacent, previously mined Tioga surface site thus cutting the cost of reclamation by partially paying for it through the mining and selling of coal from the new site.

[1] All subsequent dates are 1986 unless otherwise noted.

[2] The complaint alleges and the answer admits that the Board has jurisdiction and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

To put its plan into operation Respondent brought back to Tioga 10 or 11 bargaining unit employees to mine coal and to reclaim land. Respondent pursued its course of reclaiming and mining for about 6 or 7 weeks but then determined that it was not economically feasible to continue mining. When it lost the coal order on which it was relying to help reduce the cost of reclamation, it shut down the mine and laid off or transferred the bargaining unit employees to other locations.

In late 1985 Respondent began to give considerations to awarding a contract to an outside company to mine coal at the Tioga site on the 170 acres that it had itself been mining in 1985. This consideration was based on the fact that certain of Respondent's officials became aware of the availability of a short-term spot market contract for coal at a production level of 700 to 800 tons per day, a level far smaller than Respondent ordinarily produced.[3] By February 1986 it was determined that the coal at Tioga could serve the requirements of the spot market contract and several coal companies were contacted for the purpose of contracting out the coal mining operation to one of them. Shortly thereafter, an official of Magnum Mining Company, Russell Coleman, visited the site, inspected the grounds and available equipment, and advised Respondent that it would be willing to undertake the project. Roy Dotson, Respondent's manager of contract coal, northern division, testified that he had considered several contractors but finally chose Magnum after talking to Coleman. The decision as to which contractor to use, according to Dotson, was based on the relative financial condition of each, the kind of equipment they intended to use, and the price they were asking. The price paid to any potential contractor depended on how much Respondent could obtain for the coal when it sold the coal to a customer. The sale price would have to cover the contractor's price.

In April Respondent and Magnum signed a contract that required Magnum to mine Tioga coal and to sell and deliver it to Respondent's Gully Eagle preparation plant where it was commingled with coal produced by other mining contractors and sold to Respondent's customers, sometimes in the raw state, sometimes after being washed. Under the contract Respondent provided Magnum certain engineering services, surveys, the use of equipment, repair services if desired, and supplies if needed. If Magnum required repair or supplies from Respondent, it was understood that Magnum would be billed for such.

After the signing of the contract Magnum began mining coal at Tioga. Respondent's 170-acre permit to do so was transferred to Magnum.[4] Magnum used Respondent's equipment to mine the coal, the same equipment that had been used by Respondent's employees during previous excavations. Magnum paid a fee in order to use this equipment. Although Magnum could, under the contract, have Respondent repair this equipment, also for a fee, Magnum never chose to do so. Similarly, Magnum never purchased supplies from Respondent for its Tioga mining project although it could have done so.

Also, after the signing of the contract between Respondent and Magnum, Respondent's management reviewed the names of employees who had formerly worked at the Tioga surface mine, in anticipation of Magnum's having to recall these employees, in accordance with the labor agreement in effect at the time, and found 14 names of bargaining unit employees on the layoff panel list. Of these 14 employees, 10 were working at the time for Respondent at its other facilities including William Hayes who would eventually file the grievance that would, in turn give rise to the filing of the charge in the instant proceeding. The other four bargaining unit employees laid off from the Tioga surface mine were sent letters prepared in the office of Donald S. Basset, Respondent's manager of industrial/employee relations for the northern division, and signed by Coleman on behalf of Magnum after Coleman had been advised by Simmons that there was a contractual obligation to recall these employees to Tioga. Coleman reviewed the letters before they were mailed.

When actual work began at the Tioga surface mine, Magnum immediately ran into trouble. At the start Magnum had no new equipment. In fact it had virtually no equipment at all. Rather, it used the exact same equipment, the same bulldozers and endloaders, Respondent's equipment, that had been used by bargaining unit employees working at the Tioga surface mine back in 1985. Exceptions were two augers, which Magnum later brought on site, started up, but may never have used.[5] The Island Creek equipment used by Magnum at Tioga was old and in need of repair. Some of the repair work on this equipment was performed by the four to six employees hired by Magnum to work at Tioga. Other repairs were performed by independent outside contractors. Though the equipment belonged to Respondent, none of the repairs were performed by Respondent's employees. It is conceded that the repair work performed at Tioga by Magnum and independent contractors would have been performed by bargaining unit employees under the contract.

The frequent breakdown of the equipment at Tioga resulted in substantial downtime for Magnum. The repair work was paid for by Magnum, and Respondent was not billed although it was Respondent's equipment that was undergoing repairs. The frequency of repairs and resultant downtime caused Magnum to fall far below the 700 tons of daily production required under the contract. In some months Magnum averaged only 75 tons per day. Magnum's failure to meet its quota and the reasons therefor were closely monitored and reported to Respondent by Claude Simmons, its overseer on the project.

[3] According to Claude Simmons, Respondent's mine foreman, when Respondent decides to contract out rather than mine with its own employees, the decision is based on an internal cost analysis. In the instant case the decision to contract out the Tioga surface mine operation was based on the short term, small production nature of the contract. It was decided that rather than invest all the necessary moneys into the equipment that would be required to start up the operation, it would be better to contract the work to another mining company.

[4] The permit was, at some time, modified to allow the use of augers. No such allowance was permitted under the old permit but there was a stipulation on the Island Creek/Magnum contract that permitted the use of augers.

[5] Respondent also owned an auger, which was an old model and had never been put into use.

Before actually beginning work at the Tioga surface mine, Coleman visited the union office in Craigsville, West Virginia, and advised the Union's representative there that Magnum was going to take over the Tioga surface mine operation. A meeting was scheduled for 9 May between Coleman and the Union's vice president, Jerry Miller. At the meeting, attended by Miller, Coleman, and another union representative, Coleman advised Miller that he had entered into an oral agreement with Respondent that permitted Magnum to operate at the Tioga surface mine; that the oral agreement was being reduced to written form; that Magnum would have a million tons of recoverable coal to mine under the contract; that Respondent would require Magnum to furnish it with 700 tons of coal per day; that Respondent would pay Magnum $12.50 per ton for the coal it mined at Tioga; and that Magnum would have to pay the hauling bill for transporting the coal from the minesite to where Respondent wanted the coal dumped out of the $12.50 per ton agreed on. Coleman informed Miller that he had 4 employees working for the past 2 weeks repairing the equipment; that the equipment was in such a state of disrepair that it was going to cost him $30,000 to $40,000 to put it in operable condition; that he had hired Lewis Machinery Company to help him overhaul Respondent's equipment; that he planned to call 2 more employees to work the following week; that at the peak of production Magnum would employ 20 employees; that he would not object to signing an agreement but wanted some exceptions to the NBCWA;[6] that his agreement with Respondent required that if he became signatory to a union contract, Magnum, itself, would have to pay its own contribution into the pension and trust funds; that as a small operator, he could not afford to pay into the pension and trust funds out of his $12.50 per ton as required by the NBCWA;[7] and that he would have to be selective about employees he would be hiring. Regarding this last matter, Miller told Coleman that there were a lot of Respondent's employees who had panel rights at the Tioga operation. Coleman disagreed stating that he did not think that he was obligated to hire any of those people and that he had been told by Respondent that Magnum was required to hire just one employee previously employed by Respondent.[8]

Prior to the 9 May meeting between Coleman and Miller, no one from Respondent ever advised the Union of its intention to subcontract out the Tioga surface mine operation. Similarly, Respondent never offered to bargain with the Union concerning its decision to subcontract the Tioga operation to a third party.

When Magnum first began working the Tioga surface mine, its operation was discovered by William Hayes, a bargaining unit employee of Respondent who had worked at Tioga on previous occasions and was again working there temporarily on reclamation work when Magnum was present. On 9 May Hayes sought to bring Magnum's presence at Tioga to the attention of Jerry Miller who by that time was already aware of the situation. Hayes felt that he should have been offered employment by Magnum because of his seniority at Tioga. Hayes and Miller discussed application of the contract to the situation, and it was decided that Hayes should file a grievance.

On 19 May a grievance was filed by Hayes:[9]

> The employer has conveyed, leased transferred or assigned its Tioga Strip to Magnum Mining in contradiction to the NBCWA of 1984 and in an attempt to avoid the application of said agreement. We are demanding that the employer immediately cease its improper actions and make whole any damaged employees, the Union and the Health and Retirement Funds.

The grievance was filed with Simmons who took the position that Respondent had not violated the contract, thus denying the grievance.

On 21 May, Miller sent a letter to Respondent's division manager, Donald G. Bassett, industrial and employee relations, requesting a copy of the contract between Respondent and Magnum Mining Corporation covering the Tioga surface mine. Miller advised Bassett that the contract was necessary to enable the Union to effectively process the grievance, which Hayes had filed on 19 May. Respondent did not immediately furnish the Union with a copy of the requested document.

On 30 May the Union and Respondent met in order to consider the grievance at its third step.[10] At this meeting Miller accused Respondent of violating article 1(A)(h)(1) of the contract by contracting out to Magnum Mining Corporation work that should have been done by its own employees in order to avoid application of the contract. Further, Miller accused Respondent of violating article 1(A)(h)(6), of the contract by failing to furnish the Union with a copy of Respondent's contract with Magnum and by failing to give the Union notice of the agreement. Finally, Miller charged that Respondent had violated the contract when it failed to require Magnum to assume Respondent's obligations under the successorship provision of the contract. Miller explained to Respondent's representatives his understanding of the arrangements between Respondent and Magnum as explained to him by Coleman at the earlier meeting. He argued that the $12.50 per ton that Respondent had agreed to pay Magnum was far less than the cost per ton to Respondent mined at Tioga in 1979, and that this fact proved that Respondent had contracted with Magnum to avoid application of the contract agreed to between the Union and Respondent.

[6] National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement.

[7] Miller testified that in the past he had agreed to grant relief to other employees who were unable to meet the pension fund requirements.

[8] Magnum subsequently sent a letter to that one person but he never went to work for Magnum.

[9] The language was Miller's.

[10] The parties scheduled the meeting to take place at the Union's offices. Hayes, Miller, and Chapman represented the Union while Bassett and Simmons represented the Respondent.

Miller advised Bassett that the Union intended to go forward with the grievance and gave him a handwritten request for certain information which he claimed would enable the Union to proceed. Bassett in turn asked Miller to have his request typed up and mailed to him. Miller agreed. The information requested was > 1. A complete accounting of the repairs to the equipment on the Tioga Strip which were performed at the direction of Magnum Mining. This accounting should include an explanation of the repair work, the number of people used, the total hours worked by each person, the dates on which the work was performed, and the total cost of the work.

> 2. A copy of the cost sheet for the Tioga Surface Mine for the last month during which coal was produced at Tioga and for the seventeen (17) months preceding the last month of production. Please do not count the months during which coal was produced incidental to reclamation work required by state or federal regulations.

During the meeting of 30 May, Miller explained to Bassett why he needed the information. He told Basset that the Tioga unit work force had acquired jurisdiction over repair and maintenance of the Tioga surface mine equipment. He advised Bassett that in order to determine whether the repair and maintenance on this equipment had been contracted out improperly, it would be necessary for the Union to know exactly what had been done. The Union had to know what work subcontractors had done at Tioga in order to decide if the Union's jurisdiction over repair and maintenance work had been breached. The extent of repair and maintenance work performed had to be known in order to show the arbitrator the extent of damage to the Union and its membership. Miller testified that, at the time, he had reason to believe that Magnum was doing unit repair work.

Regarding the cost sheets, Miller told Bassett that the Union needed these to show that Respondent's production costs per ton in 1979 far exceeded the amount of money it was paying Magnum to mine coal under the contract it signed with Magnum in 1986 and that this would prove its charge that Respondent was violating section 1(A)(h)(1) of the NBCWA of 1984.

Bassett told Miller that he would call him once Respondent's attorneys had made a decision concerning the Union's 21 May request for a copy of the Island Creek/Magnum Mining Corporation contract. Bassett did not, at this time, advise Miller that the information he was seeking was considered confidential although he testified that this was one of the reasons he decided to deny the Union the requested information.

Regarding the Union's request for a complete accounting of the repairs to the equipment on the Tioga strip, which were performed at the direction of Magnum, Bassett testified that Respondent had no information concerning any such repairs and did no repairs, itself, on that equipment.

Regarding the cost sheets requested by the Union, Bassett testified that Respondent refused to provide the Union with this information because a great deal of time had passed since the 1977–1979 period and conditions had changed since them so that the data requested was no longer applicable to the problem at hand. In explanation of how conditions had changed, Bassett testified that the provisions of the applicable wage agreement had changed; the conditions affecting the surface mining of coal had changed; and the price obtained for mined coal had changed. These changes, in turn, affected the cost per ton that it would take to mine coal.

On 3 June Bassett replied by letter to Miller's 21 May request for a copy of Respondent's contract with Magnum. Bassett stated that he would be willing to review the contract with Miller in Bassett's office on a mutally agreeable date. At that time, according to the letter, Miller would be permitted to "examine all pertinent information contained in the contract" but would not be provided with copies of the contract. On the same date Miller mailed to Bassett a typewritten request for the information he had asked for at the 30 May grievance meeting. He also mailed to the Board, on the same date, a copy of the charge in Case 9–CA–23181. The Region docketed the charge on 5 June.[11]

On 13 June Miller met with Bassett in the latter's office. Bassett permitted Miller to review the entire contract and to take notes therefrom. The contract, however, was incomplete in that it disclosed none of the monetary figures. Missing were the dollar amounts that Respondent had agreed to pay Magnum per ton of coal mined; the dollar amounts that Magnum had agreed to place in a performance escrow account; the dollar amounts that Magnum had agreed to pay Respondent for the lease of its equipment; and the amount of money that Respondent was charging Magnum for electricity. Miller advised Bassett that he was not satisfied with the information proffered by the Respondent. He informed Bassett that he felt that Respondent had committed a breach of contract and that Union was entitled to a complete copy of the contract in order to present its case at arbitration. Bassett replied that he would relay Miller's message to Respondent's attorneys.

About the time of, or shortly after, Miller's meeting with Bassett, the Union sought from Coleman a copy of Magnum's contract with Respondent. Coleman advised the Union's representative that if he had a copy of the contract he would forward it to Miller. On 19 June the Union received from Coleman, not a copy of the contract, but a copy of an invoice covering the period June 1 through 15 showing how many tons of coal had been mined by Magnum for Respondent, the type of coal, the price paid per ton, the charges for power, deductions from the escrow account, and the amount of UMWA royalties paid per ton. A similar invoice was later received from Coleman covering June 16–30.

On 26 June the Union filed the charge in Case 9–CA–23263 alleging additional violations of Section 8(a)(1) and

[11] The charge alleged violations of Sec. 8(a)(1), (3), and (5). The Union charged Respondent with assigning, transferring, or conveying its Tioga surface mine operation to another employer in order to escape its obligations under the collective-bargaining agreement.

(5) basing its charge on Respondent's refusal to supply it with the information requested on 21 and 30 May.

In late June Respondent, filed an application to change the permit covering the Tioga surface mine operation to enable the use of augers on the minesite. The decision to bring augers to the site may have been based on legitimate business considerations. However, in light of the outstanding charges against it, Respondent may have decided to bring the augers to the site in order to give the operation a superficial cosmetic change in appearance and to rely on such change in its defense to the outstanding charges filed against it. At any rate the augers were not brought to the Tioga surface mine until some time following August.

On 7 July Bassett sent to Miller a copy of the Magnum/Island Creek contract which Miller had examined at their 13 June meeting. Like the copy of the contract reviewed by Miller earlier, the one sent to him on 7 July was incomplete in the same respects as the earlier one. Although Miller subsequently renewed his request for the information asked for earlier, including a complete contract with financial data, Respondent has refused to supply information.

On 13 October, the day before the hearing in the instant proceeding, Bassett sent to Miller a position statement and an alternative offer to the information requested. As to the accounting of repairs to the equipment on the Tioga strip, Bassett stated that Respondent was not in possession of such information; as to cost sheets for the 1977–1979 period Bassett reiterated his position that the information was irrelevant; as to the Union's request for a complete copy of the contract Bassett reiterated his position that the financial figures were confidential. In the alternative, however, Bassett offered to compare the cost sheets for the 18-month 1977–1979 period with the price per ton that Respondent agreed to pay Magnum and to provide the Union with the difference between the figures. Bassett further offered to provide the Union with the items included in the cost sheets and agreed to have a mutually acceptable third party confirm the accuracy of the figures. The record does not reflect what reply, if any, the Union made to Respondent's 13 October communication.

The Issues

The following issues are:

I. Whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by its failure to notify and bargain with the Union prior to its decision to subcontract its Tioga surface mine Operation to Magnum.

II. Whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by its failure to provide the Union with information necessary and relevant to the Union's processing of its grievance:

A. A complete copy of the Island Creek/-Magnum contract.

B. A copy of the sheets for the Tioga Surface Mine for the last 18 months of production, 1977 to 1979.

C. A complete accounting of the repairs to the equipment at the Tioga Surface Mine which were performed at the direction of Magnum Mining Company.

Analysis and Conclusions

I. FAILURE TO NOTIFY AND BARGAIN

The above facts, digested, indicate that Respondent first mined at Tioga in 1971, utilizing its own employees, all represented by the Union. These employees, besides mining coal, did reclamation work as well as repair and maintenance work on the equipment. They performed these duties in accordance with the existing collective-bargaining agreement until 1979.

During the 1970s the Respondent worked the Tioga surface mine full time, stripping during two shifts and loading on the third shift. Equipment used included endloaders, bulldozers, and a shovel. Respondent's employees included equipment operators, a drill crew, powdermen, mechanics, welders, electricians, and maintenance personnel. Coal mined at Tioga was sent to a preparation plant to be washed. After closing the mine in June 1979, Respondent did not do any mining at Tioga except for a small amount incidental to some reclamation work, work which is not here in issue.

In late 1985 Respondent became aware of the availability of a short-term spot market contract for coal at a production level of 700 to 800 tons per day. An internal cost analysis was undertaken to determine whether it would be more beneficial for the Company to undertake the mining at Tioga with its own unit employees or to contract out the mining to another mining company. It was determined that because the contract would be short term and the production small, it would be better to contract out the operation to another company rather than invest all the necessary moneys into equipment required to startup the operation. Several mining companies were henceforth contacted to see if any of them would be interested in mining the Tioga coal. The decision concerning whether to subcontract at all was strictly a financial consideration as was the choice of which company to subcontract the operation to. Finally, as noted, Magnum was chosen as the subcontractor and the contract was signed in April 1986. Subsequently, Magnum mined coal for Respondent, the coal being hauled to Respondent's preparation plant where it was commingled with the coal of other subcontractors, then washed or sold raw by Respondent to its customers. Under its contract with Magnum, Respondent made available to that subcontractor the same equipment and services that it had made available to its own employees in the 1970s. The work performed by Magnum's employees was the same type of work performed at the same site in the 1970s by Respondent's own unit employees.[12] This included both the actual mining of coal and the repair and maintenance of the equipment by Magnum's employees and the sub-subcontracting by Magnum of some repair work. Magnum's production and its failure to meet its assigned quota was closely monitored by Respodent's managerial personnel just as it had monitored its own production at Tioga in the 1970s.

[12] The augers brought to the site by Magnum are of little or no significance. Since work began in April and was scheduled, at the time of the hearing, to be completed in October, and since the augers were not delivered to the site until August, they were either never used or were used very little.

The record clearly reflects, as alleged in the complaint, that Respondent entered into its contract with Magnum Mining Company for the mining of coal at the Tioga surface mine, which had been previously mined by employees of Respondent in the unit, and that it did so without prior notice to the Union and without having afforded the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain as the exclusive representative of Respondent's employees regarding such acts and conduct and the effects of such acts and conducts in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. As found in Fiberboard Corp.,[13] the replacement of employees in an existing bargaining unit with those of an independent contractor to do the same work under similar conditions of employment is a statutory subject of bargaining under Section 8(d) of the Act. Respondent's decision, in the instant case, to subcontract instead of recalling laid-off workers was based on labor costs. There was no change in the nature or direction of the business since Magnum continued to operate the Tioga surface mine in the same manner as Respondent had done previously, with the same equipment. Respondent's decision regarding subcontracting was clearly amenable to possible resoultion through the collective-bargaining process. Indeed, the Union on other occasions had granted concessions to employees in order to reach a satisfactory agreement, and there is no showing in the instant case that negotiations could have resulted in agreement.

Under the circumstance of this case Respondent's failure to afford the Union an opportunity to bargain over its decision to subcontract and the effects thereof deprived the Union of its rights guaranteed under the Act. Pennsylvania Energy Corp.[14] Respondent thus violated the Act.

II. RESPONDENT'S FAILURE TO PROVIDE A COMPLETE COPY OF THE ISLAND CREEK/MAGNUM CONTRACT

Regarding the allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by refusing to furnish the Union with a complete copy of the Magnum/Island Creek contract the record reveals that Miller, on 21 May, sent a letter to Bassett requesting a copy of the contract, advising him that the Union needed the document in order to enable it to effectively process the grievance filed by Hayes on 19 May. As noted, Respondent did not immediately furnish the Union with a copy of the contract.

On 30 May, at the third-step grievance meeting Miller accused Respondent of violating article 1(A)(h)(6) of the contract by failing to furnish the Union with a copy of its contract with Magnum. Although the cited article does not, in fact, require Repondent to supply the Union with a copy of the contract in question, it is clear that Miller was, in effect, renewing his request for a copy. Bassett, on this occasion, advised Miller that he would call him once Respondent's attorneys had made a decision on whether to furnish the Union with a copy of the requested document.

On 13 June, Miller met with Bassett in the latter's office. On this occasion Bassett permitted Miller to review a copy of the Magnum contract and take notes from it. The document shown to Miller, however, was incomplete in that all monetary figures had been deleted. Miller objected to the fact that the document was incomplete and insisted that the Union had to have the missing information in order to present its case at arbitration. Bassett again told Miller that he would relay Miller's message to Respondent's attorneys.

After the Union filed its charge on 26 June based on Respondent's failure to provide it with the requested information, Respondent on 7 July sent to Miller the same abridged version of the Magnum contract that he had been permitted to examine in Bassett's office. Although Miller subsequently renewed his request for a complete copy of the document including the monetary figures, Respondent has continued to refuse to supply the requested information.

On the day before the hearing in the instant proceeding Respondent again refused to provide the financial figures contained in the Magnum contract because those figures were considered confidential in that "releasing that information could have significant adverse impact on our operations and our sales, particularly in this highly competitive market for coal." Rather than furnish the requested figures, Respondent offered, in the alternative, to compare the cost sheets for the 18-month period requested by the Union with price per ton, the Company agreed to pay Magnum Mining Corporation and provide the difference between the figures to the Union. Respondent also offered to have a mutually acceptable third party confirm the accuracy of its figures. The Union has rejected Respondent's alternative offer.

The General Counsel takes the position that the monetary figures contained in the Magnum contract represent the hardcore evidence necessary to convince the arbitrator that the grievance is meritorious. The Union plans to show that the figures contained in the contract, when compared with the 1977-1979 cost sheets, prove that Respondent subcontracted out the Tioga operation for purely financial reasons. This, in turn will prove, according to the Union's theory, that Respondent subcontracted out the Tioga operation solely to avoid the application of the 1984 NBCWA in violation of section IA(h)(1) of that collective-bargaining agreement.

Respondent takes the position that the financial information contained in the Magnum contract is confidential and privileged because this information reflects Respondent's mining costs which in turn permits it to determine what it can bid on the spot and long-term contract market. Respondent posits that if competitors were to come into possession of this information they could determine what Respondent's bids might be and thereby underbid Respondent for other jobs. Further, Respondent argues that having one contractor know that another contractor has been offered more or less than itself, creates havoc in the coal mining contractor business community.

In NLRB v. Acme Industiral Co.,[15] the Supreme Court dealt with a situation similar to the one here extant. There, a collective-bargaining agreement, which contained procedures for processing grievances culminating in compulsory, binding arbitration provided that it was respondent employer's policy not to subcontract work that was normally performed by employees in the bargaining unit. During the contract term certain machinery was removed from the plant, and in response to the Union's query respondent stated that there was no violation of the agreement and barring exceptional or special circumstances should be furnished to the Union.

The Respondent argues that the monetary figures contained in the requested contract are confidential and if made public would place it at a disadvantage in the very competitive coal contracting business. The record, however, reflects that the Magnum/Island Creek contract was singularly unsuccessful and plagued with problems. The outmoded equipment used continuously broke down and Magnum was able to mine little more than 10 percent of the coal that had been contracted. Indeed, the project was in the process of being abandoned at the time the hearing was being concluded. I cannot believe that Respondent plans any similar operation in the future so that the monetary figures contained in the contract would be totally valueless to any competitor relying on them to outbid the Respondent. Ordinarily, where an employer transfers unit work to another company, the union is entitled to the information necessary for it to determine whether the transfer was in violation of the contract and to decide whether it should file a grievance and proceed to arbitration.[16] If an employer refuses to make the requested information available because the information is confidential, the burden of proving confidentiality is on the employer.[17] I do not believe the Respondent has done so in the instant case. Granting, arguendo, that the information requested was, in fact, confidential and Respondent did meet its burden of proving the confidential nature of the information requested, still it is violative of the Act for an employer to refuse to make the information available where there is no evidence that would show that if the information were made available, its confidentiality would, in some way, be abused.[18] In the instant case, Miller made it clear on the record that if Respondent made the requested information available to him, he would use it for purposes of enforcing the contract through the grievance and arbitration proceedings and would not divulge the information to unauthorized third parties. With these considerations in mind, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by failing to provide the Union with a complete copy of the Island Creek/Magnum contract.

III. RESPONDENT'S FAILURE TO PROVIDE COST SHEETS FOR THE TIOGA SURFACE MINE FOR THE LAST 18 MONTHS OF PRODUCTION, 1977–1979

Regarding allegation that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by refusing to furnish the Union with cost sheets for the Tioga surface mine for the last 18 months production, 1977–1979, the record reveals that Miller, at the meeting of 30 May, asked Bassett for a copy of the cost sheets in question and fully explained the Union's legitimate need for the information to adequately pursue its contractual rights through arbitration. Bassett refused to supply Miller with the requested cost sheets because the passage of time since 1977–1979 and the changes in working and economic conditions made the requested information irrelevant.

Miller, by letter dated 3 June, renewed his request for the 1977–1979 cost sheets. When the information was not forthcoming Miller, on 26 June, filed a charge with the Board based on Respondent's failure to produce this and the other information requested earlier.

On 13 October, in a position paper furnished to Miller by Bassett, the latter reiterated Respondent's position regarding furnishing the 1977–1979 cost sheets. In the alternative, however, Bassett offered to have Respondent compare the 1977–1979 cost sheets with the price per ton that the company had agreed to pay Magnum Mining Corporation and to provide the Union with the difference. Bassett noted that although Respondent still felt that the information requested was irrelevant, the alternative offer made sufficient information available to the Union for its purpose while still maintaining the confidentiality which had to be protected. Although Respondent had maintained all along that the cost sheet information was irrelevant, this position paper contained the first indication that it also considered the 1977–1979 cost sheets confidential.

The General Counsel takes the position that the 1977–1979 cost sheets, like the monetary figures contained in the Magnum contract, represent the hardcore evidence necessary to convince the arbitrator that the grievance is meritorious; that when the two are compared, it will prove that Respondent subcontracted out the Tioga operation for purely financial reasons, in turn proving that Respondent did so in order to avoid the application of the 1984 NBCWA in violation of section IA(h)(1) of that collective-bargaining agreement. Respondent, as more fully described above, takes the position that the requested information is irrelevant.

In support of the position taken by the Union, the General Counsel cites Kris-Beth,[19] in which the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit found in favor of the union involved there, affirming the earlier arbitrator's decision. In that case, as here, the company contracted out certain mining operations. The union grieved the contracting, contending that the employer was motivated by a desire to avoid its collective-bargaining obligations under the National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement. To prove its allegations the union in the Kris-Beth arbitration presented evidence of economic motivation which included a copy of the contract between the employer and the contractor, which contained monetary figures and cost of production figures at mines operated by the employer. The court, in affirming the arbitrator's decision on behalf of the union, took special note that the arbitrator relied on the evidence adduced at the hearing to find economic motivation and a desire on the part of the company to avoid its obligations under the existing collective-bargaining agreement. The General Counsel argues convincingly that the information relied on by the union in Kris-Beth was relevant to that arbitration hearing and is therefore relevant to the planned arbitration of the issues involved in the current dispute between the parties herein since the issues in Kris-Beth and the issues sought to be arbitrated by the parties herein are virtually identical. I am persuaded that the requested cost sheets are relevant and necessary for the Union to pursue its right to arbitrate the issue of contract violation.

Moreover, it is quite clear that the cost sheets that the Union intends to use as evidence in the forthcoming arbitration hearing are not accessible to it except through the Respondent. If Respondent is permitted to withhold this information, the Union's case before the arbitrator would seriously be undermined and Respondent will have succeeded in preventing the Union from pursuing its rights under the collective-bargaining agreement to which both parties have agreed.

As to Respondent's argument that the 1977–1979 cost sheets are no longer relevant because of the passage of time and the changes both in working and economic conditions, the General Counsel is correct in pointing out that this information, nevertheless, contains the most recent usable figures and therefore the most relevant figures available. Regarding the changes in working conditions and in the economic situation in the coal mining industry since 1977, these matters are more appropriate for the arbitrator to consider and weigh in rendering his decision on the ultimate issue. To determine, in advance, that these considerations preclude the use of the 1977–1979 cost sheets at the arbitration hearing would decisively foreclose the Union from presenting its case to the arbitrator. I am not prepared to do this.

Finally, Respondent argues that it has made an alternative offer which should suffice for the Union's purposes. But what Respondent offers to do is to act as agent for the Union in presenting evidence in an arbitration hearing against itself. I see no reason why the Union should be forced to accept such an offer. The Union should be able to pursue its rights in a manner it deems most appropriate. Although Respondent has cited a number of cases where the Board or the courts have decided that the alternative information offered by the company would suffice, all cases cited are easily distinguishable on the facts.[20] On the other hand the Board has frequently required an employer to provide financial information to a union where such information has proven relevant and necessary for the union to pursue its contractual obligations and/or to determine whether to take a contractual issue to arbitration.[21] I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to provide the Union with the requested cost sheets for the Tioga surface mine for the last 18 months of production, 1977–1979.

IV. RESPONDENT'S FAILURE TO PROVIDE A COMPLETE ACCOUNTING OF THE REPAIRS TO THE EQUIPMENT AT THE TIOGA SURFACE MINE WHICH WERE PERFORMED AT THE DIRECTION OF MAGNUM MINING COMPANY

Regarding this allegation the record reveals that Miller, at the meeting of 30 May, asked Bassett for a complete accounting of the repairs to the equipment at the Tioga surface mine, which were performed at the direction of Magnum Mining. Miller gave Bassett a complete and cogent explanation as to the reasons why the information was required. On 3 June Miller reiterated his request in writing. When the information was not forthcoming, Miller, on 26 June, filed a charge based on Respondent's failure to provide the requested equipment repair information. In its 13 October position statement Bassett stated that Respondent had no records or information concerning equipment repairs made at Tioga by Magnum.

According to testimony provided by Respondent's witnesses, inquiries were made of knowledgeable members of its management concerning the existence of records that might shed light on the nature and costs of equipment repair at the Tioga surface mine. The uncontroverted testimony was that members of Respondent's management had neither knowledge nor record information concerning repairs made by Magnum to equipment at the Tioga surface mine operation. Respondent denied that it had made any repairs itself and supplied an affidavit to this effect as required.[22] Under the circumstances I conclude that Respondent was not in possession of the requested information. I cannot therefore recommend that it be found in violation of the Act by refusing to provide information that it does not possess.[23] I shall therefore recommend dismissal of this allegation.

V. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent set forth above, occurring in connection with its operations described above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices warranting a remedial order, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and that it take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent having unlawfully failed to bargain with the Union over its decision to subcontract, I shall recommend that it be ordered to bargain collectively with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, including the decision to subcontract bargaining unit work. I shall further recommend that it be ordered to recall from layoff, assuming work is available, those employees who would have been recalled absent Respondent's unlawful conduct and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits. Earnings and benefits are to be computed in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as set forth in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). Finally, as I have found that Respondent refused to give to the Union relevant information which it requested for the purpose of enabling it to evaluate and pursue its grievance, I shall recommend it be ordered to furnish the Union with a complete copy of the contract between Island Creek Coal Company and Magnum Mining Comapny and cost sheets for the Tioga surface mine operation for the 18-month period immediately preceding its closure in 1979.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce and in an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All employees employed at Respondent's Tioga Mine, in the unit described in the National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement of 1984 constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. The Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's Tioga Mine employees in the unit for at least 10 years during which period the Union has been recognized as such by Respondent. Such recognition has been embodied in successive collective-bargaining agreements the most recent of which is effective by its term through 31 January 1988.

5. By failing and refusing to bargain about subcontracting decisions, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. By failing and refusing to provide a complete copy of the contract between Island Creek Coal Company and Magnum Mining Company and cost sheets for the Tioga surface mine operation for the 18-month period immediately preceding the Tioga surface mine's closure in 1979, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. By failing to provide a complete accounting of the repairs to the equipment at the Tioga surface mine that were performed at the direction of Magnum Mining Company, Respondent did not violate the National Labor Relations Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Tube Craft, Inc. and United Steel Workers of America, AFL-CIO, Local 8703. Case 8-CA-18371

July 14, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

On January 23, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Robert W. Leiner issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified and set forth in full below.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Tube Craft, Inc., Cleveland, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain in good faith collectively with United Steelworkers of America, Local 8703 and District 28 (the Union), as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All clerical employees of Tube Craft, Inc., employed at its Cleveland plant, excluding confidential employees and professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act and all other employees.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize and, on request, bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the above-described appropriate unit regarding wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its facility in Cleveland, Ohio, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[1] The judge's discussion and conclusions regarding the Respondent's failure to rebut the presumption of the Union's continuing majority status make it apparent that he erred inadvertently in stating, in part III,C, par. 6 of his decision, that the Respondent's evidence demonstrates the antiunion attitudes of "all" employees. The context indicates that the judge intended the word "some," and we adopt this finding as so corrected.

[2] In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent did not rebut the presumption of continuing majority status or establish a reasonably based doubt of that status, we do not rely on Pennco, Inc., 250 NLRB 716 (1980), which was overruled in Buckley Broadcasting Corp., 284 NLRB 1339 (1987). In Buckley Broadcasting, we held that we will not entertain any specific presumption concerning the union sentiments of strike replacements but will simply consider whether the employer has proffered sufficient evidence of employees' expressed desires to repudiate the union as collective-bargaining representative to overcome the overall presumption of continuing majority status. Although the judge considered the Pennco presumption, his ultimate analysis was consistent with the principles of Buckley Broadcasting.

[3] As part of his recommended remedy for the violations that converted the employees' economic strike into an unfair labor practice strike, the judge provided that certain employees be accorded the reinstatement rights to which unfair labor practice strikers usually are entitled. Here, their rights would have been operative only after their positions were no longer filled by the permanent replacements hired while the strike was still an economic strike. We have decided however, in a separate proceeding involving the same parties, Tube Craft, Inc., 287 NLRB 491 (1987) (Tube Craft I), that the Respondent lawfully discharged all the strikers who otherwise might have been eligible for reinstatement. Therefore, we shall delete the remedial provisions that provide for reinstatement rights.

Member Babson did not participate in Tube Craft I, supra. Member Babson agrees, based on the facts of that case, that the strikers engaged in picket line misconduct that justified their discharge by the Respondent. He, however, finds it unnecessary to pass on the standards applied by the Board in that case in assessing whether the picket line misconduct was sufficient to justify the discharge of the strikers.

We also recognize that eliminating the unfair labor practice strikers' reinstatement rights means that, in adopting the judge's recommended bargaining order, we will be directing the Respondent to bargain at a time when the Union has lost all its previously known supporters and the unit consists exclusively of permanent strike replacements or other newly hired employees. Nevertheless, the Respondent is not in a position to question the Union's status for, as found by the judge, it abruptly and unlawfully withdrew recognition at a time when the Union continued to be entitled to the presumption of majority status because at that time the striking employees were still employed. In these circumstances, a reasonable period of time for renewed bargaining must be provided without regard for subsequent fluctuations concerning majority status. VIP Limousine, 276 NLRB 871 fn. 1, 877 (1985); Poole Foundry & Machine Co., 95 NLRB 34 (1951), enfd. 192 F.2d 740 (4th Cir. 1951), cert. denied 342 U.S. 954. Therefore, the bargaining order is still warranted.

Finally, we will delete the visitatorial provision granted by the judge in par. 2(c) of his recommended Order. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[4] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT W. LEINER, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard on 2 and 3 December 1985 in Cleveland, Ohio, on the General Counsel's complaint[1] alleging, in the substance, that Respondent, Tube Craft, Inc., in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of a unit of Respondent's employees, thereby prolonging a strike[2] in which the unit employees were engaged. Respondent's timely filed answer admits certain allegations of the complaint, denied others, and denies the commission of any unfair labor practices.

At the hearing, all parties were represented by counsel, were given full opportunity to call and examine witnesses, submit oral and written evidence, and to argue orally on the record. At the close of the hearing, counsel waived final argument and reserved the right to submit posthearing briefs. Thereafter, all parties filed timely posthearing briefs, which have been carefully considered.

On the entire record, including the briefs, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT AS STATUTORY EMPLOYER

Respondent admits that it is an Ohio corporation with an office and place of business in Cleveland, Ohio, where it engaged in the fabrication of metal tubing for use in the transportation and other industries. Respondent further admits that, in the course and conduct of its business operations on an annual basis, it sold and shipped from its Cleveland, Ohio facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside the State of Ohio and that at all material times it has been and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. I so find.

II. THE UNION AS A STATUTORY LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that United Steelworkers of America, District 28, and Local 8703, United Steelworkers of America, collectively called the Union, are now, and each have been at all material times, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent employs a total of 46 employees at its Baker Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio plant, 6 of whom, clerical employees, are called "office and technical" employees (O & T employees). The complaint alleges and Respondent admits, inter alia, that a unit of all of Respondent's clerical employees, excluding confidential employees and professional employees, guards and supervisors, as defined in the Act, and all other employees, constitutes a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act. Moreover, the complaint alleges and Respondent admits that on 15 August 1978, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative in the above unit (G.C. Exh. 2).

[1] The Union's underlying unfair labor practice charge against Respondent was filed and served on 28 June 1985. The General Counsel's complaint issued on 12 August 1985.

[2] At the hearing, I precluded the Charging Party from adducing proof or arguing that the strike from its 2 January 1985 inception, was an unfair labor practice strike. The General Counsel stated that the Charging Party's position was contrary to the complaint (Tr. 9) which, in substance, alleged that the strike first became an unfair labor practice strike on 9 January 1985. On the General Counsel's and Respondent's objection (Tr. 74-77), I also denied Charging Party's motion to amend the complaint to conform to the proof or to the offer of proof. I reaffirm those rulings. Compare Pennatech Papers, 263 NLRB 264, 265 (1982), with Signal Transformer Co., 265 NLRB 272, 279 (1982).

Thereafter, Respondent and the Union entered into collective-bargaining agreements covering employees in the above unit, the last of which, of 3 years' duration, expired on or about 31 December 1984. Commencing 13 December 1984, the parties engaged in negotiations for a further collective-bargaining agreement, and in the period 13–19 December 1984, bargained four to five times toward that end. Essentially economic differences prevented agreement. On Wednesday, 2 January 1985, as admitted in the pleadings and as supported in the record, all six clerical unit employees commenced a lawful economic strike and commenced picketing Respondent's premises. The Union's picketing, commencing on 2 January, was ordinarily from 6 a.m. through midnight, with several unit employees on the picket line at any one time. Commencing midnight to 6 a.m., ordinarily strikers Lucia, Wallace, and Steele were regularly the pickets (Tr. 236). One picket, Alice Emmert, testified without contradiction that she was on the picket line 15 hours per day during the first 2 weeks of January (Tr. 242).

Commencing on or about 3 January, Respondent began contacting persons to replace the strikers. These persons had never filed employment applications with Respondent nor otherwise previously contacted Respondent for employment. Some of the prospective employees were friends of Respondent officers' children. Between 3 January and the early afternoon of 9 January, Respondent hired six employees to replace the six striking union members.[3] As of the time of the hearing, the strike continued.

1. The hiring of the replacement employees

Respondent's president (Thomas La Boda) and executive vice president (Bud Callahan) interviewed and hired the replacement employees immediately after the commencement of the 2 January economic strike. Thus, while Callahan did most of the interviewing and hiring, La Boda was present when Supervisor Walt Lindenberg interviewed and hired replacement Deborah Curp and he, himself, interviewed replacement employee Tim Mellino. Both replacements were told during the interviews that they were being hired as permanent employees to replace the striking employees. La Boda testified and Callahan corroborated that Timothy Mellino determined that Mellino had an engineering background, placed him in the production scheduling clerical position on the shop floor, which had previously been the job of striker Ed Steele. Callahan credibly testified that since all the employees, when interviewed, wanted to know their status, he told each of them that they were permanently replacing the strikers.

Callahan also interviewed Deborah Curp on 3 January 1985 and she started work on the same day. He initially made her a receptionist because she was the first replacement employee hired and there was nobody in the office to answer the telephones. She was transferred to the "traffic department" where she had the responsibility of contacting trucking companies to coordinate delivery of Respondent's product to customers. She replaced striker Sylvia Lucia, who had formerly been the billing and traffic clerk.

On the next day, Friday, 4 January, Callahan interviewed Sandra Hall, a friend of the Callahan family. She started work on Monday, 7 January. He told her in the interview that, with her background, she would perform best as an "order entry clerk." She replaced striking employee Betty Jean Schumaker. On the day before her interview (i.e., on 3 January), Callahan had informed Hall that Respondent was on strike and, if she were interested, she could come down for an interview. Callahan told Hall, both on the phone and at the actual interview on the next day, that she would be a permanent replacement for a striking employee.

On the same day that Callahan interviewed Sandra Hall, he also interviewed John Roberson who started work on the same day of the interview, 4 January 1985. Callahan noted that Roberson had no typing skills and told him he would be assigned as the "inventory control clerk" and a permanent replacement for Alice Emmert, who was on strike.

On Monday, 7 January 1985, Callahan interviewd Amy Merrick who was a part-time employee at a nearby bookstore, and a friend of Callahan's daughter, and who was taking courses at a nearby college. After the commencement of the 2 January strike, he spoke to her on a couple of occasions, told her of the strike, and told her that if she were employed, she would be a permanent replacement. He recalled telling her of the permanent nature of her job because it would require her to quit her part-time job at the bookstore and drop out of college in order to take a full-time, permanent job with Respondent. Callahan testified that he assigned Amy Merrick as the accounts receivable and payroll clerk, replacing striker Ruth Kelly.

Last, Callahan testified that Mari Rasmussen, interviewed at 10 a.m., was hired and started work on 9 January 1985. He testified and Respondent's records showed that she started work at 1 p.m. and was paid for 3-1/2 hours between 1 and 4:30 p.m. He told her at the time of hire that she was a permanent replacement. She was made a receptionist and payroll clerk, working in close proximity with Callahan.

All the above replacement employees were apparently working continuously for Respondent through the time of the instant unfair labor practice hearing. On the basis of the above uncontradicted testimony, I conclude that each was hired as a "permanent replacement" for each of the six striking employees and that Respondent replaced the six striking employees with six permanent employees. I further find that no fewer than five of the six permanent replacements commenced work on or before (Tuesday), 8 January 1985.

[3] The sixth replacement, Mari Ann Rasmussen, although interviewed at 10 a.m., as noted, was hired on 9 January, apparently at or about 1 p.m., and appears to have been paid for the time between 1 p.m. and 4:30 p.m. (quitting time) on 9 January. Although there is certain documentary evidence arguably showing that her employment was effective only on the next day, 10 January 1985, there is other evidence to show that she entered on duty no later than 1 p.m. on 9 January (R. Exh. 8). Absent any other contrary evidence, I conclude that, as Respondent's supervisors testified, Rasmussen was hired no later than, and commenced work at, 1 p.m. of Wednesday, 9 January 1985.

I particularly conclude, consistent with Respondent's testimony and notwithstanding that Rasmussen did not appear as a witness (nor was her absence explained), that Rasmussen was a permanent employee at 1 p.m. on 9 January 1985. I further conclude, therefore, that all six of the replacement employees were hired on and between 3 January and 1 p.m. on 9 January 1985.

The Union admitted that since the commencement of the 2 January strike, the Union has not attempted in anyway to contact the replacement employees for purposes of soliciting their membership in the Union nor has it attempted to distribute union literature to them. I conclude that, on this record, the Union had no knowledge of the union attitudes of the replacements. The Union also stated that sometime before the summer of 1985, striker Ed Steele had sought temporary employment elsewhere, and that on 8 February 1985, striker Sylvia Lucia gave notice of an intent to resign, effective 22 February 1985. I conclude that Lucia resigned on 22 February 1985.

2. Bargaining subsequent to the strike; Respondent's withdrawal of recognition

On the first day of the strike, Wednesday, 2 January, on the picket line, the Union's agent, Staff Representative John J. Gromofsky, approached Respondent's manufacturing manager, Walter Lindenberg, and asked for a further collective-bargaining session. The parties met on the next day, 3 January, but could not reach agreement. At the meeting, Respondent's attorney (Bishop) started to reprimand the Union for alleged picket line misconduct, but Gromofsky cut him short and said that they were there to negotiate rather than to discuss the Union's conduct. Respondent said nothing, at this 3 January meeting, of withdrawing recognition.

On the next day, Friday, 4 January, Gromofsky asked President La Boda for a further meeting, but La Boda told him he would first have to contact Respondent's lawyer, Bishop, who was out of town. On 7 January, La Boda telephoned Gromofsky and set up a meeting for Wednesday, 9 January 1985. A meeting did take place in the afternoon on 9 January 1985, but Gromofsky said he was unclear when in the afternoon the meeting occurred. Because of Alice Emmert's testimony that striker Ed Steele came to the picket line on 9 January 1985 before the collective-bargaining session of that date, and arrived at about 1:30 p.m., I conclude that the collective-bargaining session of 9 January 1985 did not occur before 1:30 p.m. President La Boda said the meeting occurred in the early afternoon about 2:30. It is my conclusion that the 9 January collective-bargaining session occurred about 2:30 p.m. and lasted for no more than a short time in the afternoon (Tr. 339).[4]

The significance of the time when the 9 January collective-bargaining session first began relates in part to my conclusion, above, that Mari Ann Rasmussen was already a permanent employee of Respondent at the time of the commencement of the collective-bargaining session.

3. The collective-bargaining session of 9 Janaury 1985

Pursuant to the 7 January phone call from President La Boda, the parties met about 2:30 p.m. of 9 January 1985, the Union represented by Staff Representative Gromofsky and striker Ed Steele; Respondent represented by Attorneys Bishop and Carey, along with President La Boda. Gromofsky testified (Tr. 64) that the meeting consisted only of Attorney Bishop stating that he had a statement to read and that the substance of the statement was that the Respondent felt that the Union did not represent a majority of Respondent's unit employees and, until that question was resolved, the Respondent would not negotiate with the Union. Gromofsky was clear in that Bishop did not say why Respondent felt that the Union did not represent a majority. When Gromofsky asked for a copy of the statement read by Bishop, Bishop refused. Gromofsky cut short Bishop's attempt to bring up picket line misconduct relating to the pickets' blocking entrances.

After Bishop read his statement, the meeting concluded. Before 5 p.m., Gromofsky met with five of the strikers and told them what had happened at the meeting (Tr. 34). He asked them whether they desired to continue the strike and they told him that their cause was just and they would continue to picket.

President La Boda testified that prior to the opening of the meeting, Respondent, in conjunction of its attorneys, decided that it would no longer recognize or bargain with the Union and reached that decision because of (1) the misconduct of the six, employees whom it decided to discharge; and (2) the existence of the six permanent replacements, which caused counsel and Respondent to doubt whether the Union represented a majority. There was no evidence, however, to suggest that any decision to discharge the striking employees, for picket line or other misconduct or for any other reason, was ever communicated to them or to any other person. Nor is there evidence that they were discharged. Regarding picket line misconduct, it was conceded that neither Respondent nor any other person filed charges against the Union, whether 8(b)(1)(A) violations or otherwise. On the other hand, the record shows that Respondent unsuccessfully applied for a temporary restraining order against the Union's picketing in the court of common pleas in Ohio.

Respondent submitted in evidence (R. Exh. 7) the text of the Bishop statement which, on this record, was read to Gromofsky and Steele at the meeting on 9 January 1985.

[4] About 6 February 1985, the Union wrote to the Respondent requesting further negotiations, and on 11 February 1985 the Respondent declined to bargain with the Union alleging a good-faith doubt originating on 9 January 1985 regarding the Union's majority status.

STATEMENT

> Mr. Gromofsky, Members of the Committee: The device that I just set in front of me is a little tape recorder. It is recording what I am saying. I am going to make a statement today and I want my statement recorded. Management's representatives at this meeting have a copy of the statement that I am reading that they are going to follow along to make sure that I say only what is contained in the statement.
> Prior to the strike, the O & T bargaining unit at Tube Craft consisted of seven persons. One of the employees was a temporary employee. That employee has submitted a letter of resignation to us. That person's position no longer exists at Tube Craft.
> Six members of the O & T unit began a strike on January 2, 1985. The strike continues as of today. Tube Craft has permanently replaced each of the six O & T employees. The replacements are working. With regard to permanent replacements, as you know the replaced employees have job rights should the replacement leave in the unforseeable future.
> You know as well as I do, Mr. Gromofsky, that the striking O & T employees engaged in misconduct during the strike. The fact Tube Craft is treating the striking O & T members as permanently replaced does not constitute a waiver of any of Tube Craft's legal rights with regard to picket line misconduct.

There are presently six striking O & T unit members and six permanent replacements working at Tube Craft. Because of this six and six situation, Tube Craft has good faith doubt that Local 8703 of the United Steel Workers of America represents a majority of employees in the O & T unit. For that reason Tube Craft, Inc., declines to engage in any further bargaining with Local 8703 with regard to the O & T unit until the question is resolved. It is, of course, an unfair labor practice for an employer to bargain with a union that does not represent a majority of its employees in a unit.

4. Replacement employees sentiments regarding the Union

a. Respondent's witnesses

La Boda testified that, while all employees voiced antiunion sentiments, two employees in particular made statements indicating their sentiments regarding the Union. He said that during the 2 January interview of Deborah Curp, she said that she did not understand why there was a union representing the clerical workers and that she would not join such a union; indeed, she had never heard of such a union representing such employees. She also allegedly told him that she would not want to work where there was a union representing these employees.

Although Curp testified for Respondent at the hearing, her testimony omits any corroboration of La Boda's testimony concerning her particularized anti union sentiments expressed during the 2 January interview.

La Boda testified that Sandra Hall made similar statements to him prior to the 9 January collective-bargaining session, at which time Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union. La Boda also testified, generally, that from the beginning of their employment, the replacements all asked how they could get rid of the Union and get rid of the pickets. It was Curp and Hall, however, whom he identified with forcefully expressing these sentiments. Yet Hall's testimony shows no conversation in which she made antiunion statements.

La Boda also testified that he could tell that John Roberson did not harbor any prounion sentiments because Roberson offered to obtain video equipment from his girlfriend in order to photograph the pickets and their alleged blocking of entrances and exits. It was this volunteering by Roberson that led La Boda to believe that Roberson was antiunion.

Roberson, corroborating La Boda, testified that on 8 January he filmed the pickets on the picket line and his picture was taken by one of the female pickets while he was videotaping them.

Bud Callahan

Callahan testified that the strikers called the replacements "scabs" and said they were going to take their jobs away. These striker statements occurred before 9 Janaury (Tr. 205). He testified, generally, that both before and after 9 Janaury, the replacement employees said they wanted the Union to "go away" and they wanted nothing to do with the Union (Tr. 206-207).

John Roberson

Roberson was hired and commenced employment on Friday, 4 January 1985, as inventory control clerk. He was interviewed on 3 January 1985 and testified that he saw and crossed the picket line on 4 and 7 January in his car in which Callahan and Debbie Curp, picked up at a prearranged point, were also passengers. He also testified that on 8 and 9 January, he drove separately to work in his car while all the other employees carpooled with Vice President Callahan in crossing the picket line. Commencing with his second day of work, 7 January, while at work, he heard the picketing strikers out in the street from his office. They said, inter alia, "Don't mess with the desks; we're going to be back." When he and other pickets told Callahan and La Boda of these remarks, they were instructed to close the office curtains and disregard the remarks, but the curtains, at least from time to time, remained open in order to see trucks arriving to make pickups of Respondent's material for delivery to customers. Roberson and other Respondent's witnesses were unclear about which pickets made statements, but he said that the remarks principally came from pickets Alice Emmert, Ruth Kelly, and Betty J. Schumaker. He was confident that he heard and reported the above remarks (about "messing with the desks" and that the pickets were "going to be back") on Monday and Tuesday, 7 and 8 January. Roberson, however, particularly identified four to five pickets on 7 January, including Alice Emmert, Schumaker, Kelly, and Ed Steele. He also testified that on 8 and 9 January, he saw Emmert, Schumaker, Kelly, and other pickets.

On cross-examination, Roberson testified that at the time of hiring, Callahan told him that he was a permanent employee, and that Callahan repeated the same thing to the employees on 7 and 8 January after the replacement employees reported the pickets' statements about not "messing up the desks" and "taking" their jobs. In placing the time that Callahan repeated this assurance, however, Roberson specified that Rasmussen was among the employees. Since Rasmussen was not employed until 9 January 1985 at 1 p.m., at least some of Callahan's statements may have been made after Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union. This does not automatically follow because Callahan's statements, in the presence of Rasmussen, might have occurred on or after 1 p.m. (when Rasmussen entered on duty) and before the commencement of the collective-bargaining meeting about 2:30 p.m., when Respondent withdrew recognition. I am satisfied, however, on the basis of Roberson's testimony and the testimony of other Respondent's witnesses, and notwithstanding contradictory testimony interposed by the Union's witnesses, that in the period 4 January through 8 January, the replacement employees were told by Callahan and La Boda that they were permanent employees and that the Union's pickets did make the above statements to the replacements (concerning the replacement employees not messing up the desks and that the pickets would take their jobs) before 9 January 1985.

Deborah Curp

Curp entered on duty on 3 January after her 2 January interview. She testified that she heard nothing from the pickets on 3 or 4 January (Thursday and Friday), but commencing on Monday, 7 January, and through 9 January at least, she heard the pickets through the windows call the replacements "scabs"; told the replacements not to "get comfortable"; don't mess up the filing cabinets or the desks"; and that the pickets "were going to get [their] jobs back." She testified that she and the other replacements heard and reported the comments through the closed windows. Callahan told them to close the shades and curtains and to ignore what the pickets said. She testified that she could not tell which of the pickets said these things or what time of the day the statements were made, but that on 7 January, pickets Alice Emmert, Sylvia Lucia, and Ruth Kelly made the statements, although she was not looking at them when the statements were made.

Curp also testified that on 8 and 9 January (Tuesday and Wednesday), the pickets said the same things that were directed to all the replacements (the pickets did not know the replacements' names); and that the replacements, in general, and she, in particular, were afraid of losing their jobs and afraid of possible physical assault from the replacements. She and the other replacements told this, she testified, to Supervisors Lindenberg, Callahan, and La Boda. Last, Curp testified that almost on a daily basis, because of the pickets' statements, the replacement employees, including her, asked Callahan about their job tenure and were told that they were permanent employees. She testified that although she drove herself to the interview on 2 January, commencing with 3 January and thereafter, she drove to work escorted either by La Boda or Callahan.

Sandra Hall

Sandra Hall testified that on Friday, 4 January, at her interview, Ruth Kelly, a picket, took her picture as she entered Respondent's building in the early afternoon and that she told Plant Manager Lindenberg of the occurrence. She started work on 7 January (Monday) and in the period 7 January through 9 January, like replacement Deborah Curp, she heard the pickets call the replacements "scab,"[5] talk about getting their jobs back, and not messing up the desks in the office. She recalls that the replacement employees spoke of these things to Supervisors La Boda and Callahan and asked them whether they had permanent jobs and how long the picketing would go on. She testified that Callahan told them that they were permanent replacements and that they had nothing to worry about since the Respondent was taking care of the matter through its lawyers. Like Curp, Sandra Hall was driven through the picket line by carpooling with Callahan in the period 7 through 9 January 1985.

Last, Hall testified that she saw Ruth Kelly, Alice Emmert, and Ed Steele, all pickets, during daylight hours when she was working in the period 7 through 9 January, between the hours of 8 to 4:30 p.m. She particularly recalled that on 7 January, Emmert, Kelly, Schumaker, Lucia, and Ed Steele were on the picket line during these daylight hours and were also there on 8 and 9 January.

b. The Union's witnesses

Ruth Kelly testified that, contrary to the testimony of Sandra Hall, in particular, she was not on the picket line on 7 or 8 January because she was sick at home. Kelly testified that she returned to the picket line on 9 January, but said nothing to the replacement employees.

Although Betty J. Schumaker testified that she was on the picket line in the period 7 through 9 January 1985, she corroborated Ruth Kelly's testimony that Kelly was not on the picket line on 7 or 8 January; that Ed Steele was not there on 7 or 8 January, but was on the picket line on 9 January only for 15 minutes before the collective-bargaining meeting. She, like Kelly, denied saying anything about "scabs" or "getting the jobs back." Because of Kelly's and Schumaker's testimony, to the extent that Roberson, Curp, and Hall identified Kelly on the picket line on 7 and 8 January, I conclude that they were in error. This does not materially affect my generally crediting the replacements' testimony that on 7 and 8 January the strikers called them "scabs" and said they would get their jobs back.

[5] The Union introduced into evidence (C.P. Exh. 2) Hall's statement, given in conjunction with Respondent's court of common pleas proceeding for a temporary restraining order in which Hall said that she and other replacement employees had been called scabs on 18 January by strikers who also said they would get their jobs back. No prior date appears in the Hall statement. Particularly since Hall's statement, given to support the TRO application, necessarily would suggest proximity of alleged union misconduct to the time of the TRO application, I do not believe that the failure of the document to mention more remote union conduct implies that such more remote conduct did not occur. On this record, therefore, I cannot conclude the statement to have serious impeaching effect, i.e., that no name-calling occurred in the period 7-9 January.

Kelly testified that after 9 January she called one female replacement a "scab," but said nothing else. Thereafter, she said she might have said this on more than one occasion. Schumaker testified that in the period 2 through 9 January she said nothing to the replacements; but after 9 January, heard the word "scab" used and heard Roberson called "pony-boy."

Alice Emmert, whose demeanor on the witness stand demonstrated hostility against the replacements, testified that she said nothing to the replacements in the period 2 through 9 January, although she was on the line for at least 12 hours per day in that period. After 9 January, she admitted calling them scabs and admitted saying that she would "have her job back." She observed that the replacements were driven to and from their jobs by La Boda and Callahan. Emmert's testimony appears to indicate that strikers Schumaker, Kelly, Lucia, and Emmert were often on the picket line from 6 a.m. to 8 or 9 p.m.

B. Discussion and Conclusions[6]

In the instant case, as discussed, we are concerned with the Board rules concerning two rebuttable presumptions often relevant in cases of withdrawal of recognition following an economic strike: the rebuttable presumption of continued majority status flowing from certification after the expiration of the certification year; and the rebuttable presumption that new employees, here the strike replacements, are presumed to support the Union in the same ratio as those they replace.[7]

In Bartenders Assn. Pocatello, 213 NLRB 651 (1974), the Board, restating the underlying principles in which the employer seeks to withdraw recognition from an established bargaining representative, referred to Terrell Machine Co., 173 NLRB 1480–1481 (1969), enfd. 427 F.2d 1088 (4th Cir. 1970), in which the Board stated:

> It is well settled that a certified union, upon expiration of the first year following its certification, enjoys a rebuttable presumption that its majority representative status continues. This presumption is designed to promote stability in collective-bargaining relationships, without impairing the free choice of employees. Accordingly, once the presumption is shown to be operative, a prima facie case is established that an employer is obligated to bargain and that its refusal to do so would be unlawful. The prima facie case may be rebutted if the employer affirmatively establishes either (1) that at the time of the refusal the Union in fact no longer enjoyed majority representative status; or (2) that the employer's refusal was predicated on a good-faith and reasonably grounded doubt of the union's continued majority status. As to the second of these, i.e., "good-faith doubt," two prerequisites for sustaining the defense are that the asserted doubt must be based on objective considerations and it must not have been advanced for the purpose of gaining time in which to undermine the union.

Although some courts have held that subjective evidence may be used to bolster the argument that such doubt existed at the relevant time, Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 835 (9th Cir. 1978), other courts have noted that "any doubt as to the continuing majority status must rest on a reasonable basis and may not depend solely on unfounded speculation or a subjective state of mind." NLRB v. Gulfmont Hotel Co., 362 F.2d 588, 589 (5th Cir. 1966). See Member Jenkins dissenting in Arkay Packaging Corp., 227 NLRB 397, 399 fn. 7 (1976). The Board and at least three circuit courts of appeals have observed that the quality of proof supporting the employer's good-faith doubt must be either "reliable objective evidence," cf. Landmark Trucks, 272 NLRB 675 (1984), which is "clear and convincing," NRTA-AARP Pharmacy v. NLRB, 519 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1975); or objective evidence that is "clear, cogent and convincing," NLRB v. Gentzler Tool & Die Corp., 778 F.2d 1211 (6th Cir. 1985), enfg. 268 NLRB 330 (1983); Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, above. NLRB v. Tragniew, Inc., 470 F.2d 669 (9th Cir. 1972); Ref-Chem Co. v. NLRB, 418 F.2d 127, 130 (5th Cir. 1969); and Whisper Soft Mills v. NLRB, 754 F.2d 1381 (9th Cir. 1984). Employee expressions of dissatisfaction with or antipathy for a union may prompt a reasonable doubt of majority status. Compare Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, with NRTA-AARP Pharmacy v. NLRB, above.

[6] At the hearing, and in its brief, Respondent specified three defenses: (a) it had lawfully discharged the six strikers on the morning of 9 January, before withdrawing recognition, resulting in a unit composed only of the six replacements. Therefore, the presumption of the Union's continuing majority was rebutted since at least three of the six replacements were antiunion and Respondent's objectively based good-faith doubt was established. See Beacon Upholstery Co., 226 NLRB 1360 (1976). This defense is rejected because Respondent's evidence, at most, showed that it made an uncommunicated decision to discharge the six strikers, but failed to prove that it actually discharged any of the six strikers—at any time—and therefore failed to factually support the defense. (b) The permanent replacement of the six strikers by 1 p.m. on 9 January resulted in "six against six" in the 12-employee unit. The Union thus either had no majority, in fact, or, alternatively, Respondent had at least a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority when it withdrew recognition. Since the Board rule in Pennco, Inc., 250 NLRB 716 (1980), rebuttably presumes that permanent replacements support the incumbent Union in the same ratio as those replaced; and since all those replaced were prounion strikers, Respondent's defense, based solely on the total replacement of strikers, would ordinarily run afoul of the Pennco hiring-ratio presumption to which I am bound, notwithstanding that some courts of appeal may have refused to adopt the Board rule or may have even adopted a contrary presumption, e.g., NLRB v. Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, 584 F.2d 720 (5th Cir. 1978), regarding the union sympathies of striker replacements. A contrary presumption based solely on the number of replacements, as the General Counsel observes (Br. at 9) apparently based on the Board's explicit statement in Pennco, Inc., above at 717, would tend to validate a withdrawal of recognition, not on objective evidence of disaffection, but immediately on hiring permanent replacements equal to a majority of striking employees if the strikers constitute a unit majority. Such an automatic result would undermine the right to strike and would be contrary to the Act. Nowhere in Respondent's withdrawal of recognition (R. Exh. 7) is there mention of the union attitudes of the six replacements. Respondent alluded only to the fact of replacement. In the instant case, however, as the above text shows, Respondent presented evidence that, in my opinion, effectively rebutted this Pennco presumption. This evidence, comprised of the credited testimony of its supervisors and three replacements, eliminates the Pennco ratio presumption and makes consideration of it academic. For here, it appears to me, when Respondent interposed evidence supporting its third defense (c), objective evidence of good-faith doubt (five of the six replacement employees, in fact, were antiunion), such evidence rebutted and eliminated from consideration the Pennco hiring ratio presumption. In short, Respondent, having effectively rebutted this Pennco presumption by the introduction of actual evidence concerning the replacements' union attitudes, it may not, in this case, raise the issue of the Pennco presumption or, perhaps, a contrary presumption. The parties' actually came to grips on Respondent's above third defense, as the above text demonstrates. The presumption remains intact absent objective evidence that new employees are dissatisfied with the Union. Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 835 (9th Cir. 1978). When, as here, convincing objective evidence rebuts the presumption, the presumption drops out.

[7] Thus, a word might be said about the rule of evidence concerning presumptions. In NLRB v. Tragniew, Inc., 470 F.2d 669, 674–675 (9th Cir. 1972), a case involving the presumption of continued majority status and the rebuttal of such presumption, the court stated:

> Presumptions in the law are a procedural substitute for evidence. They recognize the probability of a fact and impose the proof of the non-existence of that fact upon the party against whom the presumption is asserted. The presumption of majority represenatation here involved is rebuttable by clear, cogent and convincing evidence.

Where, as here, objective evidence shows that at least 50 percent of the six replacement employees are antiunion, the Pennco presumption regarding the union sympathies of replacements no longer "remains intact." Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, above.

When the employer's withdrawal of recognition is based on a good-faith doubt created by the permanent replacement of striking employees, the Board has created a corollary rule to the above rebuttable presumption of continuing majority status flowing from certification:[8] "[A]gain absent evidence to the contrary, new employees are presumed to support the incumbent union in the same ratio as those they replaced." Pennco, Inc., above. In Pennco, Inc., the Board expressly held that the rebuttable presumption of majority status continues in the face of an economic strike and is not rebutted by replacement employees passing through a hostile picket line. Pennco, Inc., above at 718. It should be noted, however, that thereafter Chairman Dotson and three members of the Board have recently and repeatedly seen fit not to pass on this presumption concerning strike replacements set out in Pennco, Inc.; see Stormor, Inc., 268 NLRB 860 (1984); Blu-Fountain Manor, 270 NLRB 199 fn. 3 (1984); and the recent Cascade Painting Co., 277 NLRB 926 (1985). Several courts of appeals, however, have refused to accept the Board's Pennco presumption concerning the sympathies of striker replacements, Whisper Soft Mills v. NLRB, above,[9] while others appear to have supported the rule. As noted, the Pennco ratio rule presumption, having been rebutted by Respondent, is no longer legally before us. We are left, therefore, with the presumption of the Union's continued majority status flowing from certification and the recently expired contract and the reasonableness of the Respondent's doubt of the Union's majority status. That is an issue of fact. NLRB v. Pennco, Inc., 684 F.2d 340 (6th Cir. 1982).

To determine majority status when there is a withdrawal of recognition in a unit where there are strikers and permanent striker replacements, the Board rule is that the numerical size of unit is measured at the time of withdrawal and includes both the permanent replacements and all the striking employees. Pennco, Inc., above at fn. 17; NLRB v. Windham Memorial Hospital, 577 F.2d 805 (2d. Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Crimptex, Inc., 517 F.2d 501, 503–504 (1st Cir. 1975). Of course, had the striking employees been lawfully discharged, as Respondent contends, the number of employees in the unit would not include the discharged employees. Similarly, when the passage of time and other facts demonstrate that permanently replaced strikers have abandoned their employment, such strikers are not counted for determining unit majority. Arkay Packaging Corp., above. Here, of course, neither passage of time nor other evidence show that the strikers, when recognition was withdrawn, abandoned interest in their jobs. Beacon Upholstery Co., 226 NLRB at 1368. To the contrary, it is clear that they wanted their jobs at all material times.

C. The Striker Replacements as Permanent Employees

Before reaching the questions of the rebuttal of presumptions and the evidence regarding the Union's continuing majority status, the first question is whether the six replacement employees are all permanent employees. If not, they may not be counted for unit majority purposes. Callahan, La Boda, Roberson, Curp, and Hall all testified that both at the interviews and thereafter (especially because of picket line taunts from the strikers concerning the permanency of the replacements' jobs), the replacements were repeatedly told that they were in permanent jobs. Indeed, in some instances, the names of the strikers whom they were replacing were given. Respondent was intent on hiring permanent employees. I, therefore, find that the six replacements were hired as permanent employees and lawfully permanently replaced the six strikers on or before 1 p.m., 9 January 1985. Permanently replaced economic strikers are not entitled to reinstatement on demand. Auto Workers Local 259 v. NLRB, 120 LRRM 3102, 3106 (2d Cir. 1985), citing NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375, 379 (1967).

Although Respondent contends that immediately prior to its 9 January withdrawal of recognition it had decided to discharge the six strikers for strike misconduct, Respondent admitted that there had been no communication, even of the alleged discharge decision, to the strikers or to anyone else. I conclude that there had been no discharges of the strikers within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act. Similarly, neither the passage of time nor other circumstances indicate that the strikers abandoned their jobs prior to the withdrawal of recognition. Therefore, Respondent may not place itself within the holding in Beacon Upholstery Co., above, in which the good-faith doubt was to be measured was reduced by the number of employees who had been lawfully discharged; or within Arkay Packaging Corp., above, where the strikers abandoned their jobs; or within any reasonable position whereby its uncommunicated desire would affect the number of unit employees for purposes of proving its "good-faith doubt."[10] In short, therefore, I conclude that the numerical size of the unit against which Respondent's alleged good-faith doubt of majority status must be measured, is 12 employees: the 6 striking employees and the 6 striker replacements. NLRB v. Crimptex, Inc., above at 503-504; NLRB v. Windham Memorial Hospital, above. It goes without saying that the critical date on which the size of this unit is to be measured, in assessing Respondent's good-faith doubt defense, is the date on which Respondent withdrew recognition of the Union, 9 January 1985, NLRB v. Pennco, Inc., above at 342 and cases cited; and subsequent resignations or other matters affecting the employment of the strikers, or indeed the striker replacements, are irrelevant. NRTA-AARP Pharmacy, above; NLRB v. Windham Memorial Hospital, above.

[8] A similar presumption exists following expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement. Rosa Watch Corp., 249 NLRB 284, 286 (1980), citing Triplett Corp., 234 NLRB 985 (1978)

[9] The Ninth Circuit, in Whisper Soft Mills, above, states that the Pennco doctrine has "never been embraced by any circuit court and has been rejected by the four circuits that have considered it," citing NLRB v. Pennco, Inc., above, cert. denied 459 U.S. 994 (1982); Soule Glass & Glazing Co. v. NLRB, 652 F.2d 1055 (1st Cir 1981); National Car Rental System v. NLRB, 594 F.2d 1203 (8th Cir. 1979); and NLRB v. Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, 584 F.2d 720 (9th Cir. 1978). This broad statement by the Ninth Circuit appears to be inconsistent with the holding of the Ninth Circuit's own decision in Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, above, and the holding of the Second Circuit in NLRB v. Windham Memorial Hospital, above.

D. Respondent's Rebuttal of the Pennco, Inc. Presumption of the Union Sympathies of the Replacement Employees

As Noted above, the Pennco, Inc. presumption concerning union sympathies of replacement employees is a rebuttable presumption,[11] Arkay Packaging Corp., above; and the presumption is not applicable in exceptional situations such as when strike replacements, over a period of months preceding the withdrawal of recognition, are not contacted by the Union and the Union makes no effort to police the terms of existing contracts, Arkay Packaging Corp., above. NLRB v. Windham Memorial Hospital, above, fn. 11.

I credit the testimony of Respondent's president, La Boda, insofar as he testified that all the replacements, and particularly through Curp and Hall, asked Respondent, from the beginning of their employment, how to get rid of the Union and how to get rid of the strikers. I further credit his testimony that he told the replacements he was working with Respondent's counsel to "finalize" a method of getting rid of the pickets. In support of La Boda's testimony, I credit the testimony of Deborah Curp insofar as she testified that the striker replacements were afraid of losing their jobs, were afraid of physical contact occurring between the replacements and the strikers, and, commencing with Monday, 7 January 1985, told this to Respondent's supervisors on a daily basis. As Sandra Hall testified, the replacements spoke to the supervisors concerning the strikers returning to their jobs and the strikers' warnings not to mess up the strikers' desks. Hall and others, commencing 7 January, asked La Boda and Callahan whether the jobs were permanent and how long was this going on. I also find that on 7 and 8 January 1985, the pickets called the replacements "scabs" and warned them concerning the permanency of their jobs.

This striker hostility, commencing no later than 7 and 8 January, the replacements being fearful of hostile pickets, the permanency of their jobs and their physical well-being, communicating these problems to the Respondent's management, inquiring how long it was going on and how they might get rid of the pickets and the Union, all demonstrate convincing, objective evidence sufficient to rebut the Pennco presumption that the replacement employees favored the Union in the same ratio as the strikers. It is not necessary, it seems to me, to have each and every one of the replacements testify concerning their participation in individual conversations. Rather, it is sufficient if the credible evidence, as here, relates to at least a majority of the replacements and their union attitudes. See Roza Watch Corp., above.

The presumption having been rebutted, I further find that the evidence, including Callahan's emphatic testimony (Tr. 205-206), shows that the five striker replacements hired before 9 January were antiunion. Regarding the sixth, Mari Ann Rasmussen, there is no evidence concerning her union attitude or sympathy in the crucial period between the time she became a unit employee (1 p.m.) and the time Respondent withdrew recognition (2:30 p.m.) both on 9 January 1985. Odd Fellows Rebekah Home, 233 NLRB 143, 145 (1977). Thus, while the Pennco presumption affecting Rasmussen (i.e., that, in substance, Rasmussen is presumed to be prounion) has been rebutted, I cannot find, on this record, that Rasmussen held any particular attitude concerning the Union, much less that, in the above crucial period before Respondent withdrew recognition, she communicated to anyone, or Respondent knew of, her union attitude in any way. Her union attitude or sympathy, if any, expressed after Respondent withdrew recognition, may well have been affected and, of course, is irrelevant. See NLRB v. Gentzler Tool & Die Co., above, and cases cited; Odd Fellows Rebekah Home, above; Thomas Industries, 255 NLRB 646, 647 (1981), enf. denied on other grounds 687 F.2d 863 (6th Cir. 1982).

E. Respondent Fails to Rebut the Presumption of the Union's Continuing Majority Status

In the first instance, the burden rests with the General Counsel to establish the Union's status as majority representative, through rebuttable presumption or otherwise. NLRB v. Tragniew, Inc., above at 672; Pennco, Inc., 250 NLRB at 717. Here, the General Counsel's prima facie case of the presumption of the Union's majority status on 9 January is established both by virtue of the 1978 certification, Pennco, Inc., 250 NLRB at 716 and cases cited in fn. 3, and the collective-bargaining agreement that expired on 31 December 1984, Roza Watch Corp., above at 286 (1980). The burden of proof then shifts to the employer, who may rebut the presumption of majority status with less than proof that a union lacks actual majority support by establishing objective evidence forming a reasonable basis for a good-faith doubt of that status.

[10] Respondent argues (Br. at 44) that Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, 230 NLRB 542 (1977), supports, in some way, the position that its good-faith doubt is supported by its uncommunicated decision to discharge the strikers made before 9 January withdrawal of recognition. I do not agree. Such a conclusion would encourage the basest "bootstrapping" and is untenable.

[11] This presumption long antedates the Pennco case. See Laystrom Mfg. Co., 151 NLRB 1482, 1484-1485 (1965).

However, in light of the policies underlying the presumption of continuing majority status, the employer's burden is a heavy one. Pennco, Inc., 250 NLRB 716–717.[12] As above noted, the courts require that evidence in support of the employer's good-faith doubt of continued majority status be not only "objective" but "clear, cogent and convincing," NLRB v. Tragniew, Inc., above; Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, above, and NRTA-AARP Pharmacy v. NLRB, 519 F.2d 486 (2d Cir. 1975).

In the instant case, for purposes of determining the lawfulness of the 9 January withdrawal of recognition, the unit comprises 12 employees: 6 permanent replacements and 6 strikers. There is no dispute, on this record, and I find that on that date, and at all times, the strikers maintained their full allegiance to the Union. Indeed, on the very afternoon following withdrawal of recognition, when Union Representative Gromofsky polled the strikers, they told him that the strike was just and that the strike would continue. Likewise, as above noted, I am satisfied that, based on the credited testimony of Callahan, La Boda, Roberson, Curp, and Hall, five of the replacement employees openly showed themselves, by conduct, if not solely by antiunion statements, to have manifested objective interests contrary to the Union's interest. The replacements wanted to keep their jobs and if the Union returned, consistent with the union taunts, they openly feared that they might well be replaced. That was their explicit fear expressed to President La Boda and Executive Vice President Callahan. They also asked how to get rid of the Union and the pickets.[13] The problem of the allegiance and sympathies of Mari Ann Rasmussen, however, remains.

I credit Respondent's testimony that, though she was interviewed as early as 10 a.m., Rasmussen was not hired as a permanent employee until about 1 p.m. on 9 January 1985. The subsequent 9 January meeting between Respondent and the Union, at which Respondent withdrew recognition, occurred about 2:30 p.m. Rasmussen, therefore, was employed no more than 2 hours (and perhaps as little as 1-1/2 hours) between the time she became a permanent replacement employee and the time that Attorney Bishop read the communication to the Union in which Respondent withdrew recognition and refused to bargain with the Union.

It is true that La Boda testified that from the beginning of their employment, the replacements asked him how to get rid of the Union and how to get rid of the pickets. Even in the absence of explicit employee corroboration, and contrary to the General Counsel's argument (Br. at 10–12), I have credited his testimony. I note, however, that on cross-examination, aside from the vehement antiunion attitudes of replacements Curp and Hall, La Boda could not recall which employees said certain things and, particularly, when they uttered their antiunion remarks. This cross-examination resulted from La Boda's and Callahan's emphatic testimony that the employees' antiunion statements all occurred before 9 January 1985. Of course, Rasmussen was not hired until after noon on 9 January 1985. I must conclude from Callahan's and La Boda's insistent testimony, that various employees' statements against the Union occurred before 9 January and thus flowed from replacements other than Rasmussen, who was not hired until after noon on 9 January.

Rasmussen did not testify at the hearing nor did any testimony, from any source, bear on her union attitude. The only record remotely related to Rasmussens' union sentiments occurred in the cross-examination of replacement of John Roberson. Roberson testified that the replacement employees told Vice President Callahan on 7 and 8 January of the taunts of the pickets (concerning the replacements' status), but he placed Rasmussen as among the employees making these statements at that time. If Rasmussen was present, Roberson's testimony that these replacement employee meetings with Respondent occurred on 7 and 8 January must manifestly be incorrect. If his recollection that Rasmussen was present was accurate, then these replacement employee conversations with Callahan, to the extent they relate to Rasmussen's union attitudes, occurred either after 9 January (in which case they would be legally irrelevant) or they could have occurred in the crucial 2-hour period between the time of her 9 January hiring and the time Bishop, about 2:30 p.m., read the withdrawal of recognition to the Union on 9 January.

Although I believe that the credited testimony of Respondent's supervisors and the testimony and conduct of three replacement employees demonstrate objective antiunion attitudes of all employees, see Roza Watch Corp., supra, 249 NLRB at 284, I cannot say that there is any evidence in the record, much less evidence that meets the mandated higher legal test of "clear, cogent and convincing," NLRB v. Pennco, Inc., 684 F.2d 340, 342 (6th Cir. 1982), cert. denied 459 U.S. 994 (1982), NLRB v. Tragniew, Inc., above, to show that Rasmussen, in this very brief 2-hour period, demonstrated or expressed an antiunion position, or that Respondent's supervisors, based on any objective evidence, reasonably believed she held an antiunion position.

Because of this failure of proof, and notwithstanding that Rasmussen on 9 January may have crossed a hostile picket line or may have expressed anti-Union sentiments in the irrelevant period after the witdrawal of recognition, Odd Fellows Rebekah Home, 232 NLRB at 144; NLRB v. Pennco, Inc., above, I conclude that Respondent was in possession, at or about 2:30 p.m. on 9 January 1985 (when it withdrew recognition from the Union and thereafter refused to bargain with it) of objective, convincing evidence that, at most, five of the six permanent replacements were antiunion. In these circumstances, at the time it withdrew recognition, Respondent was thus in possession of objective evidence that exactly 5 of the 12, legally relevant members of the appropriate unit were antiunion. NLRB v. Crimptex, Inc., above; NLRB v. Windham Memorial Hospital, above; see Stormor, Inc., above. Such circumstances constrain me to conclude, as I do, that Respondent has thus failed to adduce any evidence, much less "clear, cogent and convincing evidence," to rebut the presumption of the Union's continued majority status by establishing either the Union's actual loss of majority or objective evidence forming a reasonable basis for a good-faith doubt of majority status as required by the Board, Odd Fellows Rebekah Home, above at 145; and the courts of appeal, NLRB v. Pennco, Inc., supra at 717; Whisper Soft Mills v. NLRB, above at 1381.

[12] Again, we are no longer dealing with the other Pennco presumption (of the union's sympathy of replacements).

[13] Even in the absence of corroboration by Curp and Hall, I have credited Callahan and La Boda that these employees made statements against the Union before the 9 January withdrawal of recognition. More important, I find that the totality of replacement employee conduct, in the face of taunts from a hostile union picket line before withdrawal of recognition can, and does, demonstrate "clear, cogent and convincing evidence" to support Respondent's heavy rebutting burden of proof. Pennco, Inc., 250 NLRB at 717. Nonetheless, because the replacements' conduct is a fact, just as antiunion statements are facts, I have drawn the inference from their conduct that they were antiunion. In this regard, therefore, the General Counsel's citation of Forbidden City Restaurant, 265 NLRB 409 (1982), is rendered distinguishable. There, supervisors' unsupported statements regarding the sympathies of unnamed employees comprising one-half the unit were held insufficient to support the employer's burden. The rule is that "at least 50 percent of the unit employees [must] have voluntarily expressed antiunion sentiments [in order to] raise a reasonable doubt regarding the Union's continuing majority status." Forbidden City Restaurant, above at 411. There is language in Stormor, Inc., supra, 268 NLRB at 867, cited by Respondent, which, at first blush, is inconsistent with the 50-percent rule. Stormor, Inc., is distinguishable on its facts, the most significant of which are that in Stormor, Inc., unlike the instant case, the number of replacements together with returned strikers far exceeded the number of striking employees; and the Stormor unit exceeded 100 employees. See below.

Here, Respondent's precipitate withdrawal of recognition occurred at a time when it still had insufficient evidentiary ammunition to support an assault on the Union's presumptive status. Thus, Respondent's citation of Stormor, Inc., 268 NLRB 860, does not support a contrary position. There, repudiation of the Union by merely 20 percent of the nonstriking employees was coupled with testimony that other groups of permanent replacements and nonstrikers repudiated the Union. This testimony rebutted both the Pennco ratio presumption and the presumption of majority status. Here, the ratio presumption has been effectively rebutted. The record shows that, at most, 5 of the 12 unit employees were antiunion. Thus, Respondent has failed to support the second wing of its rebutting burden—loss of actual majority.

The remaining question is Respondent's good-faith doubt. Here, unlike Stormor, Inc., supra, the unit is not 155 but merely 12 employees. Here, Respondent had precise knowledge of the replacements' union attitudes in this small unit. Here, unlike Stormor, Inc., there is no 3-1/2-month period of violence against which to measure the sympathies of otherwise silent striker replacements. Most important, here, unlike Stormor, replacements and nonstrikers did not exceed the number of strikers. Rather, here, Respondent had good, objective reason to believe that its five replacements appeared to be antiunion; that the six strikers were emphatically prounion; and that it knew nothing of Rasmussen's position. The record shows nothing of any Rasmussen confrontation with pickets, picket line taunts, or any other circumstantial evidence from which it could infer her attitude. If Respondent argues (Br. at 31) that the Board should adopt the presumption that striker replacements should be ipso facto presumed to not support the Union, National Car Rental Systems v. NLRB, 549 F.2d 1203 (8th Cir. 1979), Soule Glass Co. v. NLRB, 652 F.2d 1055 (1st Cir. 1981), such argument must be addressed to the Board. Such argument, I have noted, is academic here, since the ratio presumption has been rebutted. Here, the pivotal question is whether Respondent, in a small unit, can prove good-faith doubt when it has actual knowledge of the sympathies of only a minority and is not aware, by hearsay or otherwise, of the sympathies of a majority. Because of the Board's and courts' declarations concerning the policy underpinnings of the strength of the presumption of majority status, I hold that it may not.

I am, therefore, further constrained to conclude (a) that Respondent failed to rebut this presumption of the Union's majority status: that the presumption of continuing majority remains intact; that on 9 January 1985, Respondent withdrew recognition of the Union as the certified statutory representative in the above-appropriate unit at a time when it did not have any objective evidence forming a reasonable basis of a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status; (b) that on January 1985, by withdrawing recognition of, and refusing to bargain with, the Union, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act; and (c) that the economic strike of 2 January 1985, by this very act, was converted into an unfair labor practice strike on 9 January 1985 because the unlawful withdrawal of recognition had the effect, as alleged, of prolonging the strike, which remains in effect as of the hearing. Bay Area-Los Angeles Express, 275 NLRB 1063 (1985); Sanderson Farms, 271 NLRB 1481 (1984).[14]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Tube Craft, Inc., Respondent, is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. United Steelworkers of America, District 28, and Local 8703, United Steelworkers of America are now, and each of them has been, at all material times, a labor organization or labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following unit of Respondent's employees constitutes a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All clerical employees excluding confidential employees and professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act and all other employees of Respondent employed at its Cleveland, Ohio plant.

4. Respondent has failed to prove that at any material time on and after 9 January 1985, the Union, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, is not the exclusive representative in that unit for the purposes of collective bargaining

[14] As the Board observed in Sanderson Farms, above at 1481, what had previously been a mere economic strike to > force the Respondent to agree to economic terms was of necessity converted to a strike to force the Respondent to grant to the Union the recognition to which it was entitled. None of the issues facing the parties could be resolved in any way absent the Respondent's recognition to the Union. Therefore, we conclude that the strike became unfair labor practice strike on 9 August when the Respondent withdrew recognition and informed the Union that it was unilaterally changing wages. We shall, accordingly, order the Respondent to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers on their unconditional offer to return to work.

with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment; or that the basis of clear, cogent, and convincing evidence, entertained a good-faith doubt of the Union's representative status.

5. Respondent, by withdrawing recognition and thereafter refusing to bargain with the Union in the above-appropriate unit, on 9 January 1985 violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. By engaging in the unfair labor practices described above in paragraph 5, Respondent prolonged the economic strike in which the Union engaged, commencing 2 January 1985, and converted the strike, commencing 9 January 1985, into an unfair labor practice strike.

7. The unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has committed violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act, including that Respondent, on the Union's request, recognize and bargain with the Union in good faith regarding the appropriate above-described unit, and to post the appropriate notice. Having found that the 2 January economic strike was converted on 9 January 1985 into an unfair practice strike, I shall recommend to place the unfair labor practice strikers in a position protected by the Act should they make an unconditional offer to return to work. Such a protected position must be consistent with my conclusions, above, that by 9 January, all six strikers, then engaged in a mere economic strike, had been permanently replaced. Industrial Workers Local 289 v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 868 fn. 23 (1973). Nevertheless, any such striker, for whom there is no immediate employment because the replacement is in situ shall be placed on a preferential hiring list. See Whisper Soft Mills, 267 NLRB 813, 819 (1983), enfd. 577 F.2d 805 (1978). On departure of the permanent replacements, the strikers, if there be vacancies, shall be hired before others. NLRB v. Crimptex, Inc., supra, 517 F.2d at 503-504; NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., above. Backpay shall be computed in the manner as set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On June 27, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Michael O. Miller issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel and the Charging Party each filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief. The Respondent filed an answering brief to the cross-exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision[1] and the record in light of the exceptions, cross-exceptions, and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by coercively interrogating employees concerning union activity, by threatening employees with discharge because of union activity, by prohibiting laid-off employees from engaging in union activity in nonwork areas, and by distributing procompany insignia in coercive circumstances, but did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by the actions it took with respect to a layoff of one-third of its work force. For the reasons set forth below, we disagree with several of the judge's findings.

1. The Respondent, Schwartz Manufacturing Company, was primarily engaged in the manufacture, assembly, and nonretail sale and distribution of front-end loaders attachable to tractors. Ninety percent of the Respondent's sales were to Ford Motor Corporation. Ford communicated its orders to Schwartz through monthly Ford reports and periodic releases. In addition, the Respondent's president, Harold Magowan, testified that contact was made with Ford at least once a week. The Ford report received late in each month specified for the current and following 3 months the firm number of loaders and other products Ford had committed to purchase and predicted possible orders for 4 additional months. The Respondent generally based its manpower needs on the 4-month "firm period" Ford was committed to pay for, after which the Respondent regarded the Ford reports as speculative. Ford directed Schwartz to ship loaders by means of releases. Although actual release orders in a given month might vary from commitments in the monthly reports, by year's end Ford generally sought to "net in" undershipments or to "net out" overshipments.

In late May 1985[3] Magowan informed employees of a vacation plant shutdown scheduled for early July and indicated the possibility of additional summer shutdowns. About the same time Plant Manager Robert Benage told employees that business looked good throughout the summer and fall. Benage stated he did not foresee any layoffs but would attempt to give employees 2 weeks' notice of any layoff.[4] Although there was no union organizational activity at the time, Benage also said that "there wouldn't be any union at Schwartz, that it wasn't going to be allowed."

Employees began to discuss unionization during mid-June after management indicated that it did not intend to increase wages. On June 20 and 25, Assembly Foreman Denny Campbell interrogated two assemblers concerning union activity, particularly that of day-shift union activist Don Rol. Also on June 25 another assembler overheard Campbell tell an employee that if Don Rol were in his department he would fire him. Campbell's explanation associated Rol's union activity with the statement overheard. We affirm the judge's finding that Campbell's interrogations and threat violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Sometime during the third week in June the Respondent received the monthly Ford report. By June the Respondent had substantially overshipped loaders to Ford. In addition, its monthly average of loaders from January through June had been approximately 500 loaders whereas Ford's June

[1] On September 16, 1986, the Charging Party filed a motion to partially withdraw charge and to withdraw petition in Case 18–RC–13822. By Order dated September 29, 1986, the Board granted the General Counsel's September 18, 1986 contingent motion in support of the Charging Party's motion, thereby dismissing the 8(a)(5) allegations of the complaint and severing Case 18–RC–13822 from this proceeding. Accordingly, this Decision and Order involves no consideration of those portions of the judge's decision relating to the withdrawn proceedings.

[2] The Respondent, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] All dates are in 1985 unless otherwise indicated.

[4] The Respondent had instituted a series of cumulative layoffs during the summer and early fall months of 1984. On July 28, 1984, 18 employees were laid off for between 1 and 3 months. On August 31, 1984, 11 different employees and 1 employee recalled from the July layoff were laid off for between 6 weeks and 4 months. On September 20, 1984, 18 different employees were laid off for between 1 and 6 months. On September 28, 1984, four additional employees were laid off for between 2 weeks and 5 months.

report reflected a drop to about 350 loaders for August.

On Thursday, July 18, Benage announced to employees that there would be a 1-week shutdown in early August because of a reduction in Ford's commitments for August. He also said that Ford business for the final quarter of the calendar year appeared to be picking up. He then expressed awareness of union activity and told the employees that the Company did not want or need a union.

On Friday, July 19, the Respondent's production control manager told Magowan that the Respondent had received few Ford releases for July. Thereafter, the Respondent's sales liaison confirmed that Ford would not send any more July releases and was in the process of "netting out" overshipments but would allow early shipments for August commitments.

On Saturday, July 20, 40 or more employees attended a union meeting. Volunteers were solicited to serve on the Schwartz Workers Organizing Committee (SWOC). On Monday, July 22, the day-shift members of the organizing committee decided to wear buttons and distribute leaflets on Wednesday, July 24.

A few day-shift employees wore organizing buttons to work for the first time on Tuesday, July 23. Early that morning Benage gave employees assurances in the face of a rumor concerning an additional shutdown in September. He stated "that the fall looked very good, that, you know we'd be building up for their fall requirements." At a regular management production meeting later that same day Benage noted Ford's reduced commitments for August. Foremen were directed to select a skeleton crew for the scheduled 1-week August shutdown. Magowan cautioned that "netting out" could require additional shutdowns.

After Tuesday's production meeting Magowan received the July Ford report, which he described as "status quo."[5] After reviewing the July report Magowan called Ford's representative, Grant Ventzke, who confirmed that Ford would commence "netting out" overshipments. According to Magowan's credited testimony, Ventzke stated that a survey of Ford's distribution points and dealers indicated that the "bubble has burst," business was flat, warehouses were full, and the Respondent's shipments would have to be aligned with the requirements of the Ford plan over the next several months.

On Wednesday, July 24, the Schwartz Workers Organizing Committee (SWOC) went public as planned. Several additional day-shift employees wore SWOC buttons to work and posted and distributed a lengthy flyer detailing organizational rights.

Magowan testified that "during the day of the 24th it became apparent to me, after reviewing the shippers and so on that probably a layoff was going to be inevitable. And it was probably during the morning of the 24th, early." That morning Magowan told Benage that "we ought to be looking at the framework of a layoff" and assessing its impact on the Respondent's overall operation. On Wednesday afternoon Benage met with Foremen Stettnichs and Campbell to select specific employees for layoff. Based on Ford's "netting out" and the July Ford report, Benage calculated a 350-loader-per-month production average for August through October. Benage testified that he followed a procedure and formula employed for the previous year's layoffs to determine requisite manpower reductions. On Thursday, July 25, final details of the layoff were approved.

At Thursday's planned lunchtime organizing meeting, employees Rol and Gross contradicted Benage's July 18 statements concerning a competitor's lower wage scales. Foreman Stettnichs was present.[6]

At the end of Thursday's day shift Benage called employees to a meeting that he acknowledged to be "about the Union." He told employees the Respondent did not want or need a union. He suggested that any problems could be worked out on a one-to-one basis between the employees and management. He noted the possibility of strikes, the risks of fines or permanent replacement, and the concession bargaining occurring at a unionized facility in the area.

Benage then announced his decision to change from the planned shutdown to a layoff because, he stated, some employees had complained about financial difficulties that the general 1-week shutdown would cause. He also referred to the July report and Ford's intention to "net out," asserted that absent a layoff there would be additional fall shutdowns, and noted that this layoff like prior ones would be by seniority, department, and shift, with recall when work picked up.

[5] In fact, the July Ford report increased purchase commitments over those of the June report. Compared with the 4-month "firm" period figures in the June report, the July report showed: for July, small loader purchase commitments remaining constant at 480, and large loader commitments increasing by 30 (from 45 to 75); for August, commitment for small loaders increasing by 30 (from 260 to 290) and large loaders unchanged at 80; and, for September, commitments for both small and large loaders unchanged (at 265 and 80, respectively). The July report also showed the number of loaders overshipped decreasing by 10 (259 in June, 249 in July). (The judge's decision indicates that the number of loaders overshipped was 281 in June and 259 in July, but an independent reading of the record shows the figures to be 259 and 249, respectively.)

[6] We find it unnecessary to decide whether Foreman Campbell unlawfully threatened employee Marlis Anderson on July 25. In light of our agreement with the judge that Campbell unlawfully threatened to discharge employee Don Rol, we conclude that the finding of any additional violation based on Campbell's conversation with Anderson would be cumulative and would not materially affect our remedial Order.

Thursday night and Friday morning SWOC conducted protest rallies. Employees voted overwhelmingly in favor of plantwide shutdowns instead of selected layoffs. Petitions and vote results were presented to and rejected by Benage. On late Friday, July 26, the Respondent posted a list of the laid-off employees by department and shift. Nine employees were laid off contrary to their seniority in their departments.[7] The layoff notice stated: "Due to the economy (or lack of orders), there will be a layoff until orders pick up . . . ."

After the posting a large group of employees marched through office hallways protesting the layoff. Union organizer Robert Kingsley entered Benage's office and angrily told Benage that the layoff decision was discriminatory, and unfair labor practice charges would be filed. Meanwhile, employees chanted union support and demanded recognition of their vote.

On Saturday, July 27, Magowan drafted a letter that was sent out to all laid-off employees on Monday under Benage's signature. The letter stated that due to the lack of foreseeable improvement in market conditions, the employees' layoff would be classified as permanent. About the same time, laid-off employees received personnel "change" notices that they had been "Discharged/Terminated . . . due to economic conditions." The Respondent had no practice of laying off employees permanently. Also, Benage acknowledged the employees' retention of recall rights.

On July 29 night-shift employees Lee Wigton, Greg DeVaney, and Steve Johanssen reported to work wearing their SWOC buttons. Benage greeted them at the door and asked DeVaney and Johanssen whether they had been laid off. When they replied that they had not, Benage asked for their names and departments. Foremen Stettnichs and Campbell, grinning, confronted Wigton, asking him, "What are you doing here, Lee? You're laid off." The foremen's grins turned to frowns when Wigton told them he was not on the layoff list, and they proceeded to check the list.

On August 8, eight of the laid-off employees were recalled with full backpay and eight other employees with less overall plant seniority were permanently laid off and issued similar termination notices. Management explained that "the recent layoffs were not accomplished in the fairest possible manner consistent with both seniority and necessary operating considerations" and that its substitution was an attempt to minimize the possibility of litigation.

The Ford report for August shows "netting out" of 119 small loaders and an increase of 17 commitments for large loaders. The September Ford report reflects that 32 more small loaders were "netted out," and large loader commitments increased by 2. At this point, the Respondent was overshipped by approximately 58 small and 59 large loaders for a total of 117 overshipments. The October Ford report shows the Respondent was undershipped by 69 small loaders but remained overshipped by 37 large loaders. Magowan testified that in late October the Respondent asked Ford to allow late shipments because the Respondent was unsure it could completely satisfy Ford's November commitments. The November Ford report reflected an increase in small loader undershipments from 69 to 211 and a reduction in large loader overshipments from 37 to 12. The record indicates that by December the Respondent was undershipped by a total of approximately 300 loaders.

The representation election was conducted on October 29. The Respondent received a substantial number of releases from Ford during the second week of November. Magowan testified that the Respondent had insufficient inventory to meet the increased demand. Effective November 18, the Respondent recalled the laid-off employees. When orders again increased during the second week of December the Respondent hired an additional 25 employees.

The record indicates that, during the period of layoffs in 1984, when the 4-month average of Ford firm commitments decreased, the Respondent's complement of employees also decreased. When commitments increased again so did the Respondent's complement of employees. The record indicates that from April 1985 through January 1986 there was a steady rise in average 4-month commitments by Ford for total loaders. During the 1985 layoff period, even when the 4-month average Ford firm commitments were rising the employee complement did not change. It remained at a depressed level until 3 months later when employees were recalled in November after the representation election. During this 3-month layoff period a total of 102 loaders were "netted out" in August, a total of 30 loaders were "netted out" in September, and a total of 149 loaders were "netted out" in October. By October, the Respondent had more than "netted out" the 249 overshipments present in July.

[7] The employees selected out of seniority were Ed Gross, Don Rol, Dale Clyde, Ed Blair, Dennis Reifers, Charles Bauerle, Jan Johnson, John DenBoer, and Craig Latterell. All except Johnson and Latterell were members of the organizing committee from the day shift. Gross, Rol, and Blair attended the Union's initial organizing meeting on June 20. Gross, Rol, Blair, Clyde, and Reifers wore organizing buttons on July 24.

The Respondent did not recall employees until November 18 when it was undershipped by a total of approximately 200 loaders.

Applying Wright Line,[8] the judge found that the General Counsel established a prima facie case demonstrating that retaliatory union animus contributed to the layoff decision. The judge then analyzed the sufficiency of the Respondent's business justifications for its actions and found that the Respondent had demonstrated that it would have laid off employees and notified them that their layoff was permanent even in the absence of union activity. We disagree with the judge's analysis. We find that the reasons advanced by the Respondent for its actions were pretextual.

We agree that the General Counsel made a prima facie showing that the Respondent aborted its plant shutdown plans and decided to lay off one-third of its work force in order to discourage recently manifested employee support for union representation. It is uncontroverted that the Respondent was aware of and opposed to unionization. Even prior to the organizing campaign, Benage told employees that the Respondent would not allow a union. The Respondent's subsequent unfair labor practices demonstrated both adamant opposition to the Union's campaign and a willingness to defeat it through unlawful means.

The timing and abruptness of the layoff decision further support an inference of illegal motivation. The layoff announcement occurred the day after SWOC went public with buttons and campaign literature and within a few hours of a union meeting discrediting management. It occurred suddenly and without notice, despite a prior pledge by Benage to attempt to give 2 weeks' notice to employees. It represented a marked departure from management's earlier announced plans to meet its economic and overproduction problems with a 1-week shutdown. Furthermore, the Respondent acknowledged making the layoff announcement only after detailed explication of its antiunion sentiment in a meeting called "about the Union." The import of the message was clear: the layoff was in retaliation for union activity.

The Respondent primarily relies on the July Ford report and confirmation of Ford's plans to "net out" overshipments as business justification for the layoff. We reject this defense. The Respondent has failed to show that it received and relied on any adverse business information or unfavorable change in economic position not already known or suspected at the time it planned for its scheduled 1-week shutdown in August. It has also failed to prove that it was waiting for further confirmation of adverse information before deciding to switch from a shutdown to a layoff. Thus, on July 18 the Respondent announced and gave 2 weeks' advance notice of the August shutdown and explained that the shutdown was necessary because of the reduction of orders in Ford's June program. On July 19 Magowan was apprised that Ford sent few July releases. Thereafter, his subordinates confirmed that Ford would "net out" overshipments. Nevertheless, at the production meeting on Tuesday, July 23, management continued to plan for an August shutdown. There is no evidence that management discussed the alternative of a layoff. Moreover, early Tuesday morning the Respondent's plant manager told employees that rumors of a September shutdown were unfounded, noting that the fall "looked very good."

Suddenly plans changed. What happened between Tuesday morning and Thursday afternoon to justify the abrupt change in plans from a scheduled temporary shutdown to an unexpected layoff? Apart from intensified union activity, the only intervening events were receipt of the July Ford report and a phone call made on the Respondent's initiative confirming that Ford would "net out" overshipments. Neither the phone call nor the July Ford report imparted any new or unanticipated economic information. They merely reaffirmed business information considered and presumably taken into account previously at the Tuesday morning production meeting discussion of shutdown plans. In particular, the July report was strikingly similar to the June report throughout the "firm period" and, in fact, reflected an increase in purchase commitments.

The pretextual nature of the Respondent's economic defense is further underscored by the Respondent's inconsistency in explaining its layoff decision. Employees credibly testified that Benage attributed the layoff decision to expressions of employee concern about the financial hardships of a shutdown. Although Benage referred to expressions of concern by three named employees, his testimony fails to disclose that he told them he would consider a layoff instead of a shutdown. In addition, his purported sensitivity to these employees' complaints contrasts sharply with his apparent indifference to employees' overwhelming post-layoff expression of a preference for a shutdown vis-a-vis a layoff, to say nothing of his and his foremen's expressions of surprise and consternation after they discovered that open union supporters had survived the layoff.

Finally, the Respondent failed to act consistently with its stated policy that this layoff, like prior ones, would be effectuated by seniority, department, and shift. Its original layoff selection included several open and active day-shift members of the organizing committee instead of certain night-shift employees with less seniority. Although perhaps not sufficient to establish an absolute rule for the Respondent's layoffs, there is ample evidence that, in past layoffs, less senior night-shift employees had been laid off first.

The Respondent explains its sudden change of plans as a legitimate response to deteriorating economic conditions, allegedly consistent with the Respondent's own past practice. We dispute neither the existence of economic problems nor the notion that the Respondent could have responded to those problems by laying off a substantial number of employees, as it had done only a year earlier. In spite of so recent and substantial a past practice and the alleged cost advantages of layoffs vis-a-vis shutdowns, however, there is no evidence whatsoever that the Respondent considered layoff even as a contingent alternative to the planned shutdown until 2 days before implementing a layoff. Furthermore, the Respondent belied reliance on any past practice of economically motivated layoffs by deviating from the 1984 layoff pattern in three significant ways: (1) it included in the initial layoff nine day-shift employees whose seniority would have entitled them to retain their jobs; (2) it took the unprecedented step of converting all affected employees to permanent layoff status; and (3) even after completion of the "netting out" process, it waited until it was in a substantially undershipped position before recalling all laid-off employees at once on November 18, after the representation election.

Based on the foregoing, we conclude that the General Counsel established a prima facie case of antiunion discrimination and that the Respondent failed to demonstrate that its sudden change from a scheduled 1-week shutdown to a layoff of one-third of its work force would have taken place even absent the Union's organizing campaign. Accordingly, we find that the July 26 layoff violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.[9] In addition, since the Respondent's August 8 substitution layoff was merely a continuation of the initial layoff and was effectuated for the same unlawful discriminatory reasons (although redressing the burden initially placed on day-shift employees), we likewise find that such substitution violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

We also find contrary to the judge that the Respondent unlawfully converted the temporary layoff to permanent layoff or discharge. The difference between permanent layoff and discharge does not matter here. In either instance it is clear that the July 29 permanent layoff letter and July 30 and August 8 personnel notices represented an adverse change in laid-off employees' employment status. Our finding of unlawful discrimination is based on all evidence of discriminatory motivation underlying the original layoff decision as set forth above. In addition, we rely on the timing of the personnel notices that were prepared and issued shortly after the July 26 employee protests and rallies. Furthermore, although the Respondent had previously used layoffs to compensate for seasonal slack periods, it had no practice of laying off employees permanently. In sum, we conclude that the Respondent's change of the temporary layoff to permanent layoff or discharge violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

2. On August 1 Benage excluded laid-off employees Rol and Hallem from the lunchroom during the night-shift's break. Neither employee was engaged in a conversation or union activity at the time of their exclusion. Also, early one October morning prior to commencement of the day shift, Benage ordered laid-off employees Krueger and Miller to leave the employee lunchroom. Krueger and Miller had just completed distribution of union leaflets and were talking to fellow employees. The judge found that the first exclusion was lawful, but the second violated Section 8(a)(1).

We find that both incidents of exclusion violated Section 8(a)(1). There was no rule limiting laid-off employees' access prior to the Union's campaign. The Respondent then selectively denied access to known union activists on the advent of the Union's campaign in order to discourage employees' organizing activities. There is extensive evidence that both before and after these exclusions the Respondent tolerated other forms of nonunion access by individuals not scheduled to work. Both before and after the layoff, laid-off and former employees, friends, and relatives were allowed access to both work and nonwork areas.[10] [9] Apart from the planned shutdown for the first week of August, the Respondent failed to make any kind of record establishing if, when, or to what extent employees would have been laid off or the plant would have been shut down after July 26 for nondiscriminatory reasons. We find Benage's bald assertions to employees when announcing the layoff, that absent a layoff additional plant shutdowns would be necessary, to be insufficient to meet the Respondent's burden. We leave for compliance proceedings, the exact determination of amounts of backpay owing. The determination of backpay owed by the Respondent shall take into account any reduction in backpay due to the scheduled 1-week August shutdown.

[10] Assembler Ron Jensen testified, "I never really heard of a policy. It used to be an open door thing. If somebody wanted to come and see

Continued

In these circumstances, we conclude that the Respondent's unprecedented and disparate denial of access to leading union adherents during the height of the Union's organizing campaign and in a context tainted by other unlawful conduct was coercive of union activities. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent's denial of access violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. At the conclusion of an October 17 lunchroom meeting at which management urged employees not to vote for the Union, hats with company logo and "Vote No" buttons were brought into the lunchroom and distributed by a nonsupervisory employee. During the meeting management had encouraged the employees to take and wear the hats. Representatives of management were not present during the distribution process but were in the area outside the lunchroom when one of the first employees to leave exited.

The judge found that the Respondent's October 17 distribution of procompany insignia constituted 8(a)(1) coercion. We disagree. Unlike the cases relied on by the judge,[11] the evidence here fails to reveal either any direct involvement by supervisors in the distribution process or any evidence that the supervisors engaged in open surveillance of employees leaving the lunchroom.[12] Under these circumstances, we conclude that the central availability of procompany insignia, in the absence of supervisory involvement in the distribution process or other evidence that management pressured employees into making an observable choice or open acknowledgment concerning their campaign position, did not reasonably tend to interfere with employee rights under the Act. See Farah Mfg. Co., 204 NLRB 173 (1973); McDonald's, 214 NLRB 879 (1974); and Black Dot, Inc., 239 NLRB 929 (1978).[13]

AMENDED REMEDY

Inasmuch as all the employees found to have been discriminatorily laid off were subsequently reinstated no further reinstatement order is warranted. Inasmuch as discriminatees Charles Bauerle, Ed Blair, Dale Clyde, John DenBoer, Ed Gross, Jan Johnson, Craig Latterell, Dennis Reifers, and Don Rol were reinstated with full backpay, no further backpay order concerning them is warranted. Inasmuch as discriminatees Hiram Anderson, Steve Blair, Terry Bohnenkamp, Romeo Eagle Horse, Randolph Ekanger, Sharon Hallem, Robert Hoffman, Wesley Jaqua, Larry Krueger, Alan Lawrence, Dennis Lupkes, Mike McKee, John Miller, Arnold Peterson, Mike Sweir, Charles Temple, Richard VanMeveren, William Blair, Sheldon Bohms, Greg DeVaney, Mark Freese, Steve Johannsen, Doyle Schubert, Kevin Tjepkes, and Lee Wigton were reinstated but received no backpay for the period during which they were unlawfully laid off, we shall order the Respondent to make them whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them. The loss of earnings and benefits incurred by these employees as a result of the unlawfully motivated layoffs shall be determined as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[14]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Schwartz Manufacturing Company, Sioux Falls, South Dakota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating its employees in a coercive manner concerning their union membership, activi-

somebody, they'd just come and see them. Until this union activity came, then they started kicking them out." Jensen testified that prior to this change in policy management allowed his father-in-law to visit on the shop floor.

Assembler Marty Anderson testified that a couple of weeks before the hearing two retirees visited with employees and management in the assembly area. Anderson also testified that during a short 1985 layoff laid-off employee Terry Ingalls, accompanied by her nephew, was observed talking with another employee near the paint booth.

Craig Latterell testified that in the fall of 1985 an employee's father visited the lunchroom during break, Sharon Hallem visited there while laid off in 1984, and an assembler's girlfriend was seen there several times. Latterell observed Benage's October eviction of coworkers Miller and Krueger. Benage hollered, "Get out." This surprised Latterell who had "never seen [Benage] kick anybody out."

Finally, former employee Diana Enyeart testified that she frequently visited the shop and spoke with management after her 1984 layoff.

By contrast, Plant Manager Benage simply stated that he had asked a laid-off employee to leave plant premises prior to the August 1 exclusion

[12] The only evidence concerning the presence of management representatives outside the lunchroom when the employees left was the testimony of employee Fritz. Fritz testified that he was one of the first employees out the door at the end of the meeting and, when he left, he saw Management Representatives Miller, Benage, and Magowan outside the door. There is no evidence concerning what these individuals were doing or how far from the door they were when Fritz saw them. Based on this limited evidence, we find that it has been shown only that management representatives were somewhere outside the door when the first employee left the meeting and that it has not been shown how far from the door the management representatives were or whether they observed the employees, were engaged in conversation among themselves, or were involved in some other activity.

[13] We disavow the judge's suggestion that McDonald's has been implicitly overruled.

[14] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the July 26 and August 8 layoffs and/or discharges of the discriminatees listed in the amended remedy section of this decision and notify each of them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these layoffs and/or discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Sioux Falls South Dakota plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[15] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL O. MILLER, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard on 12 days between 14 January and 25 February 1986, in Sioux Falls, South Dakota, based on unfair labor practice charges filed by United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America (UE) (the Union) on 5 August and 13 November 1985[1] and a complaint and amended consolidated complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 18 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) on 3 October and 20 December, respectively. The complaint alleges that Schwartz Manufacturing Company (Respondent or Schwartz) violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by various statements and actions tending to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their statutory activities, and by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union. Respondent's timely filed answers deny the commission of any unfair labor practices. Consolidated for hearing with the complaints, pursuant to a Supplemental Decision and Order issued by the Acting Regional Director on 26 December, are certain challenges and Union-filed objections in the election in Case 18-RC-13822.

All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to examine and to cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel, the Union, and the Respondent.

Based on the entire record,[2] including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS AND THE UNION'S LABOR ORGANIZATION STATUS—PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Respondent is a Delaware corporation with an office and plant in Sioux Falls, South Dakota, where it is engaged in the manufacture, assembly, and nonretail sale and distribution of front-end loaders, mixer feeder boxes, and related equipment. Jurisdiction is not in dispute. The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find and conclude that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE ALLEGATIONS

A. Background

Schwartz is wholly owned by Amerequip Corporation; the acquisition from Chromalloy became effective 22 December 1983. Production at Schwartz' Sioux Falls facility was, at the relevant time, limited almost completely to various models and sizes of front-end loaders that are made to be attached to tractors. Schwartz sells approximately 90 percent of its front-end loader production directly to Ford Motor Corporation, Ford Tractor Operations (Ford); the remainder are manufactured to be attached to various other makes of tractors or to be sold to dealers and distributors.

Although its Sioux Falls facility is the only one involved in these proceedings, Schwartz also maintains a facility in Lester Prairie, Minnesota, which manufactures parts for the front-end loaders as well as other farm and truck equipment. In addition to the two Schwartz manufacturing facilities, Amerequip owns two other companies: Arps Manufacturing in New Holstein, Wisconsin, and Brantly Manufacturing in Frederick, Oklahoma. Schwartz in Lester Prairie and Arps in New Holstein are both unionized facilities. There was no collective-bargaining representative at the Sioux Falls facility when the instant organizational activity began.

B. The Facts—Chronologically

About 10 June, following an indication that management had ruled out any wage increases in the near future for its Sioux Falls employees, some employees began to discuss the possibility of union organization. Together, Donald Rol and Robert Hoffman decided to contact the Union. Hoffman called Robert Kingsley, the Union's field organizer, and a meeting was scheduled for 20 June at the Union's headquarters.

[1] All dates are 1985 unless otherwise specified.

[2] Respondent's unopposed motion to correct the record is granted and made a part of this record.

About 19 or 20 June, Rol approached Michael Sweir in the assembly department and asked Sweir to attend the meeting. Foreman Denny Campbell[3] observed this from across the shop and asked Sweir what Rol had been talking about. Campbell continued, "He was talking about a union, wasn't he?" Following Sweir's continued noncommittal responses, Campbell stated, "Anytime Don Rol goes in another department, he's talking about trouble."[4]

Approximately seven employees—Edwin Gross, Michael Sweir, Larry Cundy, Dave Swanson, Ed Blair, Sharon Hallem, and Don Rol—met with Kingsley on 20 June. They decided to canvass their departments to determine the extent of interest in organizing and to ask employees to come to the next meeting.

Before lunch about 25 June, assembler Marlis "Marty" Anderson was approached by Campbell. Campbell told her, "Unions are really bad . . . because they can cost you a lot of money in union dues . . . . If you have any problems you can't go to your foreman, you have to go through a union steward." He then asked her, "Has Don Rol talked to you?" Anderson asked why and about what and Campbell replied, "Well, Don Rol's nothing but a forty-year old radical that's running around causing a lot of trouble, talking about unions, and doesn't know what he's talking about."

After lunch, assembler Ed Gross overheard Campbell in conversation with shipping clerk Robert Deelstra. Campbell pointed out Don Rol, referred to him as "that fucker over there," and stated, "if he'd be in my department, he'd be a long ways down the road . . . I'd fire him . . . I'm glad it's Don Stettnichs' problem." Gross asked what Campbell meant and was told, "Rol over there, he's from one of them union people, trying to get the union in here . . . look at them people down there at Morrell's."[5]

A few days after his first conversation with Anderson, Campbell returned and told her, "Unions are no good, we don't need 'em in the shop."

A second meeting was held at the Union's office on 26 June, attended by all the employees who had attended the first meeting except for Swanson and Cundy. About 10 additional employees also attended, including Marlis Anderson. Night-shift welder Lee Wigton did not attend the meeting but, at the request of Rol and Hoffman, solicited the views of his fellow night-shift employees concerning the Union. Subsequent meetings were held on 1 July at Sharon Hallem's home and on 15 July at the home of Don Rol. At this latter meeting, plans were laid for a major rally to be held on Saturday, 20 July, at Sherman Park.

On the afternoon of 18 July, Plant Manager Robert Benage spoke to employees and their foremen. Benage told them that they could anticipate a 1-week shutdown in August, as they had had in July, because of low production requirements for that month. But, he added, they need not worry about October, November, and December as the Ford business appeared to be picking up. He then told the employees that he had heard rumors of union activity in the plant and stated that the Company did not want or need a union. He referred to the dues unionized employees would be expected to pay and told the employees that if the Company was organized, it could not be as competitive as Bushhog, which, with lower wage plants in Texas and Mexico, was seeking Ford's loader business. If Respondent lost its Ford business, Benage stated, it might just as well shut its doors. He then asked employees to report any threatening or harassing conduct by other employees and promised to take care of any such activities even if it meant discharging the guilty employees.

Late each month, Ford sends Schwartz its "Wholegoods Shipment Schedule," otherwise known as the Ford report. By that report, Ford obligates itself to purchase a given number of loaders over the next 4 months (although deliveries may be accelerated or postponed from one month to another) and predicts possible orders for 4 additional months. Ford authorizes Schwartz to ship the completed loaders, either to warehouses or directly to dealers and distributors, by means of releases. At some times during the year, Schwartz has shipped fewer loaders than Ford has scheduled to that date, a condition known as "undershipped." On other occasions, Schwartz' shipments (based on releases) may actually be ahead of Ford's commitments or "overshipped." By the end of each calendar year, Ford generally seeks to bring the schedule and the shipments into balance either by "Netting in," i.e., increasing their commitments, or by "netting out," i.e., reducing the number of releases.

On Friday, 19 July, Scott Jones, Respondent's production control manager, was advised that Ford would not be furnishing any more releases for July but would allow Respondent to begin shipping some of the loaders under its August commitments. He also learned that Ford intended to "net out" over the next several months. At that point in time, according to the most recently received Ford report, that of June, Respondent was overshipped to Ford by 229 small loaders and 52 large loaders. "Netting out" would mean the reduction in shipments to Ford (and ultimately a reduction in production by this many loadrs. In the period of January through June 1985, Respondent had shipped an average of approximately 200 large loaders and 360 small loaders to Ford each month.[6] In July, Respondent shipped approximately 459 small loaders and 84 large loaders to Ford. Pursuant to the June Ford report, Ford's commitment for August was only 260 small and 80 large loaders some of which had already been shipped in July; its September commitment was for 265 small and 80 large loaders. At least a portion of the "netting out" would apply against these reduced obligations.

[3] Respondent has admitted that Campbell is a statutory supervisor.

[4] The complaint alleges the foregoing conversation as comprising unlawful interrogation occurring about 20 June. Sweir, however, placed this conversation as having occurred on 19 July. The context of his testimony, indicating that Rol's conversation was his first knowledge of union activity, and the fact that he attended the 20 June union meeting establish that Sweir misstated the month.

[5] Campbell denied making inquiries concerning union activity or suggesting that Rol was making trouble and claimed that he only asked Sweir, "If Don Rol is down there talking to you, how can you get your work done?" Noting the relatively relaxed atmosphere in the plant concerning conversations between employees, the similarity between this statement and others attributed to Campbell, and the demeanor of the witnesses, I credit Sweir.

Campbell admitted that he had a conversation with Anderson concerning his views on the Union wherein, after Anderson suggested that he talk to Don Rol, he asked, "Why would I want to talk to Don Rol? He's a forty-year old kid." He denied interrogating Anderson or threatening to discharge Rol. His denial of the conversation with Deelstra and Gross was corroborated by Deelstra. However, their denials were less convincing than the affirmative testimony of Gross and Anderson. In particular, I find Campbell's explanation of why he could not have had the conversation with Deelstra, a statement to the effect that if he had wanted to fire Rol, he had the authority to do so and would not therefore have had to suggest that Rol's supervisor should fire him, unconvincing. Campbell's possession of general supervisory authority over Rol in no way negates the possibility that he might have suggested that his discharge would be a good idea. Similarly, I find Deelstra's denial of the alleged conversation unconvincing; when he was asked on direct examination whether such a conversation had taken place, he answered, "Not really." Although the General Counsel, on cross-examination, elicited a broader denial, I conclude that his answer on direct is indicative of an effort to avoid directly answering the question. Finally, I note the similar conversation attributed to Campbell by employee Michael Sweir, supra.

Jones advised Harold "Skip" Magowan, Schwartz' president, of the business conditions. Magowan decided to await receipt of the July Ford report, due shortly, before taking any action.

On the afternoon of Saturday, 20 July, a union meeting attended by 40 or more employees was held at Sherman Park in Sioux Falls. Sharon Hallem, Ed Gross, Lee Wigton, Doyle Schubert, Steve Johannsen, Don Rol, Robert Hoffman, Ed Blair, Dan Kirkpatrick, and Merritt Montgomery addressed the group regarding why they supported the Union. Volunteers were solicited to serve on the Schwartz Workers Organizing Committee (SWOC); Gross, Hallem, Rol, Wigton, Hoffman, Ed Blair, Marlis Anderson, Dale Clyde, Wesley Jaqua, Dan Kirkpatrick, Steve Johannsen, Donald Juhnke, John DenBoer, Merritt Montgomery, Charles Bauerle, Teresa Ingalls, Dennis Reifers, Greg DeVaney, Harlan Kruse, John Miller, Kevin T. Jepkes, Mark Freese, Doyle Schubert, Steven Noonan, and Sheldon Bohms volunteered.

The day-shift members of the organizing committee met again on Monday, 22 July, to plan the week's activities. They decided that the organizing committee would go public on Wednesday, 24 July, by wearing SWOC buttons and by distributing a flyer setting forth the employees' legal rights with respect to organizational activities. It was further decided that a meeting would be held on Thursday, 25 July, in the lunchroom, to refute Benage's statements concerning Bushhog, Respondent's competitor.

At the start of the day shift on Tuesday, 23 July, Benage met with the employees to squelch a rumor concerning future plant shutdowns. He stressed, somewhat forcefully, that although there would be a 1-week shutdown in August as a result of the June Ford report, the fall season looked good and no shutdown was planned for September.

Respondent's management, including its foremen, regularly hold production meetings on Tuesday and Thursday mornings of each week. In the production meeting of Tuesday, 23 July, Benage noted the drop in Ford commitments, as reflected in the June Ford report, from approximately 500 loaders per month to about 350. Magowan cautioned that the Ford report in conjunction with advice from Ford that it would begin in "netting out" indicated the possibility of additional shutdowns through the summer. Benage instructed the foremen to select a skeleton crew to work during the August shutdown.

Among those present at the Tuesday production meeting was John Lindner, fabrication department leadman, and, at that time, acting foreman in place of Ron Hofer. Lindner was told to select three employees from his department for the skeleton crew and, later that afternoon or the following morning, Lindner reported to Benage that he had made his selections. Critical to their arguments with respect to the timing of the layoff decision are the General Counsel's and the Union's contentions that this production meeting took place on Thursday morning, 25 July, rather than Tuesday, 23 July. To support this contention they rely primarily on Lindner's testimony to that effect. Reliance is also placed on the testimony of Dennis Reifers, who recalled that his foreman, Campbell, asked him on Thursday afternoon to work during the August shutdown, and that of Ed Gross and Steve Johannsen, to whom Lindner subsequently (on 3 August) expressed his surprise at the timing of the layoff announcement.

Although I am convinced that John Lindner made every effort to testify honestly and accurately regarding all matters about which he was interrogated, I am equally convinced that his testimony concerning the date of this meeting was in error. In reaching this conclusion, I note that Lindner placed this meeting in the last week in July in response to a leading question; he appeared not to independently recall the week in which it occurred. More importantly, he testified with reasonable certainty that Scott Jones, the production control manager, was at the meeting. Jones, however, attended the Tuesday meeting but did not attend any meeting on Thursday; he was in Minneapolis attending a computer training course on that day. His testimony is corroborated by the expense voucher of Keith Brunsting, Respondent's controller. That voucher indicates that Jones traveled to Minneapolis with Brunsting in the latter's private automobile. Attached to the voucher is a receipt indicating meals purchased for two people. I note further, in connection with this credibility resolution, that Don Rol testified that Stettnichs asked him to work on the skeleton crew for the August shutdown "several days before the announcement on Thursday, the 25th, that there would be a layoff." This is some further evidence that the foremen were directed to select the skeleton crew, and the employees for that crew were selected, before Thursday, 25 July.

On that Tuesday, but after the above-described production meeting, Magowan received the July Ford report, setting forth Ford's commitment for loaders for July through October. According to that report, Ford's commitment was for 480 small loaders and 75 large loaders in July (already shipped), 290 small loaders and 80 large loaders in August (a slight improvement over the June report), 265 small loaders and 80 large loaders in September, and 435 small loaders and 145 large loaders in October. The report also showed that Schwartz remained overshipped by 228 small and 31 large loaders as of July. After considering the July Ford report, Magowan called Ford's representative, Ventzke. Ventzke confirmed that Ford would commence "netting out." Ford's warehouses were full and business was flat, he told Magowan and, he said, shipments would be brought in line with the requirements of the Ford plan over the next several months. Magowan called Herbert Miller, Amerequip's vice president of operations and one of its owners, and suggested that a layoff, rather than a plantwide shutdown, might be indicated. Consideration of the layoff continued with discussions among Magowan, Benage, and Jones on Wednesday, 24 July.[7] On Wednesday, Benage, with Foremen Stettnichs and Campbell, worked out the details of the layoff. Benage determined how many people he needed to retain to meet production demands and, he testified, the names of those to be laid off were determined between approximately 10:30 a.m. and 1:30 p.m. On that same day, Magowan informed Miller of his determination that a layoff appeared to be inevitable. Miller directed Magowan to call him back on 25 July with the final details regarding the extent of the layoff. Magowan complied and, between noon and 2 p.m. on Thursday, 25 July, Miller approved the layoff plans.[8]

Contemporaneous with management's deliberations concerning the layoff, at least some members of the Union's organizational committee appeared at work on Wednesday, 24 July, wearing their SWOC buttons. The committee also posted and distributed a lengthy flyer detailing employee organizational rights under the Act.

At least some of the employees felt that their display of union support did not go unnoticed by Respondent's supervisors. Craig Latterell believed that Stettnichs stared at him and other employees who were "pro-union" and Mike Sweir felt that his foreman, Campbell, was less friendly and less willing to engage in casual conversation once the emloyees began to wear SWOC buttons. Dennis Reifers heard Foreman Doug Koepp tell Stettnichs that he only counted five people wearing buttons. Ed Blair claimed that on 25 July, Foreman Stettnichs "jumped" Dale Clyde and him "for not getting enough work done and spending too much time talking on the paint line." On 25 July, the first day Marlis Anderson wore her button in the plant, Sweir observed Campbell take notice of the button and walk away. To Anderson, it appeared that he walked in the direction of the office. Later that day, according to Anderson, Campbell returned. He told her:

> You know, if Herb Miller ever thought that there was going to be a union brought into this shop, Herb Miller would say "fuck you, get out, we don't need it" or . . . possibly he might negotiate a 20-cent hour raise, or maybe give you a holiday or take a holiday or something else away from you. . . . If there were a union in the shop you might be able to be sent over to the paint line. Without a union in the shop you can be sent over to the paint line if you ran out of work in your own department, but if there was a union, they could still send you over to the paint line to work if you are out of work in your own department, but you might possibly have to work for their wages, rather than what you are making on your own in assembly.[9]

At noon on Thursday, 25 July, Don Rol and Ed Gross addressed their fellow employees in the lunchroom to refute Benage's statements of the preceding week concerning Bushhog. Their investigation, they told the other employees, revealed that the wages paid the Bushhog workers surpassed those paid by Respondent and included annual cost-of-living increases. Moreover, contrary to what Benage had stated, Bushhog did not have a plant in Mexico; its production facilities were in Alabama, Texas, and Kansas. The wage comparison was written down and given to someone on the night shift for distribution there. Present in the lunchroom during this presentation was at least one supervisor, Don Stettnichs.

At 3:10 p.m. on 25 July, Benage called the employees to a meeting. He opened the meeting by telling the employees that Respondent did not want or need a union and suggested that any problems could be worked out on a one-to-one basis between the employees and management. He alluded to the possibility of strikes and the risks of fines or permanent replacement. He also spoke about other unionized facilities in the geographic area, Morrell and Litton, and mentioned the concession bargaining taking place at Morrell.

After his opening remarks concerning unionization, Benage announced that Respondent had decided to convert the 1-week shutdown into a layoff of approximately 26 employees. He claimed that some employees had approached him and complained that it would be easier on them if there were a layoff of some people rather than a shutdown involving everyone. He also told the employees what the July Ford reports showed and of Ford's intention to "net out." He explained that if Respondent did not have a layoff, the plant would have to be shut down again in September and possibly October, for 2-week periods of time. In response to questions, he stated that the layoffs would be by seniority, department, and shift and, when asked, said that even those wearing SWOC buttons would be recalled when worked picked up.

[7] Contrary to the contentions of the Union, Benage's testimony in this proceeding, that he learned of the July Ford report from Magowan on Wednesday morning, 24 July, is not "totally inconsistent" with his testimony in the representation case hearing that he learned of it on "Monday, Tuesday, right in there." He did not testify in the earlier hearing with any certainty concerning the date.

[8] Miller testified in the R case hearing but did not testify in the instant proceeding. His testimony in the earlier hearing cannot be said to contradict Magowan's testimony here. Thus, while Miller testified on cross-examination (Tr. R case 47) that he did not play an active role in the layoff decision until the following week, when he received a letter from the employees (discussed infra), he also testified (on recross-examination (Tr. R case 71-72)) that he had discussions with Magowan about the need to reduce manpower and about the extent of the required reduction within a day of when Magowan received the July Ford report.

[9] Campbell recalled making the statements concerning temporary transfers from one department to another in his conversation with Anderson in June. He essentially denied making the other statements attributed to him, asserting that he would not have discussed the Union with Anderson at that point and time because, by then, he was aware of her support for the Union. Anderson impressed me as the more credible witness of the two and Campbell's explanation of why he would not have made such statements to her seemed contrived. I therefore credit Anderson's testimony.

After Benage's announcement of the layoff, the organizing committee met at Sharon Hallem's home and set up a rally to be conducted that evening in the plant parking lot during the night-shift dinner break at 8:45 p.m. The rally was held as planned. Among the employees who spoke were Ed Gross, Sharon Hallem, Don Rol, Dennis Reifers, Lee Wigton, and Steve Johannsen. There was considerable yelling and shouting and the employees were observed by Benage and some of the foremen. To counter Benage's claim that some employees preferred a layoff to a shutdown, a vote was taken on that question. A similar rally and vote was conducted for the incoming day shift at 6 a.m. on Friday, 26 July. The morning edition of the Argus-Leader, the Sioux Falls newspaper, carried an article about the scheduled layoff and the employees' protest. The article featured a photograph of an angry Don Rol and comments by Ed Gross.

Respondent's lunchroom, used by both employees and supervisors, contains three bulletin boards. Two of those boards are glass enclosed and are maintained for the use of Respondent. The third is an uncovered board on which employees may post notices, including such things as personal ads selling cars or boats. Early in the Union's campaign, this third board was also used for the posting of some organizational literature. The Union's flyer, setting forth the employees' legal rights in an organizational campaign, in addition to being distributed to the employees in the plant, was posted on this bulletin board on about Wednesday, 24 July. On 25 July, Ed Gross saw Foreman Don Stettnichs exit; he was carrying a piece of paper in one hand and the cup in the other. Shortly thereafter, when Gross went into the lunchroom he observed that the Union's "Legal Rights" posting was no longer on the bulletin board.

On the following morning, 26 July, Gross observed that Don Rol's notes comparing the Bushhog wages with Respondent's was posted on the bulletin board along with a copy of the newspaper article featuring Rol's picture. At 7:20 a.m. that day, Gross claimed, he observed Foreman Campbell remove the wage comparison from the bulletin board. Later that same day, he claimed he observed Campbell and Stettnichs standing by the bulletin board, looking at the posted newspaper article. He heard Campbell say, "What a mug," and Stettnichs respond, "Wouldn't you like your daughter to bring home something like that." He then saw Campbell take this newspaper article off the board, roll it up, and pocket it.

Campbell and Stettnichs admit the conversation attributed to them with regard to the newspaper article but claim that it took place in the front office where copies of the newspaper itself, and not reproductions of the article, were laying about. Both deny removing any union literature from the employee bulletin board, stating that they knew from a prior Board case that to do so might constitute a violation of the statute. Stettnichs did admit to removing a copy of the newspaper article from the Company's glass-covered bulletin board. Two unit employees, Merle and Ken Baatz, admit to removing union postings from the open bulletin board on a number of occasions.

Noting that no employee other than Gross testified to actual observations of supervisors removing union postings, that Gross did not actually see Stettnichs remove the "Legal Rights" posting, that Merle and Ken Baatz admitted that they had removed some postings, and finally noting the candor of both Campbell and Stettnichs concerning the postings and their actions and comments with regard to them, I credit Stettnichs and, in this instance, Campbell. The General Counsel has failed to prove that Respondent's supervisors removed union postings from the bulletin boards or otherwise prohibited employees from posting union literature.

As previously described, the organizing committee conducted their own "election" among the employees to determine whether the employees favored complete plant shutdowns or selected layoffs. The organizing committee also solicited signatures on petitions asking that the Employer recognize the employees' vote. The petitions and vote results, overwhelmingly favoring shutdowns, were presented to Benage by noon on Friday, 26 July. Benage recalled that it was Don Rol and Sharon Hallem who brought him the petitions; he also acknowledged that Marlis Anderson and Daryl Huff spoke to him about the vote and the petitions. Employee Craig Latterell also claimed to be in the front of the group when the petitions were presented to Benage at the conclusion of Benage's lunch hour.

At the end of the day shift on Friday, Respondent posted, in a locked case, a list of 26 laid-off employees, by shift and department.[10] The notice stated: "Due to the economy (or lack of orders), there will be a layoff until orders pick up . . . ."

For seniority purposes, Schwartz uses the date Amerequip acquired the Sioux Falls plant from Chromalloy, 22 December 1983, rather than the employees' earlier dates of hire by Chromalloy. Of those listed for layoff, nine[11] were laid off while persons in their departments with less Schwartz or less Chromalloy's seniority were retained. The remaining 17[12] were the least senior employees in their departments.

About 3:30 on Friday afternoon, after the layoff list was posted, between 35 and 50 employees gathered at the plant and entered the office. They were accompanied by the union representatives, including Bob Kingsley. Two employees, Don Juhnke and either Greg DeVaney or Charles Bauerle attempted to talk with Benage in the latter's office. Benage followed an apparent company practice of never holding a discussion with more than one employee at a time and insisted that he would only talk to one or the other of these individuals. Juhnke stayed in Benage's office until Kingsley learned that he was in there on his own. Kingsley entered Benage's office, there was a loud and angry confrontation, and Juhnke and Kingsley exited. During this time, the remaining employees were in the office hallway chanting their support for the Union and their demands that Respondent recognize their vote. At one point, Don Rol directed a common, obscene gesture at Foreman Campbell.

[10] The list, R. Exh. 5, actually contained 28 names. Two employees, Kent Schumacher and Thomas Leesch, quit.

[11] Charles Bauerle, Ed Blair, Dale Clyde, John DenBoer, Ed Gross, Jan Johnson, Craig Latterell, Dennis Reifers, and Don Rol.

During this protest, Ed Gross was standing near the office of Donna Lucas, the accounts payable clerk. According to Gross, Foreman Douglas Koepp[13] looked out of that office, laughed, and was heard to say, "them union fuckers they sure got their just." Koepp denied making any such statement or even looking out of the office during the demonstration. Lucas and Kathryn Thaler, a billing clerk, who were in the office with Koepp during at least part of the demonstration, did not hear Koepp make any such statement. No employees were called by the General Counsel to corroborate Gross' testimony. Considering all the foregoing circumstances, including the confusion inherent in the situation, the noise, the evidence tending to corroborate Koepp, and Koepp's credible demeanor and appearance, I credit Koepp's testimony and find that the General Counsel has failed to sustain her burden of proving that Koepp made the remark attributed to him by Gross.

The demonstration or protest in Respondent's offices lasted between 5 and 10 minutes. The employees left, continuing their chants. Benage admitted that he saw, in addition to DeVaney and Juhnke, Hallem, Rol, Larry Krueger, Charles Temple, and John Miller participating in the demonstration. Also participating were Gross, Marty Barber, Teresa Ingalls, Dale Clyde, and many others.

On Monday, 29 July, Respondent sent a letter, over Benage's signature, to each of the laid-off employees, purporting to "clarify . . . current and future status with the Company." The letter stated, inter alia, the following:

> Last Friday, 27 employees, including yourself, were layed [sic] off. The reduction in force, among the largest we have ever had, cut our production staff by almost 30%. Unfortunately, we do not see any end in sight to the depressed market conditions which the Company has been experiencing. As you know, the agricultural implements business has been stagnant for quite some time, and our forecasts do not show any improvements at all for the next one and a half to two years.
> Consequently, I find it necessary to inform you that your layoff must be classified as a permanent [sic] one. I wish that the news were better, but it would only be optimistic "Wishful Thinking" if we said there was any chance of you being recalled to work in the next two years, or ever.

This letter, according to Magowan, was drafted on Saturday, 27 July, and typed for Benage's signature on Monday. As claimed by Magowan, it issued because he felt it would be more fair to the employees if they knew of the improbability of their recall. About the same time that they received this letter, the employees also received change notices, dated "7-30-85," stating that they had been "Discharged/Terminated" as of "7-26-85" "due to economic conditions." Notwithstanding the language of these letters and change notices, Benage acknowledged that the employees retained recall rights.

When employees Lee Wigton, Greg DeVaney, and Steve Johannsen reported for work on the night shift of 29 July, wearing their SWOC buttons, they were greeted at the door by Benage. Benage asked DeVaney and Johannsen whether they had been laid off and, when they said that they had not, asked for their names and departments. Campbell and Stettnichs came up to Wigton, smiling or grinning, and asked him, "What are you doing here, Lee? You're laid off." When Wigton told them that he had not been on the layoff list, their grins changed to frowns and they proceeded to check the list.

Benage claims that he was not very familiar with the employees on the night shift and was meeting everyone at the door, allegedly because of the incident in his office with Kingsley and the accompanying disturbance on Friday afternoon. He does not deny the questions attributed to him by DeVaney and Johannsen. Similarly, Stettnichs admits questioning Wigton. He claims that he raised the question because Douglas Koepp had suggested that Wigton had been laid off. There was no denial of Wigton's claim that the supervisory grins changed to frowns when they learned that Wigton was not among those laid off.

DeVaney, at least, observed no other employees wearing SWOC buttons on the evening of 29 July. No other evidence was adduced to establish that any employees other than these three were or were not wearing such buttons that evening.

About the first of August, laid-off employees Don Rol and Sharon Hallem came into the company lunchroom during the night-shift's lunch break. They were observed by Benage and Magowan. Magowan, stating that they were on private property, ordered them to leave. Neither Hallem nor Rol claimed that he or she engaged in union activity when this occurred. Benage recalled that neither was talking to any other employee when he observed them and ordered them out. Benage asserted that he ordered them to leave because they had been part of what he referred to as the 26 July "mob scene" and he wanted to avoid a repetition of that event. It is essentially uncontradicted that, both before and after this incident, laid-off employees, former employees, and friends and relatives of employees came into the lunchroom and, on occasion, on to the shop floor. Sometimes they were observed by or spoke to members of supervision. Benage and Campbell claimed that, on some occasions, they had asked laid-off employees to leave the premises. Their testimony was uncontradicted.

On 30 July, Marlis Anderson, Ed Gross, Lee Wigton, and Don Rol wrote a long letter to Herbert Miller. They outlined the events surrounding the layoff, the employee vote on the question of a layoff or a shutdown, and Benage's refusal to consider the results of that vote. They also intimated that the layoff was discriminatory and asked Miller to meet with the organizing committee and a representative of the Union.

[13] Respondent admits Koepp's supervisory status.

Miller responded on 1 August, disclaiming any recognition of the organizing committee and asserting business justifications for the layoff. He stated, however, as follows:

> Seniority was considered in layoffs that were made last week just as it has been in the past. I will review these layoffs to make sure that seniority was respected to the greatest extent possible.

On 1 August, the Union held a meeting at a local motel. At this time a substantial number of employees signed union authorization cards. Other employees signed cards in response to individual solicitations elsewhere. A total of 58 employees, out of 90 then in the unit, signed authorization cards between 1 and 3 August.

On 2 August, the Union demanded recognition as representative of Respondent's employees in the following unit, admitted by Respondent to be appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees employed by the Employer at its Sioux Falls, South Dakota facility, including shipping ad receiving department employees, group leaders, and truckdrivers, excluding office clerical employees, plant industrial engineer, production control clerks, production control helper, cycle counter, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Respondent declined to voluntarily grant recognition. On 5 August, the Union filed ULP charges, alleging the layoff as violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1). On 6 August, the Union filed a petition, Case 18-RC-13822, seeking certification as the employees' collective-bargaining representative.

On the morning of 8 August, nine of the laid-off employees were called to a meeting with Miller, Magowan, and Benage. Those employees were Ed Gross, Don Rol, Charles Bauerle, Dale Clyde, John DenBoer, Jan Johnson, Craig Latterell, Dennis Reifers, and Steve Blair. The last-named individual was there by mistake; Respondent had intended to call Ed Blair. Miller reviewed the layoff and told them that mistakes had been made, that they had been improperly selected for layoff. They (except for Steve Blair) were all reinstated with backpay; DenBoer declined reinstatement. Miller also discussed the economic reasons for the layoff with these employees. Before the meeting concluded, Rol told Respondent's managers that the Union's organizational efforts would continue. Magowan replied, "That's the other matter we don't want to talk about." Ed Blair was called to a similar meeting the following morning. He was also told of the Company's conclusion that mistakes had been made in the layoffs and that he was being recalled with backpay. Magowan concluded, stating, "Now things are back to normal. I see you are still wearing your button." Blair acknowledged that he was and stated that he would continue to do so.[14]

Magowan testified that Respondent took this action, following receipt of the employees' letter, so that the layoff would follow overall plant seniority, by departments, without regard to shifts, and in order to reduce the possibility of litigation.

On the same day that the eight employees were recalled, Respondent called William Blair, Sheldon Bohms, Greg DeVaney, Mark Freese, Steve Johannsen, Doyle Schubert, Kevin Tjepkes, and Lee Wigton into the office to be told that they were going to be permanently laid off because of economic conditions. They were also told, "when and if business picked up," they would be recalled. The change notices they received stated that each of them had been "terminated due to economic conditions." With the exception of DeVaney and Wigton, all these employees had been hired after 22 December 1983. Wigton's seniority date was 14 November 1983 and DeVaney's was 12 December 1983. At the conclusion of the recall and substitution, the 26 persons who had been laid off were those who had the least overall plant seniority in their departments, without regard to shift.

A hearing on the Union's representation petition was held on 23 August 1985. The principle issue litigated was the eligibility to vote of those who had been laid off. Respondent acknowledged, at that time, that the laid-off employees had recall rights but disputed whether they had a reasonable expectancy of recall. The issue was not resolved at that time. In light of the pending unfair labor practices charges, that issue was necessarily deferred to this proceeding. The laid-off or terminated employees, it was determined, were to vote challenged ballots. The Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election issued on 1 October and the election was scheduled for 29 October.

On 28 August, at the Union's request, Respondent posted a notice in the plant stating: "laid off employees have recall rights for a period equal to their Schwartz/-Amerequip seniority, up to a maximum of one year."

In the early afternoon of 4 September, Foreman Koepp observed Ed Blair and Dale Clyde performing their work (cleaning and chipping loader parts on the spray painting line in preparation for painting) at a pace that he deemed inordinately slow. He reported this to their foreman, Stettnichs, asking whether it should take 20 minutes for the employees to do a single rack of parts. When Stettnichs replied that it should not, Koepp informed him that these employees were taking that long. Together, they observed Blair and Clyde and their observations corroborated Koepp's earlier impression. Stettnichs then got a report of the morning's production. According to Stettnichs, Clyde and Blair had completed 39 racks that day, averaging 20 minutes per rack. Stettnichs spoke to both employees about their production, warning them that they were working too slowly and spending too much time talking. Shortly thereafter, he gave them documented verbal warnings, repeating what they had been told. Nothing was said linking their warnings to their union activity.

[14] Magowan did not contradict Blair's testimony.

Clyde and Blair deny that they were working slowly on 4 September and point out that the two of them were doing the work of three men; Harlan Fluit, who normally wire brushed the parts prior to their chipping and cleaning, was absent. Their pace, they claimed, was not such as to slow down production as they were still ahead of the spray painters.[15]

This is not the first time that employees have been given written warnings for "loafing" on the job. Respondent introduced two such warnings that Stettnichs had previously given other employees. Neither is this incident the only time in the recent past when these two employees had been warned about the pace of their work. On 25 July, Stettnichs had spoken to the two of them, "chewing them out" for not getting enough work done and spending too much time talking. Again, about 13 August, after both of them had been recalled from the layoff, Campbell "jumped" them with an accusation that they were spending too much time talking. Although Blair and Clyde deny that the 25 July or 13 August verbal warnings were justified, neither of these incidents is alleged in the complaint to have been discriminatorily motivated and the General Counsel has expressly disclaimed any intention to so allege them. I must therefore assume that they were not so motivated. The record contains no indication that other union supporters were disciplined, fairly or unfairly, following the onset of union activity.

Respondent has adduced evidence through other employees to the effect that, during the period of the layoff, Clyde repeatedly stated that he did not intend to work at a full pace and that he would not work overtime until everyone was called back to work. Similarly, Blair was quoted as saying that he would not work overtime until everyone was called back from the layoff. Although these statements were testified to by employees who were generally opposed to the Union's campaign, they were credibly offered and not contradicted. On the other hand, the testimony of both Blair and Clyde was less than fully credible with respect to the work they were doing on 4 September. Blair was sarcastic and Clyde was a somewhat belligerent and evasive witness.

Just before work on a morning in October,[16] Robert Kingsley, Sharon Hallem, Larry Krueger, and John Miller were distributing union leaflets at the entrance to the lunchroom. Krueger and Miller entered the lunchroom. They had passed out their leaflets and were talking to their fellow employees when the 6:55 a.m. warning buzzer rang. About that point, Benage, who had been alerted to their presence by Campbell, entered the lunchroom and ordered them to leave.

Respondent held meetings with the employees at the end of each shift on 17 October to state Respondent's opposition to the Union's campaign.[17] Magowan, Miller, and Benage were present for the day-shift meeting. At the conclusion of the meeting, Miller announced that the Company had hats and "Vote No" buttons for the employees; he expressed the hope everyone would take one. As the employees left the meeting, Dave Koepp, and employee and the son of a foreman, offered each of them a black baseball-style cap with the Amerequip logo to which had been affixed two "Vote No" buttons. One was a white button, 3 inches in diameter, containing the words "Vote Right—Vote No." The second button, 1-3/4 inches in diameter, was orange with white lettering stating, "Vote No." Although the employees were encouraged to take and wear these hats, the credible evidence establishes that the management representatives were not present in the lunchroom when employees accepted or refused them.[18]

The representation election was conducted on 29 October in afternoon and evening sessions. There were 23 votes cast for the Union, 31 cast against it, and 25 challenged ballots that were sufficient in number to affect the results of the election. Both the Employer and the Union filed timely objections to the conduct of the election. The Employer's objections were overruled by the Acting Regional Director in the Supplemental Decision and Order that issued on 26 December. Certain of the Union's objections, those that were contemporaneous with its unfair labor practice charges, were found to raise substantial issues warranting a hearing and, together with the challenges, were consolidated for hearing with the instant complaint.

All the laid-off employees were recalled by Respondent on 18 November.

C. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The 8(a)(1) allegations—prelayoff

a. Interrogation

The complaint alleges that Foreman Denny Campbell unlawfully interrogated employees on or about 20 and 25 June. I have found that Campbell questioned employees Mike Sweir and Marlis Anderson whether Don Rol, another employee, was talking about unions. In the course of his questioning, Campbell referred to Rol as "talking trouble" and disparaged both Rol and unions generally. Examining these incidents under the totality of circumstances test required by Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), enfd. sub nom. Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 11 v. NLRB, 760 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir. 1985), I must find them to be violative of Section 8(a)(1). None of the employees involved were known union adherents at that point in time, Campbell initiated the conversations, he questioned two employees about the union activity of a third employee, for which there can be no justification, and his questioning was in the context of remarks hostile to both union activity and to the employee he suspected of engaging in it.

[15] Stettnichs acknowledged that his calculations with respect to Clyde failed to take into account that Clyde was doing Fluit's work during the morning hours. However, as he told the employees, the warnings were based on his own observations of their work pace and talking that day.

[16] The General Counsel contends that this incident happened on 4 October; Respondent contends that it occurred on 29 October, the day of the NLRB election. I do not believe that the date makes a difference with respect to the legality of Respondent's conduct here.

[17] The General Counsel makes no contentions concerning Magowan's remarks at these meetings.

[18] Magowan's testimony to this effect was corroborated by Benage and several employees. One employee, Marv Fritz, testified that he was the first employee out the door at the meeting's conclusion. When he excited, he saw Miller, Benage, and Magowan outside the door. Only Ed Blair testified that the management representatives were still present when the hats were distributed. I find his testimony less convincing and less credible than that of Magowan, Benage, and other employees. Similarly, I reject his testimony to the effect that he subsequently saw Foreman Stettnichs passing out "Vote No" buttons to employees on the paint line. Stettnichs and the only two employees identified by Blair as having received these buttons from Stettnichs contradicted Blair's testimony, their denials were more credible than Blair's affirmative testimony.

b. Threats

On 25 June, Ed Gross overheard Campbell state that if Don Rol were in his department, he would be fired. Campbell explained to Gross that it was Rol's union activity that would cause him to fire Rol. No citation of authorities is required to demonstrate that such a threat violates Section 8(a)(1).

On 25 July, Campbell told Marlis Anderson what he thought Herb Miller, Respondent's vice president, would do if Miller thought that the employees were going to unionize. In a somewhat disjointed statement, he suggested that Miller might say, "Fuck you, get out, we don't need it." Although there is no evidence that Miller had, if fact, ever made such a threat, Campbell's statement that he might clearly threatens retaliation against employees for union activity. See Dryers Grand Ice Cream, 279 NLRB 817 (1986) (Member Johansen dissenting), where the Board, in the context of a representation case, stated at 817:

> Here, Burns [a supervisor] did not expressly threaten that he would use his own authority to retaliate against employees who failed to support the Union . . . Burns repeated the theme that the employees had no job security without the Union and, by his reference to a fellow supervisor . . . fueled fears that if the Union lost the election, prounion employees would be discharged by others in management for pretextual reasons . . . . [W]e find that [a] . . . supervisor who himself threatens retaliation, or who by virtue of his equal standing with fellow supervisors, suggests that other supervisors will retaliate against prounion advocates . . . reasonably tends to effectively coerce employees in the exercise of their free choice in the election.

See also NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 616–617 (1969), where the Court pointed out that the evaluation of employer threats must take into account "the necessary tendency" of employees "to pick up intended implications . . . that might be more readily dismissed by a more disinterested ear." The Court also pointed out that a "prediction must be carefully phrased on the basis of objective fact to convey . . . demonstrably probable consequences beyond [the employer's] control . . . ." Campbell's statement was not such a carefully proscribed prediction. Moreover, I do not find the statement to be ambiguous merely because it does not say who would be discharged, as agreed by Respondent. And, even if the statement were to be deemed ambiguous, the burden of clarifying it would fall on its creator and, there being no clarification, whatever ambiguity exists must be construed against Respondent. Pennypower Shopping News, 253 NLRB 85 (1980). Campbell's statement to Anderson, I find, constitutes an additional threat in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

c. Prohibiting the posting of union literature

The complaint alleges that Respondent's supervisors discriminatorily removed prounion postings from an employee-use bulletin board, thereby demonstrating a prohibition against such postings. There was no contention that Respondent actually promulgated any rule against such postings and I have found the evidence insufficient to sustain the General Counsel's burden that Respondent's supervisors removed prounion postings. Accordingly, I shall recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

2. The 8(a)(1) allegation—postlayoff

a. Implied threat

The General Counsel contends, but I have found insufficient evidence to establish, that Foreman Douglas Koepp stated in reference to the laid-off employees, "Them union fuckers sure got their justs." I shall therefore recommend that this allegation be dismissed.[19]

b. Exclusion of laid-off employees from the lunchroom—Objectionable conduct and 8(a)(1)

On 1 August, Magowan and Benage observed Rol and Hallem in the lunchroom during the night-shift's break and ordered them to leave. Although Rol and Hallem were open union supporters, they were not engaged in any union activity at that time. Their exclusion, although not entirely contrary to company policy, was unusual; most frequently, off-duty or laid-off employees, retirees, and employees' family and friends were allowed to enter the plant without interference. They were excluded, Benage explained, because they had participated in the disturbance in the office on 26 July and he feared a repetition of that event.

On either 4 or 29 October, laid-off employees Larry Krueger and John Miller, with others, were distributing union literature outside the plant entrance before the start of work. Miller and Krueger went in to the lunchroom, where they passed out some additional flyers and left some on the tables. When the 5-minute warning buzzer rang, they had just completed their distribution of union literature and were talking to some of their fellow employees; at that point, Benage observed them and ordered them from the plant. Contrary to Respondent's contention, I find that they were still engaged in a continuous course of union activity at the point of their expulsion.

[19] Even if I were to have found the statement made as alleged, it would add little support to the General Counsel's 8(a)(3) allegations as Koepp was not involved in either the layoff decision or the selection of employees for layoff. See John J. Hudson, Inc., 275 NLRB 874 (1985) (Member Dennis dissenting).

Although I would agree with Respondent that it did not violate Section 8(a)(1) by its 1 August order that Rol and Hallem leave the premises, both because they were not engaged in any union activity at that time and because Respondent had a reason to fear that the recent 26 July incident might be repeated, I cannot agree that its expulsion of Krueger and Miller was similarly protected. In Continental Bus System, 229 NLRB 1262 (1977) (Chairman Fanning concurring, Member Walter dissenting), the Board narrowly construed its earlier holding in GTE Lenkurt, Inc., 204 NLRB 921 (1973), and stated at 1262:

> In order to effectuate the policies of the Act, a no-access rule is valid only if it (1) limits access solely with respect to the interior of the plant and other working areas; (2) is clearly disseminated to all employees; and (3) applies to off-duty employees seeking access to the plant for any purpose and not just to those employees engaging in union activity. Except when justified by business reasons, a rule which denies off-duty employees entry to parking lots, gates, and other nonworking areas will be found invalid.

See also Tri-County Medical Center, 222 NLRB 1089 (1976). Krueger and Miller were off-duty employees[20] who were engaged in union activities in the plant lunchroom, nonwork area. See Hudson Oxygen Therapy Sales, 264 NLRB 61, 72 (1982). Inasmuch as Respondent did not have any clearly disseminated rule nondiscriminatorily denying access to off-duty employees for all purposes, and, in fact, had no uniformly applied rule at all, its exclusion of these employees who were engaging in union activity must be found unlawful, at least in the absence of a valid business reason for their exclusion. Respondent's reliance on the 26 July scene in its offices is insufficient to justify this exclusion. Even assuming that the 26 July incident was so intolerable as to permit some exclusions, that incident had occurred between 2 and 3 months earlier, under unique circumstances (the sudden announcement of the layoff), and there had been no further incidents of a like nature notwithstanding that the parties were engaged in a hotly contested representation contest. Respondent no longer had a reasonable basis to fear repetition of that event. Respondent, on brief, also alluded to the hostile feelings potentially harbored by laid-off employees and the possibility that such employees might seek to "get even" or disrupt work. This is sheer speculation, based on nothing that had occurred, and speculation must not be allowed to determine the permissible scope of employee union activity. Accordingly, I find that by prohibiting off-duty employees from engaging in union activities in nonwork areas of the plant, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1).

c. Distribution of procompany insignia—Objectionable conduct and 8(a)(1)

About 17 October, at the conclusion of a meeting where Respondent's managers urged the employees not to vote for the Union, hats with the Amerequip logo and "Vote No" buttons were distributed. They were brought into the lunchroom by a nonsupervisory employee who also distributed them. Respondent's management urged the employees to take and wear the hats but, as I have found, were not present when the hats were distributed. Notwithstanding this finding, the question remains whether Respondent's distribution of these hats and buttons was a coercive attempt to make employees declare their company or union support.

In Farah Mfg., 204 NLRB 173 (1973), the employer made procompany badges available to employees by placing them in an open box in a location where both employees and supervisors could take them. The Board, affirming the decision of the administrative law judge, held that inasmuch as merely providing a supply of the badges at a central location did not pressure the employees into accepting or rejecting them, there was no coercion in violation of Section 8(a)(1). The facts in Farah were distinguished from Garland Knitting Mills, 170 NLRB 821 (1968), where impermissible pressure was found in the actions of supervisors who, by distributing the badges, observed who accepted or rejected them. In McDonald's, 214 NLRB 879 (1974), the Board (Member Jenkins dissenting on other grounds) applied Farah to a situation wherein the supervisors merely wore "Vote No" badges and only gave them to employees who requested them. Concluding that Farah held that mere distribution, without pressure being placed on the employees to wear open proclamations of support, was not violative of Section 8(a)(1), the Board dismissed the interrogation allegation. Similarly, in Black Dot, 239 NLRB 929 (1978), a representation case, the Board concluded that an "employer's conduct in merely making buttons available to employees on a voluntary basis, in the absence of supervisory involvement in the distribution process and unaccompanied by independent coercive conduct," was not objectionable conduct.[21]

In Pillowtex Corp., 234 NLRB 560 (1978), the Board found the requisite coercive conduct, sufficient to set aside an election, in the actions of a supervisor who passed a box of "Vote No" buttons in front of each employee and placed a button of each employee's machine. The Board note that:

> When employees are approached by a supervisor and offered buttons such as the ones in issue, they have only two alternatives: accept the buttons and thereby acknowledge opposition to the Union; or [20] As discussed hereinafter, I have concluded that the laid-off employees had a reasonable expectation of recall. Their status is therefore that of off-duty employees. See S. B. Thomas, 256 NLRB 791 (1981), holding that if laid-off employees do not have a reasonable expectation of recall, they are not considered as off-duty employees for the purposes of the Board's no-access rules. Implicit in S. B. Thomas is the holding that laid-off employees with a reasonable expectation are to be treated as off-duty employees under such rules. Moreover, pursuant to the Decision and Direction of Election, these laid-off employees were to cast challenged ballots in the forthcoming election; they were thus vitally interested, as employees, in the outcome of that election.

[21] The Board also noted that although "a more stringent standard applies to conduct alleged to be objectionable," it believed that Farah and McDonald's provided adequate criterion to ensure that laboratory conditions were met.

> reject them, and thereby indicate their support for the Union. In either case, the fact that the employees must make an observable choice is a form of interrogation. Furthermore, should employees feel compelled to choose a button containing a message opposite to their views, that is coercion and it likewise interferes with the election.

Pillowtex was applied by the Board in Tappan Co., 254 NLRB 656 (1981) (Member Penello dissenting), where a supervisor merely carried "Vote No" buttons and antiunion T-shirts while he inspected the work of his employees and only gave them to those who asked for them. On the basis of that conduct, the Board reversed the decision of an administrative law judge, found objectionable conduct,[22] and set aside the election. Neither the judge nor the Board distinguished or otherwise referred to Farah or McDonald's. It would seem that McDonald's, at least, has been implicitly overruled.

Finally, in R. L. White Co., 262 NLRB 575, 589 (1982), supervisors carried boxes of procompany T-shirts, in sufficient numbers for each employee to take one, into their departments and made them available to the employees. On those facts, and without regard to whatever statements may have been made by the supervisors, the administrative law judge stated:

> [T]he T-shirts were obviously meant to be worn and to wear a T-shirt of this type implies the employee was in favor of the Company and opposed to the Union. By offering to employees these T-shirts, the Company clearly was attempting to get employees to make an open acknowledgement of their position in favor of the Company and opposed to the Union.

The Board expressly agreed that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) by distributing and coercively encouraging employees to wear the procompany T-shirts.

Applying the foregoing cases to the facts of this case, I am persuaded that Respondent's distribution of the caps with the "Vote No" buttons was coercive conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1), capable of interfering with the conduct of the election, whether Respondent's management remained in the lunchroom while the hats were distributed. The hats, like the T-shirts in R. L. White, were obviously meant to be worn; if worn, they would display an employee's leanings most vividly; Respondent's top management provided the hats with the attached badges in sufficient numbers so that everyone could take one; and the highest official with whom the employees would deal personally urged them to take and wear the hats. Moreover, those top management personnel were immediately outside the lunchroom when at least some of the employees exited the meeting. These circumstances are as coercive as those present in R. L. White, Tappan, and Pillowtex.

3. Section 8(a)(3)

a. The layoff of 26 employees

In Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), the Board set forth the following causation test to be applied in all discrimination cases turning on employer motivation:

> First, we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct.

Resolution of all the 8(a)(3) allegations of the instant case turns on the question of motivation; accordingly, the Wright Line test provides the analytical framework for the discussion that follows.[23]

In determining whether a prima facie case has been presented, the trier of fact "must view the General Counsel's evidence in isolation, apart from the respondent's proffered defense." Hillside Bus Corp., 262 NLRB 1254 at 1254 (1982), Member Jenkins dissenting on other grounds. So viewed, I am satisfied that the General Counsel has presented a prima facie case. There was open and extensive union activity, Respondent's supervisors, including those who participated in the decision to lay off the employees and in the selection of the employees to be laid off, were aware of the union activity both generally and specifically with regard to certain especially active employees. And, there was evidence which if credited,[24] would tend to establish animus toward those who would engage in union activity. In this latter regard, I note the interrogations and threats attributed to Dennis Campbell, a supervisor who participated in the selection of some of the employees for layoff. Lemon Drop Inn, 269 NLRB 1007 (1984). The most significant factor supporting the General Counsel's prima facie case is timing, always a relevant consideration in determining motivation. Lemon Drop Inn, supra. Here, the layoff announcement constituted an abrupt change from management's earlier announced plans to have a 1-week plant shutdown, and that announcement came quickly on the heels of two open, in-plant demonstrations of union support, the wearing of SWOC buttons on Wednesday, 24 July, and the lunchroom meeting to refute Benage's bushhog statements at noon on 25 July.[25] Moreover, Respondent made the announcement in the context of antiunion, though lawful, remarks.

[22] No exceptions had been taken to the judge's recommended dismissal of the 8(a)(1) allegations.

[23] In so concluding, I reject the Union's argument that Respondent's conduct was so inherently destructive of employee rights that, under Radio Officers Union v. NLRB, 347 U.S. 17 (1954), and NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967), "no proof of intent is necessary, and business considerations are not a defense." Unlike the employers' conduct in Radio Officers, Great Dane, and subsequent cases applying this principle, Respondent's conduct was not, on its face, directed at union members qua union members. See Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 NLRB 693 (1983), and cases cited. Moreover, as the Board stated in Wright Line at 1088, "Of course, the discharge of an employee, in and of itself, is not normally an inherently destructive act which would obviate the requirement of showing an improper motive."

[24] See SME Cement, Inc., 267 NLRB 763 fn. 1 (1983).

Of significance, too, to the General Counsel's prima facie case are Respondent's apparent failures to comply with an earlier stated promise to try to give employees greater notice of layoffs and the apparent failure to more strictly follow plant or departmental seniority. In this latter regard, I note that the majority of those selected out of overall (or Chromalloy) seniority for inclusion in the layoff were among those who had openly proclaimed their membership on the organizing committee and had otherwise been among the most active union proponents.[26] Finally, I note what appears to be surprise, and possibly consternation, on the part of Benage, Campbell, and Stettnichs when Wigton, Devaney, and Johannsen, known union supporters, showed up for work on 29 July, not having been laid off.

Having concluded that the General Counsel has established a prima facie case of discriminatory motivation, it is appropriate to turn to Respondent's affirmative defenses. Respondent's defense to the 8(a)(3) allegations is based primarily on Respondent's intimate relationship with Ford. Ninety percent of Schwartz' business comes from Ford; all parties agree that it is appropriate to examine Respondent's economic defense through the business it does with Ford. In particular, Respondent points to the Ford reports and Ford's announced decision to "net out" as business justification for the layoff. Secondarily, Respondent relies on the bleak farm economy and its expected effect on a producer of farm equipment. In this regard it must be noted that whatever merit there may be to the contentions of the General Counsel and the Union that Respondent's small loaders (those used on tractors of less than about 40 horsepower) sold most frequently to noncommercial "hobby" farmers, construction firms, and landscapers, where the economy was thriving, it remains clear that a substantial portion of Respondent's business was tied to the farm economy. No one disputes the fact that the large loaders are farm equipment. Those large loaders normally constitute about one-third of Respondent's sales,[27] by units, and as they sell for about twice the price of the small loaders, large loaders account for about one-half of Respondent's sales, in dollars. Large loaders, and thus the farm economy, are unquestionably important to Respondent's considerations. Although the parties disagreed regarding the significance of the farm economy to Schwartz, everyone agreed that the farm economy, in general, looked bleak.

As previously noted, sometime usually in the latter half of each month, Respondent receives the Ford report, detailing Ford's loader commitments for the next 4 months and projecting purchases for 4 months beyond that. The Ford reports for April and June (there was no May report) indicated a substantial drop in both large and small loader commitments in the summer with some signs of improvement in the fall. Thus, although small loader shipments had averaged around 400 per month in 1984 and about 380 per month in the first 5 months of 1985 and large loaders had averaged between 190 and 200 month during the same periods, the April report indicated a reduction in commitments for small loaders to 175, 145, and 150 in May, June, and July, respectively, and in large loaders to 190, 35, and 25 for the same months. The employees were advised, in a meeting in May, that the summer looked slow, that there could be some down weeks during the summer, but that there were favorable indications for the fall. Benage told the employees that he would try to give them 2 weeks' notice of layoffs. Although there was no union activity going on at that time, he used the occasion to tell the employees that management was opposed to unionization.

In June, the next Ford report was received. Large loader commitments were still well below average, 135, 45, 80, and 80 for June, July, August, and September, respectively. Similarly, the small loader commitments for those months were 289, 480, 260, and 265. As of this report, Schwartz had moved into a substantial overshipped position on both large (+52) and small (+229) loaders. Had a 1-week vacation shutdown in July not already been scheduled, according to Magowan, some form of curtailment would have been necessary to balance production and commitments. On 18 July, Plant Manager Benage announced that there would be an additional 1-week plant shutdown in August, because of the lowered production requirements. He used this meeting, also, to take note of the union activity and to lawfully state Respondent's objections to organization.

On 19 July, Respondent was informed that Ford was going to "net out," i.e., bring shipments down to the level of its commitments. Few releases were in hand for additional July shipments; no more would be furnished but Respondent was authorized to ship some of August's commitments in July. On 23 July, Respondent received the July Ford report and further confirmation of Ford's intention to "net out." The July Ford report was little different from June's. The small loader commitments were for 480 in July, 290 in August, 265 in September, and 485 in October. The large loader commitments were 75, 80, 80, and 145 for those same months. The less firm projections for November, December, January, and February, however, showed significant improvement. According to that report, Schwartz was 228 small and 31 large loaders overshipped in July. About 250 of the 370 (combined large and small) loaders committed for August were shipped in July.

[25] Contrary to the General Counsel's contention on brief, Respondent never asserted that the layoff was announced to the employees on Tuesday, 23 July.

[26] Totally lacking in merit is the Union's statistical argument based on the claim that 23 of the 26 laid-off employees "were Union supporters and had signed Union cards." In fact, at the time of the layoff, no employees had signed union authorization cards; those cards were not signed until 1 August and the fact that the laid-off employees signed cards at that time is no evidence that they, or the less senior employees generally, were union supporters at the time of the layoffs.

[27] It is misleading to characterize the large loader sales as comprising only 20 percent of Respondent's business, as both the General Counsel and the Union did on brief, by examining only those months surrounding the election. Those were the months when this particular aspect of Respondent's business suffered the worst decline. Moreover, with respect to the question of who purchases small loaders, I have serious questions concerning the accuracy of the Union's sampling methods. A less than representative sampling of dealers would skew the results substantially and there is no showing that the dealers sampled were located in farming communities or represented a fair cross-sampling of Ford tractor dealers.

At the time of the layoff, Respondent had 93 unit employees, approximately its average complement since the first of the year. In the same timespan, it had shipped an average of approximately 560 loaders per month, of which about 35 percent were large loaders. According to Benage's calculations, with Ford netting out, Respondent would only have to produce about 350 loaders per month, a total of about 1100 in August, September, and October. Benage followed the procedure he had used for previous layoffs: taking 15.5 hours as the average direct labor time to produce a loader, adding to that a 20-percent "fudge factor," and 35 percent plus several extra employees for indirect labor, and finally figuring 160 man hours per month, he concluded that a work force of 62 would suffice for the necessary production.[28]

In fact, Respondent shipped a total of 1046 loaders, 764 small and 282 large, to Ford in August through October, and increased its loader inventory from 40 to 183 (large and small). During the same time period, there was a reduction in small loader overshipments from 228 to only 58, and only a small increase in large loader overshipments from 31 to 59.[29]

Respondent notes that since Amerequip acquired Schwartz, it has laid off employees when necessary to balance productive capacities with commitments. The instant layoff may have been its longest lasting single layoff, but it was neither its only layoff nor its deepest one. On 1 July 1984 Respondent had 125 production and maintenance employees, was overshipped by 277 small loaders (although undershipped by 19 large ones), and had Ford reports indicating declines in Ford commitments in much the same magnitudes as those that were to occur in 1985. As in 1985, the 1984 decline occurred most heavily in large loaders. Respondent laid off 18 employees on 28 July 1984, recalled 2 but laid off 12 more at the end of August 1984, and laid off an additional 22 employees in September. By 1 October 1984 there had been a 45-percent reduction in the work force to 69. In mid-October 21 were recalled and the work force reached its new peak of 100 on 14 January 1985. Respondent also testified that layoffs were, for a number of reasons, more efficient than repeated plant shutdowns, including the loss of productivity on shutting down and starting up and the inability to respond quickly to orders during a shutdown. Those reasons appear to be reasonable and logical. The record contains no evidence that Respondent had previously used repeated plant shutdowns to balance manpower and production requirements.

The Union's economist, testifying as an expert witness, acknowledged that a layoff or a reduction in force of some other nature was required by the Ford reports and Ford's stated intention to begin netting out as of late July. He also acknowledged that Respondent's buildup of inventory indicated that, at least into October, Respondent had sufficient manpower to meet its demands for production. The General Counsel and the Union, although conceding that Respondent had some economic justification for its reduction in force, contend nevertheless that the sudden change from a scheduled 1-week layoff to a "permanent" layoff of one-third of the employees was discriminatory. They rely on the Employer's alleged animus, timing, shifting defenses, and the absence of sufficient economic justification for the drastic action taken. I find their assertions with respect to the layoff itself insufficient to overcome Respondent's affirmative defense.

In reaching this conclusion, I take note of the fact that, although suspicious, the timing of the layoff decision is coincidental with receipt of the July Ford report and Ford's stated intention to net out. It also occurred at almost precisely the same time of year as the major layoff in 1984. Moreover, although the General Counsel and the Union make much of their contention that the layoff occurred within hours of open union activity within the shop, it is clear that Respondent had knowledge of the union activity for some time prior to the layoff, rendering that layoff somewhat less precipitous than claimed. Further, although the General Counsel correctly asserts that announcements of the layoff in the context of antiunion remarks would normally justify a connection being made between the two, I must note that Benage used other meetings to make antiunion remarks, even when there was no union activity in progress. The regularity with which he did this, together with the absence of any unlawful statements, tends to negate the significance of the juxtaposition of his remarks with the announcement.

In this same vein, although I have found that there were some 8(a)(1) violations committed before the layoff, I consider it significant that they were all committed by a single first-line supervisor who was not involved in the decision to have a layoff. There were no further violations of Section 8(a)(1) for almost 2 months after the layoffs and those that subsequently occurred were not "hallmark" violations. See NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, 632 F.2d 208 (2d Cir. 1980). Animus there was, but not of a sufficient weight to overcome valid explanations of substantial business justification for a layoff that was, at least as to scope and timing, consistent with past practice. See Plessey Materials Corp., 263 NLRB 1392, 1404 (1982).

The General Counsel and the Union contend that Respondent has raised shifting defenses, changing its case from the representation hearing to this proceeding. I find no substantial inconsistencies. They were different proceedings, raising different, albeit somewhat similar, issues. At issue in the R case hearing was the laid-off employees' expectation of recall; Schwartz did not, at that time, bear any burden of establishing the validity of the layoff and thus was not called on to present all the reasons it took the action it did. Its failure, for example, to explain in the R case why it deemed alternating shutdowns with workweeks to be inefficient, does not render that explanation incredible when it was offered in the C case.

[28] Benage's calculations were, if anything, generous. Taking Ford's commitments for the 3-month period following July and reducing that by the number of loaders overshipped, Schwartz would only have had to produce 274 large loaders and 812 small loaders to meet its Ford commitments. Had Benage used these figures, and determined necessary manpower levels using the more specific number of hours required to manufacture large and small loaders (18 and 14, respectively), he could have reduced manpower levels by another 8 or 10 employees.

[29] Respondent went to an undershipped position on small loaders in November (-69) and December (-211) although remaining slightly overshipped in large loaders until the end of the year, concluding with overshipments of 37 large loaders in November and 12 in December.

Finally, in this regard, it seems clear that Respondent's layoff decision was a reasonable and effective response to its declining production requirements. Perhaps Respondent could have looked further ahead to Ford's projections for November, December, January, and February; made the cut less deep, and increased inventory more. Perhaps it could have acceded to the employees' desires and utilized repeated shutdowns rather than the layoff. Perhaps it could have recalled the employees sooner. However, the action it took was one of the courses available to it, consistent with what it had done in the past, to meet its needs, and even the Union's expert could not say that it was an unreasonable or invalid choice. Indeed, as a careful analysis of the figures shows, Respondent did not even go as far as its own calculations would have permitted in reducing its work force. To conclude that Respondent should have followed some different course of action to deal with the decreased demand for its products would require the trier of fact to substitute his business judgment for that of Respondent. That I cannot do. Albritton Communications, 271 NLRB 201, 204 (1984); Garay & Co., 261 NLRB 490, 495 (1982), where the employer's economic defense prevailed notwithstanding stronger evidence of unlawfully expressed animus than exists here and equally suspicious timing. Accordingly, I shall recommend dismissal of the allegation that the layoff of 26 July violated Section 8(a)(3).

b. Discriminatory selection for layoff

(1) In general

Approximately two-thirds of Respondent's work force was employed by Chromalloy before Amerequip's acquisition of the Sioux Falls plant on 22 December 1983. As previously noted, 22 December 1983 is the earliest seniority date recognized or utilized by Respondent, as evidenced by uncontradicted testimony and the monthly seniority lists.

Plant Manager Benage, together with Foremen Campbell and Stettnichs, selected the employees to be laid off. Their selections, they claimed, were made on the basis of Amerequip seniority, by department and by shift. Where employees had the same seniority (i.e., 22 December 1983), determinations were made on the employees' ability, versatility, and work habits. This was consistent with Respondent's practice in prior layoffs, according to Magowan.[30] There was no evidence that Respondent had ever utilized the employees' Chromalloy seniority as a basis for layoff selection.

Of the 26 employees selected to be laid off on 26 July, 9 were laid off while Respondent retained others in their departments, but not necessarily on their shifts, with less Chromalloy and, in some cases, less Amerequip seniority. Seven of the nine were SWOC members, at least five of whom had openly proclaimed that membership on Wednesday, 24 July. The General Counsel contends that it was their union activity that motivated Respondent to select them. The General Counsel also notes the reception Lee Wigton, Greg DeVaney, and Steven Johannsen received when reporting to work on 29 July, surprise at their presence, as arguably indicating Respondent's intention to include all known SWOC members in the layoff. Respondent, noting that a selection for layoff based on total Chromalloy-Amerequip seniority would have been contrary to past practice (and would have, and ultimately did, result in the layoff of at least as many SWOC members),[31] contends that its selection process was nondiscriminatory. The selection process, like the layoff as a whole, must be evaluated pursuant to the Wright Line test.

(2) Jan Johnson and Charles Bauerle—fabrication department, days

In the absence of the foremen, Benage selected the persons to be laid off on both the day and night shifts from department 51, fabrication. Laid off from the night shift were Randolph Ekanger, Hiram Anderson, and Steve Blair, the three least senior employees on that shift. Laid off from the day shift were Wesley Jaqua, Jan Johnson, and Charles Bauerle, the three least senior employees on that shift. There were, however, three employees remaining on the night shift who had less Amerequip seniority than Johnson and Bauerle. They were Harlan Kruse, Mark Freese, and William Blair. The General Counsel contends that Johnson and Bauerle were discriminatorily selected for layoff from the day shift over these less senior night-shift employees. With respect to those contentions, I find, the General Counsel has failed to establish a prima facie case. In so finding, I note that following seniority within the department and shift, as Respondent did, was contrary to no clearly established company policy. More significantly, I note that Jan Johnson had not engaged in any union activity and the only union activity engaged in by Bauerle before the layoff list was posted was SWOC membership, a fact that the General Counsel failed to prove was known to Respondent. Knowledge is an element on which the General Counsel bears the burden of proof. Heatilator Fireplace, 249 NLRB 544 fn. 3 (1980). And, I further note that had Respondent selected, in their place, the least senior employees in fabrication on the night shift, at least one of those, Mark Freese, would similarly have been a SWOC member. Accordingly, I shall recommend that the allegations with respect to Jan Johnson and Charles Bauerle be dismissed.

[30] There is some evidence, in essentially nonspecific testimony of various employees, that the selection of employees for prior layoffs had sometimes been marred by favoritism. Similarly, there was some general testimony indicating that, in at least some layoffs, the night shift where there was the heaviest concentration of less senior employees was eliminated first, with more senior night-shift employees being transferred to the day shift. The record is not sufficiently specific to establish either favoritism or elimination of the night shift to be the general rule for Respondent's layoffs.

[31] Of the eight ultimately laid off in the place of those whom the Union deemed discriminatorily selected for layoff, seven were SWOC members.

(3) John DenBoer, Don Rol, and Craig Latterell—welding, day shift

Don Stettnichs selected the welders to be laid off. Four individuals from the night shift, those with the least Amerequip seniority, were chosen first: Thomas Leesch (who quit), Terry Bohnenkamp, John Miller, and Richard VanMeveren. Of these, only John Miller was a SWOC member. Eight welders from the day shift were slated for layoff. Four were chosen on the basis of their Amerequip seniority, Dennis Lupkes, Larry Krueger, Charles Temple, and Arnold Peterson. None of these employees had any demonstrable union activity. There was no one on the day shift in the welding department with a seniority date after 22 December 1983 who was not laid off. The fifth day-shift welder selected was Robert Hoffman, one of the initiators of the union activity, an open union supporter and SWOC member. His selection, however, was consistent with his overall seniority and is not alleged to be separately discriminatory. The last three selected were John DenBoer, Craig Latterell, and Don Rol.

John DenBoer was a member of SWOC; the record contains no evidence of any other union activity or of company knowledge of his union activity. He was more senior than a number of other welders on both the day and night shifts if seniority under Chromalloy, contrary to company practice, were to be considered. DenBoer had not been laid off in 1984; four night-shift employees with less overall seniority, Wigton, DeVaney, Gerdes, and Kirkpatrick, had been laid off at one time or another during that year, but were not laid off at this time. Three of these four, I note, were active SWOC members.

Stettnichs selected DenBoer, he claimed, because although DenBoer was a good worker, he tended to disrupt other employees with conversation while he took breathers from his work. Stettnichs' observation of this was corroborated by Donnie Juhnke, a SWOC member and union supporter.

The General Counsel has failed to prove either employer knowledge of John DenBoer's union activity or disparate treatment, elements critical to her prima facie case. Moreover, even if I were to assume that Respondent's failure to lay off first from the night shift, or to consider dates of hire before Amerequip's acquisition, were contrary to prior practice and were somehow to surmount the knowledge hurdle, I would still have to find for Respondent with respect to this employee. Respondent has proffered a legitimate and credible explanation for his selection and, had it chosen someone with less Chromalloy seniority from the night shift, it would have had to choose between four other employees, the two least senior of whom, Wigton and DeVaney, were more openly supportive of the Union than DenBoer was.

Craig Latterell attended the July 20 meeting in Sherman Park but did not become a member of SWOC or wear a SWOC button. Without indicating how Stettnichs acquired knowledge of his alleged support for the Union, Latterell testified that, after the union activity became public, he observed Stettnichs directing cold stares at him and at other union supporters. On 26 July he was in the front of the crowd that presented a request to Benage to honor the employees' vote favoring a shutdown. Latterell had begun working for Chromalloy at another plant in 1973 but had not transferred to Sioux Falls until November 1983. If the later date is used for seniority purposes, there were only two persons in the department with lower Chromalloy seniority than he, Wigton and DeVaney, both on the night shift and both open union supporters. Stettnichs selected Latterell for layoff on the basis that he had spent the least amount of time in the department; Stettnichs' testimony is uncontradicted.

Here, as in the case of John DenBoer, I must find that no prima facie case has been made. Lacking is both evidence of any overt union activity and employer knowledge of his union proclivity. I shall therefore recommend that the allegations with respect to John DenBoer and Craig Latterell be dismissed.

Unlike the individual employees previously discussed, Don Rol was openly and actively involved in the Union's campaign. He and Hoffman initiated it, meetings were held in his home, he solicited support for it by canvassing employees in the shop, he spoke at the Sherman Park rally of 20 July, he was a SWOC member, he wore his SWOC button on 24 July, and he addressed his fellow employees in the lunchroom at noon on 25 July, refuting Benage's claims concerning Respondent's competition. His union activity was known to supervision, particularly Stettnichs and Campbell. And, the 8(a)(1) violations attributable to Campbell establish Campbell's animus toward unions generally and toward Rol as a union activist in particular. By this evidence, the General Counsel has established a strong prima facie case of discriminatory selection.

According to Stettnichs, all the employees to be laid off were basically good workers; he chose Rol because he believed Rol to be the newest person in the department. Rol was, in fact, the least senior employee in that department on the day shift, but only if Chromalloy seniority was considered. Considering Amerequip seniority however placed him on a par with all the others. In light of Respondent's position that it deemed all those employed on 22 December 1983 to have equal seniority, its reliance on Chromalloy seniority to justify the selection of Rol, without comparing his work habits, tardiness, productivity, or versatility, is inconsistent with its past practice and insufficient to overcome the General Counsel's prima facie case. Accordingly, I must conclude that Respondent laid off Don Rol because of his union activity, in violation of Section 8(a)(3).

(4) Dennis Reifers and Edwin Gross—assembly

Three persons were laid off from the assembly department, all from the day shift, including two class A assemblers, Dennis Reifers and Edwin Gross. Respondent retained Doyle Schubert, a class B (and therefore less skilled and less versatile) assembler on the night shift who had less Amerequip seniority than either of them. It also retained on the day shift two class A assemblers, Marlis Anderson and Marty Barber, and one class B assembler, Ward Jenson, who had less Chromalloy seniority than they did. Reifers was a SWOC member who displayed his membership button openly on 24 July and observed supervisors taking note of those who wore the buttons. He spoke to the employees outside the plant on the evening of 25 July. Gross attended all the meetings, addressed the employees in Sherman Park, was a SWOC member, wore his button on 24 July, and spoke before the employees and Stettnichs at noon on 25 July. Of those assemblers retained, Marlis Anderson and Schubert were SWOC members. She did not wear her button until 25 July, after the time when Respondent claimed the selections for layoff were made. Schubert was one of the speakers at Sherman Park.

Reifers and Gross were selected for layoff by Campbell, their foreman. He selected Reifers for layoff, he claimed, because, for the past 7 or 8 years, Reifers had been primarily crating loaders, which was work others could do. Additionally, he noted, Reifers did only a minimum amount of work and frequently yelled at Anderson to slow down. He chose to retain Marty Barber because of Barber's experience on mixer boxes, Ward Jenson because Jenson had been on mounting kits the longest, and Marlis Anderson because she was the best person on the small loader jig.

Anderson corroborated Campbell's claim that Reifers had, on occasion, told her to slow down. She testified, however, that she was a very fast worker, that others have also protested her pace, and that Reifers' statements to her were in the nature of jokes that did not affect her performance. Reifers testified that he did a number of things besides crating loaders, including working on mixer boxes, and his testimony was corroborated by both Anderson and Campbell. Campbell admitted that Reifers' efficiency rating was 100 percent, although Respondent downplayed the significance of this figure, noting that all, or nearly all, employees were so rated. There was no evidence that Reifers had ever been reprimanded or disciplined for not working to his capacity or for suggesting that others slow their work pace.

According to Campbell, he selected Gross, whom he acknowledged to be experienced in various jobs, because of Gross' record of tardiness and because Gross did not put out any extra effort in his work. Gross' absentee calenders, which Campbell did not have before him when the choices were made, reveal that Gross was tardy 8 times in 1983, 23 times in 1984 including 13 times by the end of July, and only 5 times in 1985. There is no evidence in this record with respect to how Gross' record of tardiness compares with that of other employees who were not laid off. The record does establish that Respondent did not lay off Gross in 1984, when his tardiness record was much worse; in that year, Schubert was laid off. There is also no evidence in this record indicating that Gross was ever reprimanded or disciplined for failing to work to his full capacity.

Based on the foregoing, I must conclude that the General Counsel has established a prima facie case of discrimination with respect to both Reifers and Gross that Respondent has failed to rebut. Reifers and Gross were both known union supporters who worked for, and were chosen for layoff by, Campbell. Campbell is the one supervisor with strongly demonstrated antiunion animus. The reasons asserted by Campbell for their selection, moreover, do not withstand scrutiny. Gross and Reifers were both experienced assemblers, capable of, and experienced at, doing a number of different jobs, as their "A" classifications would attest. Respondent retained two class B assemblers who, by definition were less versatile; one was retained specifically because he had worked at a single job for a long time. The retention of these class B assemblers is directly contrary to Respondent's claim that it endeavored to retain the most versatile employees. I note, too, that no one was selected for layoff among the night-shift assemblers, contrary to the pattern in all other departments, even though the person with least seniority in the department, Doyle Schubert, was on that shift.

With respect to Reifers, I would particularly note that supervision either did not know of his "slow down" statements or did not take them seriously at any time before the layoffs. If they had knowledge and took them seriously, they most assuredly would have taken some corrective action; attempts to slow down the work of other employees is not the kind of conduct the management of any company would tolerate lightly. Similarly, I cannot credit Campbell's alleged reliance on Gross' tardiness record. He received no warnings for tardiness during Amerequip's ownership of the plant and his record was markedly better than it had been in 1984 when he was not included among those to be laid off. Finally, I note the absence of any evidence or even claim that Gross' tardiness was any worse than that of others who were retained.

Accordingly, I must conclude that Respondent laid Dennis Reifers and Edwin Gross off because of their union activity, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1).

(5) Dale Clyde and Edwin Blair—paint department

Five people were selected for layoff from the paint department, three production helpers with the lowest Amerequip seniority from the night shift and spray painter Dale Clyde and production helper Ed Blair from the day shift. Retained on the night shift were two employees with lower Amerequip seniority than Clyde and Blair; one was Sheldon Bohms, a spray painter, and the other was Steven Johannsen, a production helper. There was no one retained on the day shift with a post-22 December 1983 hiring date; Merle Baatz, Kenny Baatz, and Richard Thompson, painters, and Robert Hadrath and Teresa Ingalls, production helpers, who had lower Chromalloy seniority, were not laid off.

Dale Clyde was a SWOC member who wore his button to work on 24 July. Ed Blair was active from the beginning, attending union meetings, speaking at Sherman Park on July 20, and wearing his button as a member of SWOC on 24 July. However, there were also SWOC members among the paint department employees who were not laid off: Steve Johannsen (who also spoke at Sherman Park), Teresa Ingalls, Steve Noonan, and Sheldon Bohms. Merle and Kenny Baatz, who were retained, were opposed to the Union; they removed some union postings and placed certain antiunion literature on the bulletin boards. However, there was no evidence that their views on the Union were known to Respondent at the time of the layoffs.

Don Stettnichs selected the day-shift paint department employees to be laid off. He initially selected Kenny Baatz, whom he believed to be the newest employe in the department, and Ed Blair, whom he deemed to be the slowest. However, he decided to keep Baatz and lay off Clyde (who was actually the newest painter) after Campbell suggested that he would have a problem if he kept Clyde and not Baatz. Baatz, Campbell claimed, was a better painter and Clyde had a problem getting along with people. Campbell's opinion of Clyde's work was corroborated by another painter, Thompson, but disputed to some extent by assembler Marlis Anderson. Both Thompson and Anderson gave testimony tending to corroborate Campbell with respect to Clyde's argumentativeness. Blair's change notices from July 1983 through April 1985 all note that he was a good worker; however, his evaluation for 1984 stated that he was only "fair."

Stettnichs' choice of Clyde as one of the painters to be laid off, on Campbell's suggestion, after having first selected Ken Baatz, is very suspicious. Clyde supported the Union's campaign and Baatz opposed it and Campbell was the most openly antiunion supervisor in the plant. However, even if one assumes that Clyde's union activity was noted by Respondent, there is no evidence that Baatz was known to be antiunion. Moreover, Respondent has put forth a plausible explanation for the substitution, one that was corroborated by other employees, and has thus overcome the General Counsel's prima facie case. Similarly, assuming that a prima facie case has been made out with respect to Blair's layoff, I must find that it had been rebutted by Respondent's evidence. Stettnichs' explanation, that he chose Blair because Blair was the slowest, is supported by Blair's 1984 evaluation. It is further supported by the oral reprimands for insufficient productivity and talking given Blair and Clyde on 25 July and 13 August, which the General Counsel did not allege to have been discriminatory, and by the written warning of 4 September, regarding which I have found insufficient evidence of discriminatory motivation, as discussed infra.

Accordingly, I shall recommend that the allegations with respect to the layoffs of Dale Clyde and Ed Blair be dismissed.

c. Recall and substitution

On 8 August, the nine employees discussed immediately above were offered immediate reinstatement and full backpay for the time they had lost. All but DenBoer accepted reinstatement. Eight other employees with lower departmental seniority were laid off in their stead. The recall and substitution followed Herb Miller's receipt of the employees' 30 July letter, Miller's pledge to examine the layoff to ensure that it was done fairly, and the Union's unfair labor practice charges. The layoff, as reconstituted, followed overall (including Chromalloy) plant seniority, by departments, without regard to what shifts the employees were working on. It was, Magowan testified, done at least in part to reduce the possibility of litigation.[32]

The General Counsel and the Union contend that the substitution of eight employees for others earlier laid off is but a continuation of what they alleged to be the unlawful conduct involved in the 26 July layoff. As I have found the evidence insufficient to establish that the 26 July layoff was discriminatorily motivated, it follows that the substitution of eight other employees, to make that layoff conform to overall plant seniority, has similarly not been proven to be discriminatorily motivated. Accordingly, I shall recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

d. Layoff or discharge?

About 29 July, Respondent sent each of the laid-off employees a letter stating that, in view of its forecasts indicating no likely improvement in the agricultural implement business for the next 18 months to 2 years, there was little chance of their being recalled with the next 2 years or ever. Accordingly, they were told, their layoffs were being classified as permanent. The change notices that issued about 30 July, and those that issued 8 August, similarly stated that the employees had been "discharged/terminated." Based on this evidence, the General Counsel alleges that Respondent converted the status of the employees from layoff to discharge in violation of Section 8(a)(3). Respondent, citing evidence that at all times, both before and after 29 July, the employees were told they would be recalled when and if work picked up, denies that the employees had been discharged. Respondent also relies on the employees' own unemployment compensation claims describing themselves as having been laid off for lack of work, the Company's failure to contest any of those claims, and the Union's position in the representation case that the employees had a reasonable expectation of recall as evidencing that the employees and their representative did not reasonably believe that they had been discharged. In Ridgeway Trucking Co., 243 NLRB 1048, 1049 (1979), enfd. 622 F.2d 1222 (5th Cir. 1980), employees who were engaged in a work stoppage seeking better wages were ordered to either go to work or leave the premises. Similarly, in Workroom for Designers, 274 NLRB 840 (1985), protesting workers were told that if they walked out they would be considered as having quit. In both cases, the employees were found to have been discharged, the Board stating:

> The test for determining "whether [an employer's] statements constitute an unlawful discharge depends on whether they would reasonably lead the employees to believe that they had been discharged . . . . It is sufficient if the words or actions of the employer would logically lead a prudent person to believe his tenure had been terminated."

[32] Contrary to the Union's contention, offers of reinstatement and backpay aimed at minimizing potential liability are not properly considered admissions by a respondent that it was unlawfully motivated in its initial layoff or discharge decisions. See Virginia Street Discount Liquors, 240 NLRB 988, 1007 (1979); Rudy Patrick Co., 204 NLRB 564 fn. 2 (1973); and Alamo Express, Inc., 200 NLRB 178 (1972).

In each of the foregoing cases, words amounting to something less than a clear statement that the employee was discharged were found to convey the intention to discharge. On the other hand in Valley Bakery, 226 NLRB 532 (1976), an employee who had been told to "go home" following an outburst at his employer and who deemed himself to have been discharged by those words was found not to have been discharged. Rather, it was determined, he had "jumped the gun" or acted unreasonably in reaching such a hasty conclusion.

In Maine Apple Growers, 254 NLRB 501 (1981), seasonal workers who had been temporarily laid off were informed by letter that they would not be recalled. The administrative law judge concluded that the employer had a legitimate business reason for not recalling them; he also concluded that the employer would not have told them so if there had not been a representation case pending wherein the employer was seeking to prevent or discourage those employees from voting. The Board found, contrary to the judge, that the employees enjoyed a reasonable expectation of recall; it did not, however, disturb his conclusion that the employer did not violate Section 8(a)(3) or (1) by converting the layoffs from temporary to permanent or by so informing the employees.

The instant case lies somewhere in the midst of the foregoing cases. The employees were informed that, in view of business forecasts, they should consider their layoffs as permanent. Respondent relied on the permanent layoff letter in the representation case to support its position that these employees had no reasonable expectation of recall and, one must suspect that the letter was prepared and sent in anticipation of the filing of a representation petition, in order to preserve just such an argument. Respondent had no practice of laying off employees permanently.[33] And, at the same time that the employees were sent the letters and the change notices, they were informed that they still had recall rights; they would be recalled if business picked up within a period of 1 year or the length of their employment, whichever was less, pursuant to Respondent's seniority policies. Their recall rights were voiced orally on 26 July, 8 August, and at the representation case hearing on 23 August. The recall policy was posted in the plant, at the Union's request, about 28 August. Moreover, as Respondent noted, the employees considered themselves laid off, not discharged, at least for the purpose of unemployment compensation, the employer did not dispute their UC claims, and the Union has, at all times, maintained that the employees had only been laid off temporarily and expected to be recalled. Whether Respondent's motive in sending out the 30 July change notices and the 29 July letter was to lay a foundation for arguments to be made in a representation case it expected to see filed or to fairly advise the employees that they should not idly await recall, I am satisfied from all the above that Respondent did not intend to discharge the employees. I am also convinced that the employees could not (and did not) reasonably interpret Respondent's action as a discharge. Accordingly, I shall recommend dismissal of this allegation.

e. The reprimand of Clyde and Blair

The General Counsel contends that the 4 September warnings given to Clyde and Blair for spending too much time talking and for working too slowly were motivated by their union activity. The evidence, I find, is insufficient to support this contention. Such warnings were consistent with Respondent's practices, these employees had previously been warned for similar conduct, and they had been observed working slowly and talking. Their slow work pace was consistent with their own stated intentions concerning working in the face of what they deemed to be a discriminatory layoff, nothing was said to them linking the discipline to their union activity, and no other union supporters were similarly disciplined. The warnings may not have been entirely fair in light of Harlan Fluitt's absence from the line that day, but I cannot find that they were discriminatory. Accordingly, I shall recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

4. The alleged refusal to bargain

Such limited unfair labor practices as I have found to have occurred do not rise to the level of either "outrageous," "pervasive," or "extensive" as those terms are used in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 NLRB 575 (1969), and its progeny to define when a bargaining order on the basis of authorization cards, without an election, is warranted. Virtually all the violations I have found involve Section 8(a)(1) and the most serious of those, involving the actions of a single first-line supervisor, occurred near the outset of the campaign. See Clark Equipment Co., 278 NLRB 498 (1986). As previously noted, none of the postlayoff violations were of the "hallmark" variety and such 8(a)(3) violations as I have found were essentially remedied by the Employer, who quickly reinstated all the employees about whom there was a question of discriminatory selection, with backpay. I cannot find that such violations, in these circumstances, preclude the possibility that the application of traditional remedies will permit a fair election to be conducted. Accordingly, I find it unnecessary to resolve Respondent's contentions with respect to the validity of 10 of the authorization cards and I shall recommend that the complaint's 8(a)(5) allegation be dismissed.

[33] The few change notices placed in evidence (R. Exhs. 51, 52, 53, and 54) that indicated that a given employee had been terminated or discharged "due to economic conditions" or "lack of work" do not establish such a practice. Three of the four are for an employee with only 4 to 6 weeks of employment and only one was for a unit employee. Two of the four issued in months when Respondent was not laying off other employees and only two issued at times when Respondent was laying off employees in any numbers. Even in the latter two cases, it appears that only these two employees were told that they were being terminated. All the rest of those laid off at the same times were simply told that they were being laid off.

III. THE REPRESENTATION CASE

A. The Challenged Ballots

1. The laid-off employees—a reasonable expectancy of recall

The ballots of 24 laid-off employees were challenged by the Board agent conducting the election.[34] Schwartz and the Union agree that the issue with respect to the eligibility of these voters is whether they had a reasonable expectancy of recall in the near and foreseeable future at the time of the election. "In determining whether laid-off employees have a reasonable expectancy of recall, the Board evaluates 'objective factors' which include 'the employer's past experience, the employer's future plans, the circumstances of the layoff, and what the employee[s] w[ere] told about the likelihood of recall.'" Atlas Metal Spinning Co., 266 NLRB 180 (1983); Tenneco Automotive, 273 NLRB 103, 105 (1984); Fabricators of Minnesota, 273 NLRB 511 (1984).

I am convinced that application of the foregoing standard to the facts of the instant case requires a conclusion that the laid-off employees enjoyed a reasonable expectancy of recall and were eligible voters. First, I note that Respondent's was a cyclical business, with its annual low point falling in the summer and business generally picking up in the fall. In line with the seasonal nature of its business, it regularly laid off and then recalled employees. That practice is recognized by Schwartz' seniority practices, whereby employees retain both seniority and recall rights for a period equal to the lesser of either 1 year or the length of their employment, and its insurance practices, whereby laid-off employees are instructed on how to convert their group to individual coverage. Such conversion facilitates re-entry into the group on recall and manifests a continuing interest in the terms and conditions of employment within the unit. Atlas Metal Spinning, supra.

Schwartz, however, contends that 1985 was different from prior years, that its business was at an extremely depressed level for the 3 months preceding the election with a continued poor outlook for many months thereafter, that the agricultural industry that it served was in a severe slump, that tractor prices were increasing, that its shipments were going into Ford's warehouses indicating slow retail sales, and that its inventory was up. The record, however, shows that the situation was not nearly as bleak as Respondent describes it. Portions of the farm economy were depressed but some farmers were making money, depending on their crops or their business acumen. Much of Schwartz' business, moreover, was in small loaders; those loaders were not all destined for the farm economy and Schwartz was seeing increased sales in those loaders. Ford had predicted 6000 loader orders in 1986, with increased orders for small loaders, as evidenced by Schwartz' own OEM report of 27 September 1985; this was an improvement over 1985, at least in total numbers. And, the Ford reports did not indicate any reason to be overly pessimistic. The report for September 1985, the last report received before the election, indicated substantial increases in Ford commitments for October, November, and December 1985 and January 1986 over the corresponding months of a year earlier. The October Ford report, dated 1 November, continued to show improvement over most of the months of a year before. Further, although inventory was at 183 pieces in October, up from 40 in August, it fell rapidly thereafter, to 71 by November. Even at 183, Schwartz had only about one-half a month's production in inventory. At the same time, Respondent had reduced its overshipped position very substantially by October and continued that trend until it was undershipped by nearly 70 small loaders and overshipped by only 37 large loaders by November. Schwartz was even further undershipped by the end of the year. By the time of the election, and thereafter, Respondent no longer had reason to be concerned with the prospect of Ford's continuing to "net out."

Further, unlike the employers in Tenneco Automative, supra, Foam Fabricators, supra, and S & G Concrete, 274 NLRB 895 (1985), where the Board found no reasonable expectancy of recall, Schwartz was not engaged in any longterm effort to reduce the size of its work force. Neither was it faced with the loss of a major customer or with new sources of competition. Every indication this Employer and the employees had at the time of the election tended to indicate that Schwartz' business was picking up and was going to continue in much the same fashion, and at much the same levels, as it had since Amerequip acquired the plant.

Finally, the Board's test calls for consideration of what the employees were told when they were laid off. The employees were told, on the one hand, that their layoffs were "permanent" or that they were "discharged." That statement, I suspect, was purposely phrased with an eye toward the representation case Respondent expected to see filed. On the other hand, the employees were also repeatedly assured that they would be recalled when work picked up. Based on their prior experience with this Employer, and the statements earlier made by the Employer in May and July, they could anticipate that work would pick up in the fall, as it had in the past. I conclude that what the employees were told generally supports their reasonable expectancy of recall. At most, the statements that they were permanently laid off neutralize the statements about recall when work picks up and are neutralized in turn by them.

Accordingly, I must conclude that the 24 laid-off employees had a reasonable expectancy of recall at the time of the election and were eligible voters whose ballots should be opened and counted. I shall therefore recommend that the challenges to their ballots be overruled.

2. The supervisory status of Charles Erickson

The Union challenged the ballot of Charles Erickson, nominally a group leader included within the unit, on the grounds that he was a statutory supervisor. As only the Union proffered evidence on this issue, the following facts are undisputed:

Until May 1985, Dave Steenblock was the night-shift supervisor, over all the departments, and Erickson was the welding department group leader. In May, Steenblock left and Erickson was the only person remaining on the night shift with authority on behalf of management, overseeing 20 to 30 employees. He continued in this capacity until December. During this period, he was referred to by management as the foreman in at least one notice to employees (U. Exh. 1), he wrote comments on employee change notices concerning the employees' work habits and efficiency and signed those notices as the foreman. Those change notices were cosigned by higher management (U. Exhs. 2, 3, 4, 6, and 7(a)–(i)). He granted vacation leave on his own authority, he issued at least one written reprimand threatening discharge (U. Exh. 5), he orally reprimanded at least one employee, he assigned and checked work, he called job applicants who had formerly worked at the Company and told them to report for work, and he interviewed and hired at least one employee.

In order to establish that an individual is a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, it is only necessary that one show that the individual, exercising independent judgment, has the authority to do any one of the following: "hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or to effectively recommend such action . . . ." The undisputed evidence establishes that Erickson possessed, for at least 5 months before the election, and continuing for several months after that, the authority to hire, to assign, to discipline, and to responsibly direct the employees on the night shift. Indeed, if he did not, those employees would have been unsupervised during this entire period. Accordingly, I find that he was a statutory supervisor at the time of the election and recommend that the Union-Petitioner's challenge to his ballot be sustained.

B. The Objections

Consolidated for hearing with the unfair labor practice allegations and challenges were four union-filed objections to the conduct of the election plus one allegation uncovered in the course of the investigation. All these objections track unfair labor practice allegations.

As previously set forth, I have found that Schwartz did not discriminatorily lay off or employees on 8 August. Similarly, I have found that it did not discriminatorily discipline Dale Clyde and Ed Blair on 4 September. Accordingly, I shall recommend that the objections to this conduct be overruled.

Union Objection 3 alleges as objectionable conduct the Employers' ejection of Larry Krueger and John Miller from the plant lunchroom about 4 October. Its Objection 6 alleges the Employer's coercive distribution of hats and "Vote No" buttons about 17 October. I have found both of these actions, which occurred after the petition was filed, violative of Section 8(a)(1). Pursuant to the Board's usual policy, a new election is to be directed "whenever an unfair labor practice occurs during the critical period since '[c]onduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) is, a fortiori, conduct which interferes with the exercise of a free and untrammeled choice in an election.'" Dal-Tex Optical Co., 137 NLRB 1782, 1786 (1962), quoted with approval in Clark Equipment Co., 278 NLRB 498, 505 (1986).

Schwartz, however, argues that even if this conduct is found violative of Section 8(a)(1), it is de minimis, minor, or technical in nature, affected only a few employees and, therefore, should not result in the election being set aside. I cannot agree. Unlike the conduct involved in Clark Equipment, supra, General Felt Industries, 269 NLRB 474 (1984), and Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 232 NLRB 717 (1977), and contrary to the Employer's assertion, the conduct here affected and was known to virtually every employee in the unit. Krueger and Miller were ordered out of the lunchroom while they were engaged in conversation with other employees; those other employees could not help but observe their ejection. Further, that ejection potentially precluded Miller and Krueger from reaching more employees with their prounion message. Schwartz' second violation within the critical period reached even more employees; the hats and "Vote No" buttons were distributed in meetings involving all the employees on both shifts. Moreover, the Board has already held that the coercive distribution of antiunion insignia tends to restrain employee free choice and, in and of itself, warrants that the election be set aside. Tappan Co., 254 NLRB 656 (1981) (Member Penello dissenting); Pillowtex Corp., 234 NLRB 560 (1978). Finally, I take note of the fact that here, unlike Clark Equipment and General Felt, the vote was close, 23 to 31. The unfair labor practices clearly reached enough employees to have had some effect on the outcome.

C. Challenges and Objections—Conclusion

I have heretofore recommended that 24 of the challenged ballots be opened and counted. In the event that the revised tally of ballots establishes that the Union has secured a majority of the valid votes cast, a Certification of Representative should issue. If it does not, I recommend that the election conducted on 29 October 1985 be set aside on the basis of Union Objections 3 and 6, and a rerun election be conducted.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Inasmuch as Don Rol, Edwin Gross, and Dennis Reifers, the employees whom I found to have been discriminatorily laid off, were reinstated with full backpay, no further reinstatement or backpay order is warranted.

FURTHER CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By interrogating its employees concerning their union membership, activities, and desires or the union membership, activities, and desires of their fellow employees; by threatening employees with discharge because they engaged in union activities; by discriminatori-

ly prohibiting laid-off employees from engaging in union activity in nonwork areas of the plant; and by coercively distributing antiunion insignia in such a way as to interrogate employees concerning their support for the Union or for the Company, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

2. By discriminatorily selecting Don Rol, Edwin Gross, and Dennis Reifers for layoff because they engaged in union activities, Respondent has discriminated against those employees because of their union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

3. The unfair labor practices enumerated above are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. Respondent has not engaged in any unfair labor practices not specifically found herein.

5. The employees who were laid off on 26 July and 8 August 1985 had a reasonable expectancy of recall at the time of the election were eligible voters in that election, and the challenges to their ballots must be overruled.

6. Charles Erickson was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, and the challenge to his ballot must be sustained.

7. Certain of the unfair labor practices set forth in subparagraph (1), above, occurring after 6 August 1985, have interfered with the employees' rights to a free and untrammeled choice in the election conducted in Case 18-RC-13822 on 29 October 1985 and have tainted the results of that election.

Pacific Northwest Newspaper Guild Local 82 (The Seattle Times) and Kenneth Johnston. Case 19–CB–5614

July 15, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN JOHANSEN AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On June 30, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Jerrold H. Shapiro issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel and the Charging Party filed answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Pacific Northwest Newspaper Guild Local 82, Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

---

[1] We agree with the judge's finding that the increased portion of the membership dues here did not constitute "periodic dues" within the meaning of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act. In so doing, however, we find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's discussion of the standard to be applied in determining whether the purposes for which dues payments are expended will cause such payments to fall outside the definition of "periodic dues" as that term is used in Sec. 8(a)(3).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JERROLD H. SHAPIRO, Administrative Law Judge. The hearing in this case, held 1 April 1987, is based on an unfair labor practice charge filed 13 September 1985 by Kenneth Johnston (Johnston)[1] against Pacific Northwest Newspaper Guild Local 82 (Respondent), and on a complaint issued 15 August 1986 by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board (Board), alleging that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), by threatening to cause The Seattle Times to discharge its employees Johnston and Tonya King (King) pursuant to the union-security agreement between Respondent and The Seattle Times because Johnston and King "refused to pay an assessment for Respondent's strike fund and monies to build a new headquarters building in Washington, D.C., and for reasons other than the employees' failure to tender periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining commission membership in Respondent." Respondent filed an answer and an amended answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices and affirmatively alleging that the proceeding was barred by the second proviso of 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4) and that the maintenance of the proceeding constitutes an abuse of the Board's processes because The Seattle Times directly and through its agent, Davis, Wright & Jones, effectively, controls Charging Party Johnston in his "employee" and litigant status.

On the entire record, from my observation of the demeanor of Charles Perlik, the only witness, and having considered the posthearing briefs, I make the following

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYER INVOLVED

The Seattle Times is a State of Washington corporation, with an office and place of business in Seattle, Washington, where it is engaged in the business of newspaper publishing, distribution, and sales.

During the 12-month period immediately prior to the issuance of the complaint, The Seattle Times derived gross revenues in excess of $200,000, held membership in or subscribed to various interstate news services, including the United Press International and Associated Press, published various nationally syndicated features, including Doonesbury, and advertised various nationally sold products, including Panasonic video cassette recorders and Ford Motor Company automobiles.

The Seattle Times is, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent Pacific Northwest Newspaper Guild Local 82 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Evidence

Respondent is an affiliate of The Newspaper Guild, AFL–CIO (Guild), an International Union, whose principal office is located in Washington, D.C. Respondent's dues structure is established by article XVII of the Guild's constitution. In 1985 article XVII read in pertinent part as follows:

> Section 2(b). Monthly dues. The monthly dues fixed and maintained by Locals . . . shall not be less than the Minimum Dues Schedule set forth in Section 2(c) of this Article. In addition, the monthly dues of each member shall include the amounts set forth in Section 2(d) of this Article.

Section 2(c). The Minimum Dues Schedule shall be either that listed under Table A: [sets out a minimum dues schedule under Table A for various wage levels and also includes a Table B] or five percent of one week's regular weekly compensation up to the maximum required by the above schedules, plus $1.50, or a dues schedule which yields at least an equivalent total dues income.

Based on 1985 Convention action, following approval by the general membership by a Guild wide referendum to be held after January 1986, the foregoing paragraph shall be changed to read: "or a percentage of one week's regular weekly compensation up to the maximum required by the above schedules, as follows: 5 percent, plus $1.50, through and including June 30, 1986; and 6 percent, effective July 1, 1986; or a dues schedule which yields at least an equivalent total dues income."

Section 2(d). The monthly dues of each member shall include, for all months except when The Newspaper Guild is in a reduced dues period as defined in Section 2(e) of this Article, and except for the one-month period referred to in the second paragraph of Subsection (e) of this Section, the difference between the amounts set forth under Table A and Table B of Section 2(c) of this Article.[2] In lieu of as an alternative to the foregoing, the Minimum Dues of each member shall include 3.2 percent of one week's regular weekly compensation if paid monthly, or 0.745 percent of one week's regular weekly compensation if paid weekly, up to the maximum required by the foregoing.

Section 2(e). Reduced Dues Period. Except for the one-month period referred to in the second paragraph of this Subsection, The Newspaper Guild will be in a reduced dues period whenever the International Defense Fund reaches $6 million and will remain in a reduced dues period thereafter until the International Defense Fund is below $4,500,000. No accounts receivable shall be counted in calculating the dollar amounts referred to in this Subsection (e). The Secretary-Treasurer shall notify all Locals when TNG is in a reduced dues period, and the dues specified in Section 2(d) shall not be payable during said period.

When the dollar amounts in the International Defense Fund reach $6 million for the first time following August 1, 1985, then for the ensuing month the monthly dues of each member shall include dues equal to the rates required under Subsection (d) of this Section, with the income produced thereby to be used exclusively to fund TNG's severance pay liability to its staff.

Also relevant are sections 7(c) and (d), sections 8(a) and (b), and sections 13 and 14 of article XVII, which read as follows:

> Section 7(c). Out of every per capita payment under (a)(1) [referring to the per capita tax the local unions are required to remit to the Guild from the dues, initiation fees and assessments collected from the membership], less $1.35, 15 percent shall be deposited in the International Defense Fund effective May 1, 1982, through January 31, 1987 . . . .
> Section 7(d). The entire amount of every per capita payment under (a)(2) shall be deposited in the International Defense Fund.[3]
> Section 8(a). An International assessment is hereby levied on each member for the months of July and August 1984 in an amount equivalent to that which would be added to a member's monthly dues, pursuant to Section 2(d) of this Article, for months when TNG is not in a reduced dues period.
> Any constitutional provision to the contrary notwithstanding, this assessment shall be deposited to a special account of the General Fund. Funds from the special account shall be used for the exclusive purpose of organizing and attendant expenses.
> Members shall not be required to pay both the assessment and Section 2(d) dues for the same month(s).
> If in July and/or August 1984, TNG is not in a reduced dues period, amounts collected by TNG under Section 7(a)(2) of this article for either or both of those months shall be deposited to the special account, rather than to the Defense Fund as per Section 7(d) of this Article.
> Section 8(b). The IEB or the Convention may levy an international assessment for the Defense Fund upon the membership while the Defense Fund contains 15 percent or less of its ceiling figure and after all credit lines have been exhausted in the judgment of the President and the Secretary-Treasurer.
> Section 13. All funds received by The Newspaper Guild, with the exception of assessments and International Defense Fund per capita, and with the exception of funds earmarked by Locals for the purchase of group insurance for Local members, shall be deposited to the general account. All assessments, Defense fund contributions and International Defense Fund per capita shall be deposited in the International Defense Fund. Funds earmarked by Locals for the purchase of group insurance shall be deposited in an insurance fund account. The three funds shall be kept in separate accounts in a bank or banks. In an emergency, the IEB shall have the authority to transfer money between the general account and the International Defense Fund, but such action shall be reported to the next Convention for specific approval

---

[2] Although the language is ambiguous it is undisputed that sec. 2(d) dues are computed by adding the difference between the amounts set forth in Tables A and B to the amount of the sec. 2(c) dues set forth in Table A.

[3] Sec. 7(a)(2) provides that for each payment of dues specified in sec. 2(d) of art. XVII, the full amount shall be remitted by the local unions to the Guild.

> Section 14. TNG funds shall be expended only for activity within the constitutional purposes of TNG. Expenditures for strike activities, for other activities of an emergency nature, and for purposes authorized by Convention action or referendum and in the manner and subject to the limitations prescribed thereby, shall be made from the International Defense Fund, at the direction of the IEB. Expenditures also shall be made from the International Defense Fund in accordance with Section 7(g) of this Article[4] . . . . Normal operating expenses and all other expenditures shall be made from the General Fund.

The above-described dues structure in sections 2(c) through (e) of article XVII of the Guild's constitution, first appeared in the Guild's 1972 constitution. It was adopted as the result of action taken by the delegates to the Guild's annual convention held in the summer of 1972. The Guild's finance committee made the following report and recommendation which was adopted by the convention:

> When the Guild first established an International Defense Fund it was thought that the fund could be maintained at the necessary and desirable levels by diverting out of regular monthly per capita payments a specified percentage, with only an occasional need for supplemental contributions from Guild members. Because these supplemental contributions were expected to be sporadic and infrequent, they were labelled "assessments." In recent years, however, it has become evident that in order to maintain the Defense Fund at a desireable level, supplemental contributions have been required on a regular and periodic basis—nearly four years of them, in fact, starting in January 1968. Indeed, it's obvious that the contributions required to maintain the Defense Fund have become an integral and periodic part of the Guild's dues structure.
> In fact, it is now clear that the label "assessment" is a misnomer as applied to the International Defense Fund contributions, and the Finance Committee recommends that this convention make whatever changes are necessary to our international Constitution to clarify those payments and recognize them for what they are—a periodic and integral part of the regular dues structure of our union.
> What we are saying is that the Finance Committee is urging this convention to change the words to fit the facts; we are not recommending any change in the level or frequency of dues our members are being called upon to pay or the level of reduced dues payments required constitutionally when the Defense Fund reaches two million dollars.

Consistent with the finance committee's report and recommendation, the Guild's constitution committee recommended that article XVII of the constitution be amended so the Guild's dues structure would be as described, supra, in sections 2(c) through (e) of article XVII of the 1985 constitution. The constitution committee's recommended amendment, adopted by the convention, contained the following preamble:

> Whereas the Newspaper Guild (TNG) has for many years maintained a permanent International Defense Fund and regards the continuing vitality of that Fund as essential to the interests of TNG's members; and
> Whereas, it was originally conceived that the Fund could be maintained at desired levels by a specific percentage of per capita, with only an occasional need for supplemental contributions; and
> Whereas, because supplemental contributions were expected to be sporadic and infrequent they were denominated "assessments"; and
> Whereas, in recent years it has become evident that in order to maintain the Defense Fund at desired levels supplemental contributions have been required on a regular and periodic basis (so that, for example, "assessments" were required for 46 consecutive months from January 1968 to November 1971); and
> Whereas, it has become self-evident that the contributions required to maintain the Defense Fund are an integral part of TNG's dues structure, and the lable "assessments" is a misnomer; and
> Whereas, TNG wishes to clarify the status of these payments and to recognize them as a periodic and integral part of the regular dues structure and not as assessments.
> Now, therefore, it is: Resolved, that article XVII of the International Constitution shall be amended as follows:

As I have found, supra, the dues structure as it appears in sections 2(c) through (e) of article XVII of the Guild's 1985 constitution has existed in that form since the Guild's 1972 convention. In 1971, prior to the adoption of this structure, article XVII read, in pertinent part, as follows: section 2(c) provided that monthly dues shall not be less than the minimum dues schedule set forth in that section; section 6(a) required the locals affiliated with the Guild to remit to the Guild, as a per capita tax, a certain percentage of the monthly dues, initiation fees, and assessments they collected from the membership; section 6(c) provided that from each per capita payment of the members' monthly dues remitted to the Guild by the locals, less 10 cents, 40 percent shall be deposited in the International defense fund and that when on or after 1 August 1971 the fund shall exceed $2 million, in the following month and thereafter, out of every said per capita payment, less 10 cents, 30 percent shall be deposited to the fund; Section 7 provided that in an "emergency" the Guild's executive board was empowered to levy International assessments for the International defense fund on the entire membership on the basis of members' regular weekly compensation at a rate of not more than one assessment in 1 month in accordance with a rate schedule set forth in section 7; section 7 defined an "emergency" as whenever the International defense fund fell below $2 million and further provided that when the fund reached $2 million an emergency shall also again exist whenever the fund is below $1,500,000 and would continue only until the fund reached $2 million. As was the case with the Guild's 1985 constitution, supra, the 1971 constitution provided for all assessments and International defense fund contributions and International defense fund per capita to be deposited in the International defense fund rather than the general fund, but in an emergency the Guild's executive board was given the authority to transfer money between the general account and the International defense fund, subject to the approval of the next convention. Also, as was the case with the 1985 constitution, supra, the 1971 constitution provided that "[e]xpenditures for strike activities, for other activities of an emergency nature, and for purposes authorized by Convention action or referendum and in the manner and subject to the limitations prescribed thereby, shall be made from the International Defense Fund, at the direction of the [Guild's executive board]" and that "normal operating expenses and all other expenditures shall be made from the General Fund."

[4] Sec. 7(g) provides that "[i]n the event a strike or lockout results in a reduction of per capita payments that otherwise would be made to the General Fund, an amount equal to such reduction shall be transferred monthly from the International Defense Fund to the General Fund."

To sum up, the Guild historically has maintained an International defense fund which is currently financed by a percentage (15 percent) of the members' dues and by an increase in dues payments when the defense fund falls below a certain level. Prior to 1972 when the defense fund fell below a certain level as defined by the constitution, the Guild's members, pursuant to the constitution, were required to pay an "assessment," if the Guild's executive board ordered an "assessment," until the amount of money in the fund increased to the level set by the constitution. As a result of the above-described amendment to the constitution in 1972, this "assessment" was referred to as "dues" and became a part of the Guild's dues structure and since then, pursuant to the constitution, whenever the International defense fund falls below a certain figure set by the constitution, the members are required to pay increased dues with the increased portion of the dues being transmitted by the locals to the Guild for deposit in the defense fund until the fund's level has been raised to the level set by the constitution, at which time membership dues are reduced to their former reduced level, as required by the constitution.

Since the above-described amendment to the Guild's constitution, the Guild's members on four separate occasions have been required to pay the increased amount of dues for the purpose of raising the level of the International defense fund to reach the level mandated by the constitution. During the period from 1 January 1972 until 1 April 1987, the date of the hearing in this case, the aforesaid membership dues payments, referred to by the Guild and its members as "Section 2(d) dues" or "regular dues," were made on the following dates: May 1972 through March 1973; March, April, and May 1976; September 1978 through April 1981; and August 1985 through February 1986.

During the last 15 years the Guild has required its members to pay "assessments," in addition to their monthly dues, on three separate occasions: March and April 1975; March and April 1977; and July and August 1984. In each instance these assessments were levied for the specific purpose of paying for the Guild's organizational activities and were collected from the locals affiliated with the Guild pursuant to the procedure described, supra, in section 8(a) of article XVII of the Guild's constitution, as set forth in the 1985 constitution.

During the past 10 years the principal use for the funds in the Guild's International defense fund has been to pay the weekly strike benefits to striking or locked-out Guild members and to pay all the other expenses incidental to the strikes and lockouts involving the Guild's constituent locals, i.e., litigation expenses and salaries of the representatives assigned by the Guild to advise locals during strikes and/or lockouts. Also during a strike or lockout, money from the International defense fund is transferred to the Guild's general fund to compensate for the lower per capita payments by locals when their members are locked out or striking.

In addition, the International defense fund during the past 10 years has been used to make nonstrike- or lockout-related payments, as follows: (1) loans and grants to locals affiliated with the Guild; (2) contributions to unions not affiliated with the Guild; (3) the fees of professionals, i.e., attorneys and accountants, for labor dispute related cases involving affiliated locals; (4) by 1985 convention action, "2(d) dues" payments—payments normally made to the International defense fund—were used to pay more than $400,000 to satisfy the Guild's severance pay liability to Guild employees; (5) in 1985, the Guild's convention authorized an interest-free loan of $750,000 from the International defense fund to the Guild's general fund to be used to purchase a headquarters building for the Guild; (6) for a period of several years the Guild's general fund borrowed money from the Guild's International defense fund and in 1979, by convention action, $678,000 was owed the International defense fund by the general fund as the result of these loans was written off as uncollectible; and (7) administrative and miscellaneous expenses were paid from the International defense fund, including interest on moneys borrowed by the Guild in emergencies, to replenish the defense fund and the cost of printing checks.

Regarding the loans and grants made from the International defense fund to locals for nonstrike- or lockout-related purposes, the record reveals grants or loans for the following purposes: locals' legal expenses incurred in litigating representation and unfair labor practice cases before the National Labor Relations Board; locals' legal expenses incurred in prosecuting contractual grievances before arbitrators; locals' legal expenses incurred in civil lawsuits; expenses incurred by a local in negotiating a nationwide contract, and the expenses incurred by another local whose funds were exhausted as a result of protracted contract negotiations; the expenses incurred by a local in hiring a bankruptcy lawyer to assist it in an effort to keep a potentially bankrupt company in business, and the further expenses incurred by that local in its effort to find a buyer for the business in question; the operating expenses of locals in emergency situations such as, in one case, when a local was without funds because an employer refused to remit its members' monthly dues and, in another case, when a local's funds were depleted by the negotiations of an initial contract and, in another case, a loan of over $200,000 to a local to restore its emergency fund to a level to enable the local to lift its members from the burden of an ongoing special dues rate which was having the effect of eroding membership levels.

Regarding the Guild's contributions from the International defense fund to other unions, the Guild contributed money to support strikes by other unions including a $25,000 contribution to support the striking airline traffic controllers (PATCO), contributed to help locked-out workers represented by other unions, contributed to the campaign being waged by unions in several States against right-to-work legislation outlawing union-security agreements, and contributed $2500 to the Polish Workers Aid Fund to assist workers in Poland.

Regarding the payment of $400,000 in severance pay, the record reveals that by virtue of collective-bargaining contracts with other labor organizations who represent the Guild's employees, the Guild was obligated to pay severance pay to approximately 31 or 32 of its employees who had been permanently terminated due to a reduction in its staff. As described, supra, in the 1985 constitution, the money used by the Guild to meet this severance pay obligation was collected from the membership in the following manner: After the International defense fund in January 1986 reached the $6 million ceiling set by the constitution, the membership paid "2(d) dues" for 1 more month for the sole purpose of raising the necessary amount of money to satisfy the Guild's severance pay obligation. This money, more than $400,000, was not deposited in the International defense fund, but was deposited in a separate trust fund maintained solely for the severance pay moneys.

Regarding the 1985 authorization of an interest-free loan of $750,000 to be used to purchase a headquarters building for the Guild, the record reveals the Guild spends a substantial sum of money renting office space and that the Guild's 1985 convention decided that economically it made more sense for the Guild to own a building rather than pay rent, so the convention authorized the Guild to either build or buy an office building and for the defense fund to make an interest-free loan of $750,000 to the Guild for this purpose.

Regarding the Guild's action in 1979 in writing off as uncollectible $678,000 which the Guild had borrowed from the International defense fund for its general fund, the record reveals that for 8 to 10 years before 1979, part of the per capita membership dues allocated to the International defense fund was never transferred from the Guild's general fund to the defense fund.[5] During those years the general fund showed a deficit, so these moneys that should have been transferred from the general fund to the International defense fund were used with other union funds to pay the day-to-day operating expenses of the Guild. This was done with the full knowledge of membership and was carried as a debt on the general fund's books of account and as an account receivable on the defense fund's books of account. In 1979 these loans totaled over $750,000. The membership, at the 1979 convention, decided to cancel these loans because they did not represent either a true asset or liability of the Guild. Since 1979 there have been no loans from the Guild's International defense fund to the Guild's general fund.

As described in detail supra, the Guild has separate provisions in its constitution for collecting dues, including "2(d) dues," and for collecting "assessments." Consistent with these separate provisions, the Guild provides a receipt form to its locals, which has separate spaces for recording dues and assessments and also provides separate receipt stamps for recording dues and assessments in members' records. Likewise, the Guild's books of account treat "2(d) dues" and "assessments" differently inasmuch as all dues, including "2(d) dues" allocated to the defense fund, are listed by the Guild's accountants as Guild income in computing the Guild's net worth. Assessments, when imposed, are separately recorded and are not included in the accountants' calculations of the Guild's net worth.

As described in detail supra, the Guild's dues are a monthly obligation and the amount of the dues owed varies with members' salaries. During the last 5 months of 1985, so-called reduced dues equaled 5 percent of an individual's weekly compensation, plus $1.50, paid once a month. "Regular dues," also referred to as "2(d) dues," equaled 8.2 percent of an individual's weekly compensation, plus $1.50, paid once a month. "2(d) dues" are collected when the reserves in the Guild's defense fund fall below $4.5 million and continued to be collected until the reserves in the defense fund reach $6 million, at which point the "reduced dues" schedule is reinstituted.[6] The Guild's leadership, within the limits of their ability to estimate the International defense fund's reserves, has followed the formula in the constitution when initiating and ending "regular" dues periods on three of the four occasions when "2(d) dues" were instituted.[7] The record reveals, however, that it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the Guild to anticipate when it will be necessary to impose a period of "regular" or "2(d) dues" or to predict with a degree of certainty the length of time such a period will last. The reasons for this unpredictability is that the basis for such decisions depends on a number of unpredictable events such as the failure of one or more of the locals to make their monthly per capita dues payments in a timely fashion, the number and length of the strikes that may occur, the number of employees involved in the strikes, the Guild's inability to negotiate a loan to replenish the International defense fund, or the necessity to repay such a loan.

[5] The record reveals that the full amount of monthly per capita dues transmitted by the locals to the Guild is placed in the general fund "for the convenience of bookkeeping purposes," and that at the end of the quarterly accounting periods the Guild's auditor directs the bookkeeper to transfer what is constitutionally required from the general fund to the International defense fund.

[6] The reserve levels that trigger "2(d) dues" and "reduced dues" periods have been changed periodically throughout the years by the Guild's membership at annual conventions.

[7] The single exception involved the Guild's decision in February 1985 to wait several months before initiating a "2(d) dues" period, despite a slightly less than $4.5 million reserve.

Respondent and The Seattle Times are parties to a collective-bargaining contract containing a lawful union-security provision which, among other things, provides that if any member of Respondent loses his or her good standing as a member by falling 1 month behind in their dues or assessments, uniformly required as a condition of retaining membership, The Seattle Times shall, on formal notice from Respondent, terminate their employment.

Johnston and King are employed by The Seattle Times in the unit covered by this collective-bargaining contract. In 1981, after having been employed in the contractual unit by The Seattle Times for several years, they resigned their membership in Respondent and agreed to comply with the contractual union-security provision by paying to Respondent the equivalent of periodic dues uniformly required of Respondent's membership. By changing their membership status from full to financial core members, Johnston and King lost a number of rights they had as full members, including the right to vote for or against strike authorizations, the right to strike benefits, and the right to vote at contract ratification meetings or on other issues presented to the membership.

From May 1981 through July 1985 dues were collected by Respondent at the "reduced dues" level and Johnston and King paid these dues without objection. In August 1985 the Guild, as described supra, instituted the collection of "regular dues," also known as "2(d) dues," which remained in effect from August 1985 through February 1986.

In its July 1985 report to the membership about the Guild's convention and in its August 1985 newsletter to the membership, Respondent described the imposition of the "Section 2(d) dues" schedule as a "temporary increase" in dues required by the constitution.

Johnston and King, by letters, notified Respondent they refused to pay the difference between the "reduced dues" and the "2(d) dues," because, as financial core members they stated they believed they were not obligated to pay this additional sum of money, which in their opinion constituted a "special assessment," not the equivalent of "dues." Respondent replied, by letters, that the difference between the former level of dues and the current level was because of the change in the regular periodic dues of Respondent and did not constitute an assessment, and warned Johnston and King, if they did not pay the money Respondent was requesting, Respondent would request The Seattle Times to discharge them, under the terms of the contractual union-security agreement. A copy of this warning was sent to The Seattle Times.[8] Johnston and King eventually paid all the dues being requested, but informed Respondent they were paying all the dues requested under protest.

B. Discussion and Conclusions

1. The affirmative defenses

In its amended answer, Respondent alleged two affirmative defenses: (1) "This proceeding is barred by 29 U.S.C. Sec. 411(a)(4), second proviso"; and, (2) "The Seattle Times controls Charging Parties in their employee and litigant status[,] [h]ence maintenance of this proceeding constitutes an abuse of Board process."[9] The sole evidence presented by Respondent in support of its affirmative defenses was an admission of the Charging Party's lawyers, Davis, Wright & Jones, that all the Charging Party's legal fees incurred in connection with the investigation and prosecution of the instant charge before the Board have been paid by The Seattle Times, the Charging Party's employer.[10] For the reasons set forth below I am persuaded that Respondent's affirmative defenses are without merit.

Assuming arguendo that The Seattle Times' payment of the Charging Party's legal fees associated with the filing and the prosecution of the unfair labor practice charges in this case, when considered with other information subpoenaed by Respondent, establishes that The Seattle Times initiated, supported, and assisted the Charging Party in filing and maintaining the charge in violation of the Act, it would not disqualify the Charging Party from filing and maintaining the charge. For, unfair labor practices on the part of The Seattle Times, if established, could neither extinguish the right of its employees to be free from Respondent's alleged unfair labor practices, nor justify the Respondent's alleged statutory infringement of employees' rights. The Act provided Respondent with ready redress if it thought The Seattle Times violated the Act in connection with the filing of the charge in this case. It could have filed an appropriate charge with the Board's General Counsel for her independent determination whether The Seattle Times had violated the Act by initiating or otherwise aiding the Charging Party in the filing of the charges, Respondent did not do so. It is for all of these reasons that I reject Respondent's affirmative defense that because of The Seattle Times' control over the Charging Party's status as a litigant, the maintenance of this proceeding constitutes an abuse of the Board's authority. ---

[8] In its answer and in its amended answer to the complaint and in its "Memorandum Opposing Petitions to Revoke Subpoenas," Respondent admits that, pursuant to the contractual union-security provision in its contract with The Seattle Times, it demanded that The Seattle Times discharge Johnston and King (G.C. Exhs. 1(g), (k), and (l) and R. Exh. 1).

[9] Respondent served The Seattle Times, and Davis, Wright & Jones, the law firm that represents the Charging Party in this proceeding, with subpoenas duces tecum requesting documents and records which it contended were relevant to proving its affirmative defenses. The Seattle Times and Davis, Wright & Jones filed timely petitions to revoke those subpoenas and Respondent filed a memorandum opposing the petitions to revoke. The matter was referred by Deputy Chief Administrative Law Judge William Pannier to Administrative Law Judge Richard D. Taplitz for ruling. On 25 November 1986 Judge Taplitz issued an order granting the petitions to revoke the subpoenas. Respondent has not requested that I consider the propriety of Judge Taplitz' order, but introduced into evidence all the documents relating to the subpoena enforcement issue so as to preserve the issue for review by the Board.

[10] This admission was included in the petition to revoke Davis, Wright & Jones' subpoena.

As to Respondent's remaining affirmative defense dealing with the applicability of the second proviso to 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4) to this proceeding, I am of the opinion that regardless of the degree of control exercised by the Charging Party's employer, The Seattle Times, over the filing and maintenance of the charge, the proviso does not apply to this proceeding because: (1) Charging Party Johnston was not a member of Respondent; and (2) the proviso does not preclude relief sought by the filing of an unfair labor practice charge under the National Labor Relations Act.

Johnston, who had been a member of Respondent when he initially began his employment in 1979, resigned his membership in 1981 and, since that time, his sole obligation toward Respondent has been to pay the equivalent of the periodic dues uniformly required to be paid by Respondent's membership, pursuant to the contractual union-security agreement between Respondent and The Seattle Times. As a nonmember of Respondent, Johnston is not bound by the Guild's constitution and/or Respondent's bylaws. Also, unlike Respondent's members, Johnston and the other nonmember employees represented by the Respondent, who have opted for financial core status, are ineligible to vote in Respondent's elections or referendums, including the election of officers and referendums dealing with the subject of dues, and are ineligible to participate at Respondent's membership meetings, including meetings dealing with contract ratification and strike authorization votes, and are ineligible to receive strike benefits.

It is provided in 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4) that "[n]o labor organization shall limit the right of any member thereof to institute an action in any court or in a proceeding before any administrative agency. . . ." The second proviso to § 411(a)(4) provides "that no interested employer or employer association shall directly or indirectly finance, encourage, or participate in, except as a party, any such action, proceeding, appearance, or petition." Thus, the protection of the right to sue and the prohibition against employer financial involvement embodied in § 411(a)(4) pertains to a "member" of a labor organization defined in 29 U.S.C. § 402(o) the meaning of the word "member" as used in 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4) is as follows:

> "Member" or "member in good standing," when used in reference to a labor organization, includes a person who has fulfilled the requirements for membership in such organization, and who neither has voluntarily withdrawn from membership nor has been expelled or suspended from membership."

The meaning of the word "member" as used in 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4) is further delineated in 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(1) and (2) as follows:

> Every member of a labor organization shall have equal rights and privileges within such organization to nominate candidates, to vote in elections or referendums of the labor organization, to attend membership meetings, and to participate in the deliberations and voting upon the business of such meetings. . . . Every member of any labor organization shall have the right to meet and assemble freely with other members; and to express any views . . . and to express at meetings of the labor organizations his views, upon candidates in an election of the labor organization or upon any business properly before the meeting.

I find that having resigned from membership in Respondent and having none of the rights and obligations normally associated with membership in a labor organization, other than the obligation to comply with the union-security agreement between his employer and Respondent by paying the equivalent of periodic dues, Johnston is not a "member" of a labor organization as that term is used in 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4) and for this reason I find the second proviso to § 411(a)(4) does not apply to Johnston's charge in this case. Klemens v. Air Line Pilots, 500 F.Supp. 735, 737–738 (W.D. Wash. 1980).

Alternatively, I find that Johnston's charge in this case is not barred by the second proviso of 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4) because the proviso does not preclude relief sought by the filing of an unfair labor practice charge under the National Labor Relations Act. In Painters Local (Saxon Enterprises), 273 NLRB 13, 15, 17–18 (1984), the Board affirmed Administrative Law Judge Russell L. Stevens' opinion that the second proviso of § 411(a)(4) was not applicable to the unfair labor practice charges filed in that case because (273 NLRB at 17–18):

> Assuming, arguendo, that [the Employer] indirectly encouraged this litigation, such a fact would not be a defense to the commission of unfair labor practices. Possibly such a fact would be cause for proceeding in some other forum, under some other statute, against persons or firms not party to this controversy, but that fact would be collateral, and irrelevant, to the complaint involved in this controversy.

See also Adamszewski v. Machinists Local 1487, 496 F.2d 777 (7th Cir. 1974), in which the court found that the second proviso of 29 U.S.C. § 411(a)(4) did not preclude relief sought pursuant to 45 U.S.C. §§ 151–188 of the Railway Labor Act, if otherwise properly brought. 496 F.2d at 784. The basis for this conclusion was that Section 413 of Title 29 preserved preexisting remedies of union members existing under any other Federal law,[11] and that Section 523(b) further provided that nothing in Sections 401–531 of Title 29 shall supersede or impair the provisions of the Railway Labor Act or the National Labor Relations Act or the rights conferred thereby.[12]

2. The alleged unfair labor practices

For over 25 years the Guild has maintained an International defense fund for the purpose of paying the expenses incurred by its constituent locals connected with strikes and lockouts, including the payment of strike benefits. The International defense fund has also been used to make nonstrike- or nonlockout-related loans and grants to Guild-affiliated locals and to make loans or grants to other unions. Also the International defense fund has been used to pay the Guild's general operating expenses when its treasury lacks sufficient money. In addition money from the International defense fund is transferred to the Guild's treasury for operating expenses during strikes in order to compensate for the lower per capita payments of locals whose members are on strike.

The record reveals that the defense fund's nonstrike- and nonlockout-related payments to Guild-affiliated locals, its payments to other unions, and its payments for other matters unrelated to strikes and lockouts involving affiliated locals, while they involved substantial sums of money, constitute only a very small and insignificant proportion of the International defense fund. It is clear that the expenditures from the International defense fund that had been unrelated to strikes and lockouts involving affiliated locals have been merely incidental to the fund's essential purpose, the payment of the strike- and lockout-related expenses of the Guild's locals, and that absent this essential purpose the fund would not exist.

Prior to 1972 the International defense fund was funded, pursuant to provisions in the Guild's constitution that provided that a percentage of the per capita payments of monthly membership dues transmitted by the locals to the Guild be earmarked for the International defense fund, and further provided that in an "emergency" the Guild's executive board was empowered to levy an "assessment" for the International defense fund on the entire membership. "Emergency," as defined in the constitution, was whenever the defense fund fell below the level of $1.5 million until the fund reached the level of $2 million.

After "emergency assessments" were leveled on the membership for 46 consecutive months from January 1968 to November 1971 the delegates to the Guild's annual convention held in 1972 approved a resolution stating that the "assessments" required to maintain the International defense fund at the level set by the constitution had become a part of the Guild's dues structure and that to label them "assessments" was a misnomer. The delegates voted to amend the constitution to incorporate these "assessments" into the Guild's dues structure and to call them "dues."

The constitution, as amended by the 1972 convention, continued to provide that a percentage of the per capita monthly membership dues payments transmitted by the locals to the Guild be earmarked for the International defense fund. However, with respect to supplemental contributions to the fund so as to keep it at the level required by the constitution, the constitution, as amended by the 1972 convention, provided for an increase in the usual monthly dues paid by the membership, rather than an "assessment." In this regard, the constitution, as amended, provided for an automatic increase in the members' monthly dues when the reserves in the International defense fund fell below a certain amount ($1.5 million in the 1972 constitution) and further provided that this increased amount of dues would continue to be paid until the fund's reserves reached a certain amount ($2 million in the 1972 constitution) at which point the usual dues schedule is reinstated.[13] The amended constitution further provided that the difference between the usual dues and the increased dues would be transmitted to the Guild for the sole purpose of funding the International defense fund.

Since the above-described 1972 amendment to the Guild's constitution, the membership on four separate occasions[14] has been required by the triggering mechanism embodied in the constitution to pay, in addition to the usual amount of monthly dues required by the constitution, the increased amount of monthly dues in order to raise the level of the International defense fund to the level mandated by the constitution. In other words, because the membership in 1972 amended the constitution to include a mechanism to raise their dues to fund the International defense fund when it fell below the levels mandated by the constitution, the members have been required to pay the increased monthly dues 53 out of the 184 months involved or approximately 29 percent of the time. During the remainder of the time the membership has paid the normal monthly dues required by the constitution.

As described above, from May 1981 through July 1985 the normal amount of monthly dues required by the Guild's constitution was collected by Respondent from its membership. There was no requirement during this period that the International defense fund be funded by increased dues. The Seattle Times employees involved in this case, Johnston and King, who, during this period were "financial core" rather than "full" members of Respondent, paid their dues without objection. However, from August 1985 through February 1986 Respondent increased the amount of its monthly membership dues for the purpose of funding the International defense fund. This was done pursuant to the decision of the Guild's membership at the annual convention held in late June 1985, under the following circumstances. Since late March or early April 1985 the International defense fund had been below the level at which the Guild's constitution required members' monthly dues to be increased to finance the fund. Nevertheless, because of the proximity of the annual convention schedule for June 1985 and the prospect of action by the convention delegates that would restructure key elements in the constitution dealing with the funding of the International defense fund, the officials of the Guild did not at that time increase the members' dues payments as required by the constitution.

[13] The reserve levels that automatically trigger increased and normal dues payments have been changed periodically at the Guild's annual convention.

[14] May 1972 through March 1973; March through May 1976; September 1978 through April 1981; and August 1985 through February 1986.

As a matter of fact, the delegates to the Guild's annual convention held in June 1985 voted to impose, effective August 1985, the increase in monthly dues required by the constitution to fund the International defense fund, and voted to maintain the increased dues payments until the fund reached a new constitutional cutoff point, approved by the delegates, of $6 million—$1 million higher than the previous constitutional level—and also voted to maintain the dues at this increased level for 1 additional month beyond the period needed to reach the $6 million level, with the $400,000 generated by this extra month of higher dues going into a trust fund to pay the severance pay owed by the Guild to the approximately 30 Guild employees terminated due to a permanent reduction in its staff.

The context in which the delegates to the June 1985 convention gave their approval to the above-described matters, follows (see G.C. Exhs. 8 and 10): Initially, the Guild's officials had proposed that the delegates vote to increase the locals' monthly per capita payments to the Guild by 30 percent, which would have meant a sharp permanent increase in the amount of dues paid by the membership. Respondent and other locals were opposed to this and the result was a compromise package that included the above-described increase in the level of the International defense fund from $5 to $6 million and, as described above, the payment of the extra month of increased dues into the Guild's severance pay trust fund. There were also two other items included in the compromise package approved by the delegates: (1) authorization for the Guild to buy or build a building to house the Guild's headquarters operation and for the Guild to borrow, without interest, $750,000 from the International defense fund to do this; and (2) authorization for a referendum, after the International defense fund reached $6 million, whereby the membership would be asked to approve an increase of the minimum monthly dues required by the constitution from 5 percent to 6 percent of a week's salary for the purpose of increasing the minimum strike benefit to $125 per week, financed by a smaller increase in the local's per capita payments to the Guild, than the 30-percent increase initially proposed by the Guild's officials.

In response to Respondent's request that they pay the increased monthly dues payments for the period of August 1985 through February 1986, Johnston and King notified Respondent they refused to pay the difference between their usual monthly dues and the increased dues. They explained to Respondent that as financial core members they did not feel obliged to pay the additional amount which, in their opinion, constituted a "special assessment." Respondent informed them that the difference between the former level of monthly dues and the increased level was due to a change in the regular periodic dues of Respondent and did not constitute an "assessment." Respondent warned Johnston and King if they did not pay all the dues Respondent was requesting Respondent would ask The Seattle Times, under the terms of its union-security agreement with Respondent, to discharge them. Respondent also admittedly requested that The Seattle Times discharge Johnston and King, pursuant to the terms of the contractual union-security provision, for their refusal to pay all the dues Respondent was asking them to pay. Johnston and King eventually paid, under protest, the disputed portion of the dues.

The complaint alleges that by threatening to cause The Seattle Times to discharge Johnston and King pursuant to the terms of a contractual union-security agreement, Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act for the reason that it engaged in this conduct because Johnston and King "refused to pay an assessment for Respondent's strike fund and monies to build a new headquarters building in Washington, D.C., and for reasons other than the employees' failure to tender periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership in Respondent." The complaint allegation presents the issue of whether the difference in amount between Respondent's usual monthly membership dues and the increased dues Respondent required of its membership during the period from August 1985 through February 1986 is encompassed within the meaning of the term "periodic dues" as used in Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act.

The second proviso to Section 8(a)(3) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer in a union shop to discriminate against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization "if [the employer] has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership." Section 8(b)(2) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to attempt to cause "an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection (a)(3) . . . on some ground other than his failure to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership." The General Counsel contends that the difference in amount between Respondent's usual monthly membership dues and the increased monthly dues Respondent required of its membership during August 1985 through February 1986 is not within the definition of "periodic dues" as that term is used in Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act, thus, the General Counsel argues, Respondent's threat and attempt to have Johnston and King terminated for refusing to pay the increased dues is a violation of Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act.

In NLRB v. Food Fair Stores, 307 F.2d 3 (3d Cir. 1962), the court rejected the respondent union's contention that the word "periodic," as used in "periodic dues," meant "occurring from time to time, recurrent, intermittent" as well as "at regular intervals." Instead the court defined "periodic dues," as used in Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act, as follows (307 F.2d at 11):

> It is clear that the term "periodic dues" in the usual and ordinary sense means the regular payments imposed for the benefit to be derived from membership to be made at fixed intervals for the maintenance of the organization. An assessment, on > the other hand, is a charge levied on each member in the nature of a tax or some other burden for a special purpose, not having the character of being susceptible of anticipation as a regularly recurring obligation as in the case of "periodic dues."

Although in Food Fair Stores the court stated that "periodic dues" referred, among other things, to payments made to a union "for the maintenance of the organization" and that "assessments," on the other hand, referred, among other things, to a charge levied "for a special purpose," the court did not explain what it meant by "for the maintenance of the organization" or "for a special purpose."

In Teamsters Local 959 (RCA Service Co.), 167 NLRB 1042 (1967), the respondent union, in addition to collecting regular periodic dues, incorporated into its regular dues schedule a previously established assessment per hour worked called "working dues," which was used to support a credit union and building program. The Board held that the "working dues" were assessments and not "periodic dues" within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3). In so doing the Board adopted Food Fair Stores above-described definition of "periodic dues" (167 NLRB at 1045).[15] In adopting the court's Food Fair Stores definition of what constitutes "periodic dues," the Board in RCA Service noted that the union shop was permitted in Section 8(a)(3) of the Act out of concern that nonmembers would be given a "free ride," and from this concluded that dues that do not contribute to the cost of the operation of the union in its capacity as a collective-bargaining agent of the employees were "for a special purpose" and not "for the maintenance of the organization" even though the payments were beneficial to the membership (167 NLRB at 1044–1045).

More recently the Board in Typographical Union Local 40 (Detroit Free Press), 192 NLRB 951 (1971), all but overruled that part of RCA Service that differentiated between the allocation of dues payments for collective-bargaining purposes and those earmarked for the institutional expenses of the union. Detroit Mailers involved working dues used to finance the old age pension and mortuary funds and printers home maintained by the International union with whom the respondent union was affiliated. The Board held that the portion of the dues payments that were used for those purposes constituted "periodic dues," and in reaching this conclusion stated that in determining the propriety of union discipline pursuant to a valid union-security agreement, no distinction is warranted between that portion of uniform and periodic dues allocated to the costs of collective bargaining and that used for other legitimate institutional expenses. Under Section 8(a)(3), the Board ruled, uniform periodic dues may be required as a condition of membership, if such sums are not devoted to some purpose otherwise contrary to public policy. Detroit Free Press, supra at 951, 951-952 (Member Jenkins dissenting). In reaching this result, the Board distinguished RCA Service as involving an admitted "assessment," 90 percent of which might never have reached the union treasury (192 NLRB at 952).

As set forth above, the law is settled that Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act do not allow an employer and a union to condition employment on the payment of uniform "assessments," as opposed to "periodic dues," to a union. NLRB v. Food Fair Stores, 307 F.2d 3, 9-16 (3d. Cir. 1962). I am of the opinion that the disputed dues payments involved herein—the increased monthly dues charged the members of the Guild during the period from August 1985 through February 1986—constitute an "assessment" rather than "periodic dues." As described infra, in so concluding, I have been guided by the court's definition of "periodic dues" in Food Fair Stores, which definition has been adopted by the Board.[16]

The difference in amount between the dues regularly charged the membership and the increased dues charged during the months of August 1985 through January 1986 does not fit within the definition of "periodic dues" as that term is used in Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act, because the record establishes that the dues increase was a charge levied on the membership for a special purpose, not having the requisite periodicity and regularity so that it was susceptible of anticipation as a regularly recurring obligation as in the case of "periodic dues." My reasons for reaching this conclusion follow.

The Guild maintains a special fund, the International defense fund, for the special purpose of paying the expenses incurred by its locals relating to strikes and lockouts. The money collected for the defense fund is kept separate and apart from the Guild's general fund and, although some of the money in the defense fund has been used for purposes other than the fund's essential purpose of financing the strike and lockout expenses of its locals, it is undisputed that normally the sole purpose for which increased dues are collected from the membership is to support the International defense fund's essential purpose,[17] and that all other expenditures from the Interna-

[15] More recently in Carpenters Local 455 (Building Contractors), 271 NLRB 1099, 1100 (1984), the Board reaffirmed its adoption of the Food Fair Stores definition of "periodic dues."

[16] I recognize that one of the factors that the Board considers in distinguishing between an "assessment" and "periodic dues" is the purpose for which the union has collected the funds in issue. See Detroit Mailers, supra at 952; Teamsters Local 959 (RCA Service Co.), 167 NLRB 1042, 1044–1045 (1967). The Board's decisions in Detroit Free Press and RCA Service appeared, however, to be hopelessly irreconcilable concerning the nature of the purpose of an expenditure which will cause dues payments to fall outside of the definition of "periodic dues," as that term is used in Section 8(a)(3). Under the circumstances I have followed the Board's most recent decision, Detroit Free Press, in which, as described supra, the Board stated that the only expenditures from members' dues that are not encompassed by the term "periodic dues" are those which are used for a purpose which would make their mandatory extraction "inimical to public policy." There is no evidence that any of the purposes for which Respondent has collected the disputed dues payments herein are "inimical to public policy." The fact that some of the moneys may be used to defend strikers in criminal proceedings arising out of strike-related misconduct is not, as contended by the Charging Party, "inimical to public policy."

[17] As described in detail supra, the disputed increase in dues for the months of August 1985 through January 1986 was also to be used to enable the defense fund to make an interest-free loan of $750,000 to the Guild to use to either buy or build a headquarter's building. This, in my opinion, provides additional support for the conclusion that the disputed tional defense fund using the increased dues are merely incidental to the fund's essential purpose.

The August 1985–January 1986 dues increase was instituted pursuant to provisions in the Guild's constitution requiring that monthly dues be raised by a specified amount, set by the constitution, whenever the International defense fund has less than a specified amount, set by the constitution, and requires that the increase must continue until the fund is raised to a specified level, also set by the constitution. Either this provision or a similar one has been incorporated in the Guild's constitution since 1972. It is impossible, however, for the Guild to anticipate with any degree of certainty when the International defense fund will fall to a level making it necessary for the Guild to impose a period of increased dues so that the amount of money in the defense fund will reach the level required by the constitution, nor, after instituting such a dues increase, is it possible for the Guild to anticipate with any degree of certainty the length of the period during which the increased dues payments must be maintained so as to meet the constitutional requirement. There is also no certainty that the Guild at the appropriate time will institute the increase in dues payments called for by the constitution, when the International defense fund falls below the level set by the constitution to trigger a dues increase. In this respect the August 1985–January 1986 dues increase, the increase involved herein, should have been instituted several months earlier according to the constitution, but was postponed. Also, inasmuch as the increase in dues at issue was earmarked for a special purpose, it is not surprising that it has been necessary for the Guild to impose such an increase in dues only on a sporadic and intermittent basis during the approximately 15-1/4 years the increased dues requirement has been embodied in the Guild's constitution: May 1972 through March 1973; March through May 1976; September 1978 through April 1981; August 1985 through February 1986. In other words since the members in 1972 amended the constitution to include a mechanism to raise their dues in order to fund the International defense fund when it fell below a level mandated by the constitution, the members have been required to pay the increased dues only 53 out of the 184 months involved, or approximately 29 percent of the time. During the remainder of the time the members have paid the normal dues required by the constitution. Indeed before the dues increase involved in this case, the members had been paying the normal dues required by the constitution continuously for 4-1/4 years.

Considering the special purpose for which the August 1985 through January 1986 increase in dues was levied—to increase the amount of money in the Guild's International defense fund so there would be enough money in the fund to pay the expenses incurred by the locals involved in strikes and lockouts;[18] considering the impossibility of the members being able to anticipate the implementation and duration of the implementation of an increase in dues for this special purpose; considering that the extra moneys collected because of the increased dues levy are placed in a special fund, the International defense fund, and not in the Guild's treasury; considering that the increased dues payments are levied on the members irregularly and at irregular intervals;[19] considering the disparity in the periodicity of the increase of the amount of monthly dues involved herein, with the payments of the normal monthly memberships dues;[20] I find that the increase in monthly dues levied on the membership from August 1985 through January 1986 for the purpose of raising the International defense fund to the level required by the constitution constitutes an "assessment" rather than "periodic dues" inasmuch as the increase was "a charge levied on each member in the nature of a tax . . . for a special purpose, not having the character of being susceptible of anticipation as a regularly recurring obligation." NLRB v. Food Fair Stores, supra.

I reject Respondent's contention that the dues increase at issue constitutes "periodic dues," rather than an "assessment" because the Guild's membership in 1972 incorincrease in dues herein constitutes a charge in the nature of a tax for a special purpose, for insofar as the increase was to be used to finance the buying or building of a headquarter's building, it plainly is a one-time charge for a special purpose. See Teamsters Local 439 (Shippers Imperial), 281 NLRB 255 (1986).

[18] I reject Respondent's contention that the moneys received by the International defense fund from the increase in dues involved herein was not for a special purpose because the Guild frequently and routinely uses defense fund moneys for general fund purposes. The record reveals that while expenditures from the International defense fund for general fund purposes have at times involved substantial sums of money, that such expenditures constitute a very small and insignificant proportion of the funds which have flowed in and out of the International defense fund. Moreover, the International defense fund's expenditures which have been unrelated to the expenses incurred by affiliated locals due to strikes and lockouts, have been merely incidental to the International defense fund's essential purpose, the payment of strike- and lockout-related expenses incurred by the locals. It is clear that absent this essential purpose the International defense fund would not exist and the Guild's members would not have been required to pay increased monthly dues during the months of August 1985 through January 1986.

[19] I have considered, as pointed out by Respondent, that the Board has held that "periodic dues" within the meaning of Sec. 8(a)(3) may vary from period to period and from member to member, in that the Board has approved dues schedules in which the amount of dues required varied with the individual's salary for a particular period; varied with whether a member was working "at the trade"; varied depending whether the dues were paid on time; and, varied based on attendance at union meetings. In my view these situations differ significantly from the situation posed by the instant case.

[20] The General Counsel also contends that in Johnston's and King's cases the increased dues herein are not "uniformly required" as required by Sec. 8(a)(3) because, as financial core members, Johnston and King pay a proportionately greater share than full members, inasmuch as they are not eligible to receive strike benefits from the International defense fund. Similarly the Charging Party contends the increased dues are not encompassed by the term "periodic dues" as used in Sec. 8(a)(3) because, as financial core members, Johnston and King are not eligible to receive the benefits which the full members derive from the International defense fund. These contentions are without merit because generally a union can "require all employees whom it represents and who are covered by a valid union-security agreement to pay all periodic dues . . . uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining [union] membership," (Detroit Mailers Union Local 40), supra at 951–952, (1970), and "[s]o long as the union prescribes non-discriminatory terms and conditions of acquiring membership, it can compel all employees to pay the ordinary and regular union dues under a union-security clause . . . even if some of the employees do not qualify for union membership . . . . provided it does not interfere with employment of the nonmember employees for reasons other than failure to tender the periodic dues and initiation fees uniformly required." Plumbers Local 81 (Morrison Construction), 237 NLRB 207, 210 (1978).

porated into the Guild's dues structure an increase in members' "dues" for the purpose of raising the level of the International defense fund to the level mandated by the constitution whenever the fund fell below that level, and has since then consistently referred to this charge as "dues" rather than an "assessment." In this regard, the record reveals, as described in detail supra, that prior to the amendment of the constitution in 1972 the term "assessment" was used by the Guild and its constitution to refer to the charge levied on the members to raise the level of the International defense fund to the level mandated by the constitution. In 1972 the Guild's membership amended the constitution to change the term "assessment" to "dues" and made the charge a part of the Guild's dues structure. Before and after the 1972 constitutional amendment, however, the substance of the relevant constitutional provisions that dealt with this subject remained virtually the same except that what was now called "dues" had formerly been called an "assessment." The sole substantive change was that now the Guild's executive board was not given discretion by the constitution, but was required to institute a "dues" increase whenever the International defense fund fell below the level set by the constitution. However, as noted supra, the Guild ignored the constitution and exercised its discretion in 1985, when it delayed instituting the dues increase at issue for a period of several months. Under the circumstances, the fact that what was formerly called an "assessment" is now called "dues" is only a matter of semantics and of very little help in resolving the question presented for decision. In other words, for the foregoing reasons, I am of the opinion that the fact the Guild refers to the disputed charge levied on its members as "dues," rather than an "assessment," and has formally made the disputed charge a part of its dues structure, is not sufficient to rebut the conclusion, based on the record as a whole, that the disputed charge did not constitute "periodic dues" within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act.[21]

The difference in amount between the monthly dues regularly charged the Guild's members and the increased monthly dues charged them in February 1986, does not fit within the definition of "periodic dues" as that term is used in Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act, inasmuch as the record establishes that the increase was a special one-time assessment designed to meet an emergency situation. As described in detail supra, the increase in monthly dues charged the Guild's members in February 1986 was the result of a vote by the delegates to the Guild's annual convention held in June 1985 to amend the constitution so the increased dues mandated by the constitution to replenish the International defense fund would continue for 1 additional month for the purpose of generating money to pay the $400,000 in severance pay owed to the Guild's employees who had been terminated due to a permanent reduction in the Guild's staff. Pursuant to this constitutional amendment the Guild's membership was required to pay in February 1986 an additional month of increased dues and the increased portion of the dues was placed in a special severance pay trust fund, separate and apart from the Guild's other funds. In other words, the increased February 1986 membership dues was a temporary charge on the membership, imposed for only a period of 1 month for the purpose of meeting an emergency situation involving the payment of severance pay owed by the Guild, and the additional funds collected by the increase were kept in a separate trust fund apart from the Guild's general operating funds. In view of these circumstances it is apparent that the increased dues levied on the membership in February 1986 constituted an "assessment" rather than "periodic dues" because the increase was "a charge levied on each member in the nature of a tax . . . for a special purpose, not having the character of being susceptible of anticipation as a regular recurring obligation as in the case of "periodic dues" NLRB v. Food Fair Stores, supra, 307 F.2d at 11.

It is for the reasons set forth above that I find the difference between the Guild's usual monthly dues payments imposed on its members and the increase in said payments during the period from August 1985 through February 1986 did not constitute "periodic dues" within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and Section 8(b)(2) of the Act. I therefore find that by attempting to cause The Seattle Times to discharge its employees Kenneth Johnston and Tonya King for refusing to pay the above-described increase in dues, that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Pacific Northwest Newspaper Guild Local 82 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. The Employer, The Seattle Times, is an employer engaged in commerce and business activities which affect commerce, within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. By attempting to cause The Seattle Times to discharge Kenneth Johnston and Tonya King in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act by attempting to cause The Seattle Times to discharge employees Kenneth Johnston and Tonya King because they refused to pay to Respondent the increase in their monthly membership dues imposed during the period of August 1985 through February [21] The Detroit Free Press, supra, relied on by Respondent, is distinguishable because there "[n]obody contend[ed] . . . that the dues were other than periodic" (192 NLRB at 952). In the instant case the percentage of the members' dues paid regularly each month to finance the International defense fund, which payments are not challenged in this case, are identical to the regular monthly dues payments imposed at fixed intervals involved in the Detroit Free Press. In sharp contrast, the increased dues payments at issue in the instant case, for the special purpose of raising the International defense fund to the level required by the constitution, lack any degree of periodicity or regularity so as to be encompassed within the term "periodic dues" as used in Sec. 8(a)(3) and Sec. 8(b)(2) of the Act.

1986, I shall recommend that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

I shall recommend that Respondent make Johnston and King whole for the monetary loss they suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, by refunding to them a sum equal in amount to the increased portion of the monthly dues they paid to Respondent for the period of August 1985 through February 1986, with interest thereon computed in the manner set forth in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).[22]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[23]

ORDER

The Respondent, Pacific Northwest Newspaper Guild Local 82, Seattle, Washington, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

Spann Building Maintenance Co. and Veronica Lewis. Case 14–CA–16799

July 15, 1988

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On April 11, 1984, Administrative Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig issued the attached decision finding that the Respondent, Spann Building Maintenance Co., violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by suspending and later discharging employee Veronica Lewis. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

On June 28, 1985, the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order,[1] finding that the contentions raised by Lewis could be resolved under the grievance and arbitration provision of the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union that represented Lewis' bargaining unit. The Board further found that the Union had invoked the grievance procedure on Lewis' behalf and that the procedure had not run its course, as the grievance had not been withdrawn or submitted to arbitration. The Board, therefore, deferred to the contractual grievance-arbitration procedure the unfair labor practice allegations concerning Lewis' discharge.

Thereafter, Lewis petitioned the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit for review of the Board's Order. On September 17, 1986, the court denied Lewis' petition for review but remanded the case for the Board "to consider the limited issue of the propriety and extent of the Board's retention of jurisdiction."[2]

On remand, the Board on June 24, 1987, issued a Supplemental Decision and Order[3] revising its prior Order to provide for further consideration of the case in the event that either the Respondent or the Union resisted or impeded prompt processing of Lewis' grievance. Thus, the revised Order[4] provided that the Board retained jurisdiction for the > limited purpose of entertaining an appropriate and timely motion for further consideration upon a proper showing that either (a) the dispute has not, with reasonable promptness after the issuance of this Supplemental Decision and Order, either been resolved by amicable settlement in the grievance procedure or submitted promptly to arbitration, or (b) the grievance or arbitration procedures have not been fair and regular or have reached a result which is repugnant to the Act.

On February 16, 1988, the General Counsel filed a motion for further consideration. The motion requests the Board to consider the case on the merits, as it contends that the Union has refused to proceed to arbitration with the grievance concerning Lewis' discharge and that a purported settlement between the Respondent and the Union did not remedy the alleged unfair labor practice. In support of the motion, the General Counsel attached a letter dated January 6, 1988, from the Union to the Respondent. The letter states that the Union does not intend to pursue Lewis' grievance to arbitration and "considers the matter as settled based on the fact that Lewis was reinstated to employment . . . ." The letter further states that the Union has "no intention of reopening this matter." Also attached to the General Counsel's motion is a letter dated January 8, 1988, from the Respondent to a representative of the General Counsel, enclosing the Union's letter. Based on the Union's letter, the Respondent's letter contends that the Board should defer to the settlement agreement between the Respondent and the Union, citing Alpha Beta Co., 273 NLRB 1546 (1985). The Respondent's letter asserts that, while Lewis quit 30 days after she was reinstated, the Respondent has about 1000 employees who are represented by the Union, and it would be a destructive influence on the parties' bargaining relationship if the Union were to proceed to arbitration when it does not deem grievances to be meritorious or when an equitable resolution can be reached short of arbitration.

On February 24, 1988, the Respondent filed a cross-motion for dismissal and opposition to the General Counsel's motion for further consideration, contending that the Board should defer to the settlement of the grievance and dismiss the complaint. The Respondent argues that deferral to the settlement will effectuate the purposes of the Act for the reasons stated in its January 8 letter. The Respondent further contends that the collective-bargaining process would be undermined if a grievant can circumvent the grievance process for her personal benefit and to the detriment of the collective good.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Having considered the General Counsel's motion and the Respondent's cross-motion and opposition, we decline to defer to the asserted settlement. Contrary to the Respondent, we find Alpha Beta inapposite. In Alpha Beta, the union filed grievances on behalf of a number of discharged employees. The union pursued the grievance procedure and, as a result of discussions between the union and the discharged employees' employers and with the informed consent of the affected employees, an agreement was reached providing that 15 of the employees would be reinstated without backpay and 4 would be considered voluntary quits. The employees thereafter filed unfair labor practice charges, but the Board deferred to the grievance settlement and dismissed the complaint.

Unlike Alpha Beta, however, in the present case we do not find that the grievance was settled. As recounted in our Decision and Order in this case, the Union filed a grievance over Lewis' discharge and discussed resolution of the grievance with the Respondent, but the Respondent's settlement offer was rejected by the Union.[5] After further efforts to reach an acceptable settlement failed, Lewis filed an unfair labor practice charge. After the charge was filed the Respondent's personnel manager twice contacted Lewis directly and offered her reinstatement at a different work location. Lewis finally accepted this offer. There was no mention that the reinstatement was to constitute settlement of the grievance, and neither Lewis nor the Union withdrew the grievance. Thus, the alleged disposition of the grievance here differs from the settlement in Alpha Beta in that it was neither negotiated by the Union, a party to the contractual grievance and arbitration procedure, nor approved as the settlement of the grievance by the affected employee who instituted the charge.

It is apparent from this sequence of events that Lewis' reinstatement did not constitute a settlement of the grievance. Rather, after Lewis filed the unfair labor practice charge, the Respondent, outside the channels of the grievance procedure and without involving the Union, contacted Lewis directly and arranged for her to resume working. This was clearly an effort by the Respondent to limit its potential backpay liability in the event that Lewis prevailed in her unfair labor practice case. This informal arrangement, entered into without the involvement of the Union, which was the grievant in the grievance proceeding, did not purport to be a settlement of the grievance. That the Union some 4-1/2 years later now states that it considers the matter settled because Lewis was reinstated does not retroactively change the nature of the Respondent's arrangement with Lewis and transform it into a settlement.

Additionally, we are not persuaded by the Respondent's arguments that the Board's failure to defer and to dismiss the complaint would be detrimental to the collective-bargaining process and to its relationship with the Union. Having found that the grievance was not settled or otherwise resolved, we have nothing to which to defer. Moreover, while the Board's deferral policy, as stated in United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984), and Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), attempts to accommodate the Board's statutory mandate with private grievance-arbitration procedures established by contract, the Board does not defer to all grievances, regardless of their nature or disposition, in order to avoid any possible interference with the grievance-arbitration process.

As the Union has made clear that it will proceed no further in its grievance over Lewis' discharge and we find that the grievance was not settled, we find it appropriate, consistent with the terms of the Order previously entered in this case, to determine the merits of the complaint. Having considered the judge's decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs, we find, for the reasons stated by the judge, that the Respondent's suspension and discharge of Lewis violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. We, therefore, affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[6] and conclusions and adopt his recommended Order.[7]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Spann Building Maintenance Co., St. Louis, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARION C. LADWIG, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at St. Louis, Missouri, November 14, 1983.[1] The charge was filed by Veronica Lewis June 23 and the complaint was issued July 28. The Company discharged cleaning service worker Lewis for engaging in a heated discussion with her supervisor over his transferring her, without her consent, to a distant job seniority. The Company and Union failed to settle a grievance challenging the discharge, and no one seeks to take the unsettled grievance to arbitration.

The primary issues are (a) whether the Company, the Respondent, unlawfully suspended and discharged Lewis for engaging in protected concerted activity in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, and (b) whether the case should be deferred to the arbitral forum.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Company on both the merits and in response to a Notice to Show Cause on the deferral issue, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a Missouri corporation, cleans and maintains commercial buildings in the St. Louis, Missouri area, where it annually receives goods valued over $50,000 directly or indirectly from outside the State and performs services valued over $50,000 for enterprises either located outside the State or located within the State and receiving goods valued over $50,000 directly from outside the State. The Company admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that Service Employees International Union, Local No. 50, AFL-CIO (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Suspension and Discharge of Lewis

1. Seniority rights disregarded

Cleaning service worker Veronica Lewis was employed under the Union's multiemployer collective-bargaining agreement (G.C. Exh. 2), which specifically provided for job security (sec. 8.01) and that "No employee shall be transferred except by mutual consent" (sec. 8.02). Since her first employment in 1979, she had been transferred twice from one job to another, but each time with her consent. (Her seniority dated from March 2, 1981, when she was rehired after having a baby.)

Since June 1, 1981, she had been working in the Meramec building, one of the 7-Up Company's buildings in Clayton, Missouri. Her job seniority (next to the highest among the cleaning employees in that building) entitled her to remain on that job unless she consented to a transfer.

In January, after rebidding the 7-Up account, the Company decided to ignore the employees' job seniority at the Meramec building. The new contract, effective February 1, called for a reduction in the cleaning staff from 26 to 15 workers at the Meramec and the next-door Headquarters building (connected by an overhead walkway). As acknowledged in the Company's brief, "To effect the reduction, and to ensure that 7-Up was given the best service possible, Respondent's officials instructed the supervisor at the 7-Up account, Dave Kipping, to select the best workers, regardless of seniority, and to lay off the rest, notwithstanding language in the current union contract" that "questioned the propriety" of ignoring seniority.

In the latter part of January, Project Supervisor Kipping changed Lewis' job assignment, first reassigning her work in the Meramec bulding and then assigning her work in the Headquarters building. He told her that under the new 7-Up contract, some of the employees would have to go, but he did not reveal his decision to lay her off. On January 26, she submitted a grievance to him, complaining about someone else being assigned to do her work (G.C. Exh. 3). As she credibly testified, she showed him a copy of the union agreement, pointing out the part "that you have to ask a person" before making a transfer, unless "they lose the whole contract completely." Kipping responded that he did not want to look at it and "said he'd do what he wanted to do." (Tr. 24.) (I discredit his claim that when Lewis handed him the grievance, he merely said "Fine" and did not discuss it (Tr. 84-85).)

The next evening, January 27, Supervisor Kipping informed Lewis that she was being transferred (Monday, January 31) to West Port Plaza. "I told him that he can't transfer me without my permission," that "I can't go to West Port Plaza for the simple reason that my car is raggily," and that the buses do not run out there in the evenings. Kipping "said that's how it is and that's how it's going to be." Then when she said she did not want to work at West Port Plaza and was not going, he stated, "You don't have to go to West Port Plaza but you're not going to be working here." (Tr. 26.) (I discredit Kipping's claim that he merely referred her to personnel when she asked why she was being transferred (Tr. 87). Lewis impressed me most favorably as an honest, forthright witness, and I credit her version of the conversation.)

The next morning, January 28, Lewis called from her day job and talked to Personnel Manager Suzanne Bopp, who said that Kipping had told Bopp that Lewis and her sister (Stephanie Sykes) were "available to go" to West Port Plaza. Lewis denied telling Kipping that she wanted to go there.

That Friday evening, January 28, was to be her last day at the 7-Up account, where she had public transportation. Although her seniority entitled her to remain at her Meramec building job unless she consented to a transfer, her supervisor was ignoring her seniority and had told the personnel manager that she was available for transfer to the distant assignment, beyond the evening bus line. There was no job steward to assist her in protecting her seniority rights. She had already filed a grievance, complaining about being reassigned, but since then she had learned that the Company was compelling her to take the distant transfer or be laid off, despite her contractual rights.

[1] All dates are in 1983 unless otherwise indicated.

It was under these circumstances that Lewis met with Project Supervisor Kipping to invoke her seniority rights under the collective-bargaining agreement.

2. Job seniority invoked

When Lewis arrived at work Friday, July 28, on the 5:30 p.m. shift, John Harris (another service worker in the Meramec building) told her that Dave Kipping wanted to see Harris at the end of the evening shift, but that no, he was not waiting because "they was saying that somebody was taking over his job." Lewis followed Harris to Kipping's basement office in the Headquarters building and waited outside the supervisor's open door, out of Kipping's view. (Tr. 33-34.)

Kipping confirmed Harris' layoff. Harris became enraged and loudly protested. He questioned Kipping's waiting until "I get through doing my work" that evening "and then just ship me off to West Port Plaza" (Tr. 36).

Lewis then entered the office and asked Kipping why he told Personnel Manager Bopp that Lewis was available to go to West Port Plaza (in effect, disputing Kipping's denial). In a louder than normal voice, Lewis "asked him how in the hell was he going to put less seniority in my place and I'm the second highest seniority." In his usual loud voice, Kipping responded that was how it was going to be. She showed him the union agreement and told him, "You have to ask the person, do they want to transfer," but Kipping again responded "that's how it is and that's how it's going to be." (Tr. 36, 42.) (Kipping claimed that Lewis instead said, "goddamn you, you don't tell me a goddamn thing" why she was being transferred (Tr. 92, 115), but Lewis credibly denied using the word "goddamn" (Tr. 174).)

Harris (who did not testify) then resumed his loud protests until the 7-Up contact representative Allen Dorsey (who also did not testify) came downstairs and entered the office. Kipping's testimony is undisputed that Harris was very loud, profane, and abusive, and leaned over Kipping's desk, causing Kipping to feel physically threatened (Tr. 91). Kipping directed Harris to go back to work.

When Dorsey entered, he said they were getting too loud and that they would have to keep the noise down (Tr. 37, 62). As Lewis credibly testified, Harris told Dorsey something like "You ain't got nothing to do with this." Kipping said he would take care of it, and Dorsey left. After some further conversation, Harris also left.

Before leaving the office, Lewis spoke to Kipping's assistant Jim Weiniecke (who had walked in), repeating the question, "How in the hell are you going to put less seniority in my place?," without any response (Tr. 38).

3. The suspension and discharge

Shortly after the incident in his office, Supervisor Kipping went to the Meramec building (where Lewis was getting a soda before going to work) and told both Harris and Lewis that they were suspended for further investigation. A security guard escorted Harris from the property and Kipping escorted Lewis. (Tr. 40, 63, 95.)

Kipping testified that his only reason for suspending Lewis was the January 28 incident in his office (Tr. 124).

On January 31, Kipping prepared a written report of the incident, delivered it (with the 7-Up security incident report) to Personnel Manager Bopp, and discussed it with her (Tr. 137). On February 4, the Company sent Lewis a discharge letter, stating that her employment "has been terminated effective 2/3/83 due to improper conduct and the use of abusive language to the customer and to your supervisor" (G.C. Exh. 5).

At the trial, Personnel Manager Bopp testified that the January 28 incident was the sole basis for the discharge (Tr. 163) and that she and President R. L. Hardy (who did not testify) relied on Supervisor Kipping's report and the 7-Up security incident report in deciding to discharge Lewis (Tr. 137). I note, however, that there is nothing in either report to support the statement in the discharge letter that Lewis used "abusive language to the customer." (The General Counsel does not contend that the Company unlawfully discharged Harris, who did shout at the 7-Up representative Dorsey and who has withdrawn the grievance challenging his discharge.)

Kipping's January 31 report (R. Exh. 2) asserts that Lewis "became loud, abrasive and used profane language," without mentioning any abusive language to the customer. The 7-Up security incident report (R. Exh. 3), introduced in evidence as a document on which the Company relied in making its decision to discharge Lewis (Tr. 101), refers to misconduct of Harris—not Lewis—toward Dorsey. It states that it was prepared at 7:15 p.m., January 28, and that

> At 6:05 PM it was reported to security Guard Cole by 7-Up contracting manager Allen Dorsey that a disturbance was in progress on P-1 level. I immediately responded to P-1 where I was met by Spann Supervisor David Kipping who stated that he wanted Spann employees Veronica Lewis and John Harris removed from the premises. I then proceeded to the Meramac building to tell John Harris to leave the building. He stated to me that I was lying and he wasn't going to leave because his supervisor told him to stay and work. . . . I then proceeded immediately to escort him out . . . .
> I then located Allen Dorsey to get his statement on what happened to cause the incident. He stated that he was getting supplies on P-1 level when he heard loud voices and bad language being used. He then stated that he instructed Spann employee John Harris that his actions were not permitted on 7-Up property. He then told Allen Dorsey that the situation was none of Allen Dorsey's damn business. Allen Dorsey then stated that he went for security personnel.

Security guard Cole did not testify. Whether or not his report was accurate, there is nothing in it to support the claim that Lewis used abusive language to the customer. I therefore find that this purported reason for Lewis' discharge was pretextual.

I also note that by the time of trial, Supervisor Kipping had fabricated another purported reason for suspending Lewis. Although he made no mention of it in his January 31 report, Kipping claimed that when Allen Dorsey entered his office January 28, Dorsey said that "these people have got to leave, now" (Tr. 93). He repeated this claim on cross-examination. "He said John and Veronica will have to go. They're going to have to leave. We cannot tolerate them here . . . . He said most definitely they will have to leave . . . . I do not remember what I told the Board agent, but Mr. Dorsey did tell me they'd have to leave the building." (Tr. 119-120.)

This testimony was obviously fabricated to bolster the company defense. If the 7-Up representative had said that Harris and Lewis must leave the building at once, undoubtedly Kipping would not have flouted the order by instructing Harris (or Harris and Lewis) to return to work. According to Kipping, "I told [Harris] at that time to go back to his station and to begin work . . . . Because I did not want to suspend him in front of other service workers. I didn't think it was professional and I didn't want to embarrass him." When asked about Lewis, Kipping claimed, "Same way, yes. I told them to go back to their stations. I . . . would not reprimand or tell anyone they were suspended in front of other people." (Tr. 94.) (Kipping claimed that an employee and an unknown person with a service cart were standing outside the door (Tr. 117).)

I discredit, as an afterthought, Kipping's claim that Dorsey told him that Harris and Lewis must leave the building. (By his demeanor on the stand, Kipping appeared willing to give whatever testimony might help the Company's cause.) I also discredit Kipping's claim that Dorsey was standing outside the office door when Lewis entered (Tr. 118), that Dorsey was standing there when she made her protest (Tr. 116), and that before entering the office, Dorsey went upstairs and got the security guards (Tr. 93).

4. Contentions and concluding findings

The General Counsel contends that when Veronica Lewis protested her layoff to Supervisor Dave Kipping on January 28, she was endeavoring to enforce the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement and was engaged in protected concerted activity. Citing Interboro Contractors, 157 NLRB 1295 (1966), enfd. 388 F.2d 495 (2d Cir. 1967), the General Counsel argues that "The fact that Lewis' complaint to Supervisor Kipping . . . . was made by Lewis alone does not make her conduct any less concerted." He also argues that under the authorities, Lewis' use of a mild epithet, "how in the hell" (or even "goddamn," as claimed by Kipping) "was not so flagrant or egregious to warrant the removal of the Act's protection."

The Company contends that Lewis' conduct was neither concerted (being mere "personal gripes about her job alone") nor protected. Although conceding that "It is well settled that employees cannot lawfully be discharged for rude or impertinent conduct in the course of presenting grievances to an employer," the Company contends that Lewis crossed the line of protected activity "when she chose to join Harris on January 28 in the verbal and physical intimidation of Kipping, her supervisor, in a public location, in front of other employees and an important customer representative, Allen Dorsey." Despite her later reinstatement, the Company contends that her "vituperative behavior" rendered her "unfit for future service." Relying on discredited testimony, the Company contends that most important, Dorsey "could hear the profanity and uproar and demanded that Lewis and Harris be removed from the premises." The Company also contends that "Lewis' outburst was violent, loud, and abusive" and that "she was discharged for her public disturbance, which threatened customer relations." The credible evidence does not support these contentions.

I find that Lewis made a reasonable and honest attempt to persuade Supervisor Kipping in the January 28 meeting to honor her job seniority under the collective-bargaining agreement, and that in doing so, she was engaged in concerted activity. NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822, 841 (1984). In this recent decision, the United States Supreme Court held that

> The NLRB's Interboro doctrine recognizes as concerted activity an individual employee's reasonable and honest invocation of a right provided for in his collective-bargaining agreement. We conclude that the doctrine constitutes a reasonable interpretation of the Act.

The remaining question is whether Lewis was engaged in protected activity when she protested to Supervisor Kipping in his office, in a louder than normal voice, "how in the hell" was he going to put an employee with less seniority in her place (or, as claimed by Kipping, told him "goddamn you, you don't tell me a goddamn thing"). Although as many as two employees may have overheard Lewis' remark through the open door, it was not overheard by the 7-Up representative Dorsey, who arrived later when employee Harris was using "very loud, profane, and abusive" language and who stated they would have to keep the noise down.

In City Disposal Systems (465 U.S. at 837), after upholding "the Board's judgment that the employee is engaged in concerted activity" when his statement or action is based on a reasonable and honest belief in a collectively bargained right, "just as he would have been had he filed a formal grievance," the Supreme Court noted that "An employee may engage in concerted activity in such an abusive manner that he loses the protection of § 7" of the Act, citing Crown Central Petroleum Corp. v. NLRB, 430 F.2d 724, 729 (5th Cir. 1970).

Crown Central involved the disciplining of two employees for statements they made during a grievance meeting. The court of appeals (430 F.2d at 729) ruled that "An employee may not act with impunity even though he is engaged in protected activity. His rights, derived from Section 7, must be balanced against the employer's right to maintain order in his business by punishing acts of insubordination." In approving "the balance struck by the Board," the court observed (at 730) that "On the employer's side of the scale lies the injury done the Company by intemperate and insubordinate remarks directed toward a supervisor during a grievance meeting and in the presence of four other employees"—distinguishing a situation in which "all the plant employees were present." The court ruled (at 731) that

> Here the remarks were pertinent to a discussion of the grievance under consideration at the meeting. "[A]s long as the activities engaged in are lawful and the character of the conduct is not indefensible in the context of the grievance involved, the employees are protected under § 7 of the [A]ct." Neither do we think the language used by Harris and Gilliam was so opprobious as to carry them "beyond the pale" of the Act's protection. It has been repeatedly observed that passions run high in labor disputes and that epithets and accusations are commonplace. Grievance meetings arising out of disputes between employer and employee are not calculated to create an aura of total peace and tranquility where compliments are lavishly exchanged.

As found by the court (at 726), employee Harris stated or implied in the meeting involving his own grievance that the supervisor's denial that overtime was ordered was a lie, that Harris used profanity in doing so, and that he reminded the supervisor and other company representatives "that they would be called upon after death and in the hereafter—in a bargaining session yet to come—to answer for their earthly prevarications." The court enforced the Board's Order, upholding the finding that the company violated Section 8(a)(1) by giving Harris a reprimand and warning for "abusive and insubordinate language directed at supervisor" and by giving employee Gilliam (chairman of the Workmen's Committee) a 1-day suspension for having tolerated and joined in Harris' conduct.

Here, cleaning service worker Lewis was, in the absence of a union steward on the job, presenting her own protest or oral grievance to Supervisor Kipping in his office. Her remarks were pertinent to her protest that her job seniority rights under the union agreement were being violated. I find it clear that her conduct was not "indefensible" in the context of the discussion, and that her language "how in the hell" (or, as claimed by Kipping, "goddamn you, you don't tell me a goddamn thing") was not "so opprobrious to carry" her "beyond the pale" of her Section 7 rights. I therefore find, on balancing her Section 7 rights "against the employer's rights to maintain order in his business by punishing acts of insubordination," that the Company suspended her January 28 and discharged her February 3, 1983, for engaging in protected concerted activity, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In view of this finding, I find it unnecessary to rule on whether the suspension and discharge also violated Section 8(a)(3).

B. The Deferral Issue

1. Unresolved grievance

Section 5.02 of the collective-bargaining agreement (G.C. Exh. 2) provides that "The Employer agrees that he will not discharge any employee except for justifiable reason, which reason shall be given to the employee immediately upon discharge."

Section 19.01 of the Grievance and Arbitration Procedure provides that "a grievance is defined as an employee or Union's dispute, claim or complaint involving the interpretation or application of the provisions of this agreement"; that "the Employer and the Union shall make an honest and sincere effort to adjust" such a dispute "in an amicable manner"; and that if they are unable to do so, "the question may, at the option of the Union," be submitted to arbitration. The agreement is silent on the disposition of a dispute if the grievance remains unresolved in the three-step grievance procedure and the Union, as in the present case, takes its option not to submit the question to arbitration and fails to proceed with the selection of an arbitrator. (The agreement does not provide in this event for withdrawal or settlement of the grievance, or for acceptance of the Employer's last offer.)

Lewis did not file a grievance contesting her termination, but the Union did file a grievance under Section 19.01, naming "Local 50" as the aggrieved party, alleging the "unjust discharge of John Harris and Ms. V. Lewis." The Company and Union held the second-step meeting February 15 (R. Exh. 15); the Union submitted a request for an arbitration panel in the Lewis case March 10 (R. Exh. 16); the parties held the third-step meeting April 7; and on May 5, the Union notified the Company that in the Harris case "The Union hereby withdraws this grievance" (R. Exh. 17).

In the April 7 meeting, the Company offered to settle the Lewis discharge grievance by offering her reinstatement at a different place, without backpay or seniority. The Union's spokesman, Research Specialist Margaret McCann, stated that Lewis' seniority would be a key to settling the grievance. (Tr. 179, 185.) After checking with Lewis, McCann stated in the May 5 letter to the Company that "The settlement offer was unacceptable, therefore, we need to select an arbitrator for the case" (R. Exh. 17).

Meanwhile, although McCann continued to seek a satisfactory settlement, she notified Lewis (but not the Company) that a union in-house panel had voted that the grievance was not arbitrable. McCann explained that the Union's "first criteria is getting people their jobs back," and "she could have her job back" under the Company's offer (but at a different location and without backpay, seniority, or other benefits). (Tr. 191-192.) She testified positively that the Union was not arbitrating the case (Tr. 191).

In a telephone conversation on May 31, Personnel Manager Bopp told McCann that the Company would offer Lewis a job in the nearby Blue Cross building on Forest Park, but without her prior seniority (Tr. 181-182). McCann confirmed this offer in writing (stating in r June 1 letter to Bopp reviewing the stats of several evances that in the Lewis case, "Settlement pending: einstatement to former position in another building" (R. xh. 18), but the Union continued to insist upon the res- ration of Lewis' seniority as a condition for settling the ievance (Tr. 185). Lewis was also asking for vacation y (Tr. 158).

Finally on June 16 (over 4 months after the discharge), ersonnel Manager Bopp reaffirmed the Company's posi- on in writing offering in settlement of the grievance re- statement at another place, without backpay, seniority, r vacation pay. She offered again to place Lewis in the lue Cross building, with the "date she starts work" to become her new seniority date." (R. Exh. 19.)

Lewis refused the settlement offer, and the grievance emained unresolved (Tr. 188–189).

2. Reinstatement after charge filed

On June 23, a week after the Company's last offer to ettle the grievance, Lewis filed the charge in this pro- ceeding.

About a week later, Personnel Manager Bopp telephoned Lewis about filing the charge. As Lewis credibly testified, "I say yes, that's right because . . . you didn't give me backpay, you didn't give me my seniority, and you didn't give me my vacation checks, you didn't give me nothing." At that point (as Lewis further testified without any rebuttal), Bopp stated "we'll [also] give you your vacation checks and we'll give you your seniority back." Lewis, having been off the job about 5 months, refused to settle the charge on that basis. (Tr. 171.)

Lewis remained off the job another month until Personnel Manager Bopp again contacted her, a few days before the complaint was issued July 28. When Lewis returned the call July 25, Bopp offered to reinstate her August 1 at the Blue Cross building—without backpay, without the previously offered seniority and vacation pay, and without any mention of settling either the pending NLRB charge or the unresolved grievance. Lewis agreed and returned to work August 1. (Tr. 172–173.)

3. Contentions of the parties on deferral

In his brief on the merits, the General Counsel disputes the Company's defense that a settlement of Lewis' grievance forecloses a Board remedy. He contends that the argument is frivolous because it is "patently obvious" that there was never a settlement of the grievance. "It is abundantly clear that Respondent's reinstatement of Lewis on August 1" was not in settlement of the grievance, but "was designed solely to toll Lewis' backpay after the instant charge had been filed."

In its original brief, the Company proffered two theories for arguing that the Lewis grievance was settled. First, after citing McCann's disclosure at the trial that the Union decided to forgo arbitration because of the reinstatement offer, the Company goes outside the record and asserts—without citing any supporting evidence—that "it is generally understood that failure to arbitrate constitutes a settlement of the grievance on the basis of Respondent's last offer." Second, contrary to the undisputed evidence, the Company argues that Lewis was reinstated as a result of a settlement of her grievance.

Both parties later filed briefs in response to my March 1, 1984 Notice to Show Cause "whether the issues in this case should be deferred to the grievance-arbitration provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement, with the Board retaining jurisdiction for the limited purpose stated" in the recent Board decision in United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984).

In his response, "the General Counsel vigorously opposes deferral of this case to the grievance-arbitration procedure," contending that immediate remedial action is critical to protect Lewis' own statutory rights and to prevent other employees from being discouraged in the exercise of their statutory rights. He argues that the first and foremost reason "this case should not be deferred to the parties' grievance-arbitration procedure is that this procedure has already been utilized by the parties without any resolution of the issue having been reached." Furthermore, nothing in United Technologies "disturbs the settled tenet that deferral requires two parties to the grievance-arbitration procedure ready and willing to process the grievance through arbitration." Here the Company does not seek arbitration; "the Union has no intention of pursuing Lewis' grievance through any further steps of the grievance procedure"; and it would not be appropriate to defer but retain jurisdiction for further consideration on a showing that the dispute "has not . . . been resolved by amicable settlement of the grievance or submitted promptly to arbitration." The General Counsel also contends that the operative events occurred over a year ago; the case was tried well before the decision in United Technologies was issued, and forcing the Company and Union "to, in effect, relitigate this entire case in another forum would be, at best, fundamentally unfair and a gross drain upon the parties' resources."

The Company in its response continues to argue that a settlement was reached and that Lewis was reinstated "as a result" of that settlement. It erroneously contends that Union Representative McCann testified that the Union was "satisfied" with the reinstatement offer (to a different place, without backpay, accrued seniority, or vacation pay)—contrary to the undisputed evidence that both the Union and Lewis continued to seek a satisfactory settlement after the Union's no-arbitration decision was reached. It also erroneously contends that "Only after the offer was accepted did Miss Lewis or the union representative convey any disagreement to the Company"—contrary to the undisputed evidence that the offer for reinstatement alone, as well as the offer for reinstatement plus seniority and vacation pay to settle the NLRB charge, was rejected until weeks later when the Company again made the reinstatement offer, not to settle either the grievance or charge, but obviously to toll backpay. Although the Company does not seek arbitration, it argues that the "spirit of deferral is clearly in line with the policies expressed by the Board in United Technologies," and contends that "the Board should defer to the resolution of this dispute through the contractual grievance-arbitration machinery" (i.e., defer to the purported settlement).

4. Concluding findings on deferral

The Company and Union have agreed to a dispute resolution machinery, but submission to arbitration is at the Union's option. The collective-bargaining agreement does not provide for withdrawal or settlement of a grievance, or for acceptance of the Company's last offer, if the parties reach a deadlock in resolving the grievance and no arbitration is held.

Because of the Union's "first criteria in getting people their jobs back," it decided (without informing the Company) that Lewis' discharge grievance was not arbitrable in view of the Company's offer to reinstate her—at a different location, without backpay, seniority, or vacation pay. The Union and Lewis continued to seek a more satisfactory settlement of the grievance, until a deadlock was reached when the Company reaffirmed its decision in its June 16 letter not to offer more than reinstatement alone and the settlement offer was rejected.

It was a week after this deadlock in settlement efforts that Lewis filed her NLRB charge. About a month later, the Company offered (and Lewis accepted) reinstatement, not in settlement of either the charge or the grievance, but to toll any backpay. Neither the Company nor the Union seeks arbitration of the grievance.

In United Technologies Corp., above, 268 NLRB 557 at 560, in contrast to this case, the respondent employer "expressed its wilingness, indeed its eagerness, to arbitrate the dispute." There, the employer (id. at 557) denied the union's grievance at the third step, the union withdrew its grievance "without prejudice"; the employer filed its own grievance to protest the union's refusal to withdraw the grievance "with prejudice"; and the union refused the employer's request to arbitrate the matter. The Board ruled (at 559) that

> Where an employer and a union have voluntarily elected to create dispute resolution machinery culminating in final and binding arbitration, it is contrary to the basic principles of the Act for the Board to jump into the fray prior to an honest attempt by the parties to resolve their disputes through that machinery. For dispute resolution under the grievance-arbitration process is as much a part of collective bargaining as the act of negotiating the contract. In our view, the statutory purpose of encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining is ill served by permitting the parties to ignore their agreement and to petition this Board in the first instance for remedial relief.

In the present case, the charge was not filed until the parties made an honest attempt over a 4-month period to resolve the Lewis discharge grievance through the dispute resolution machinery, but failed to reach a settlement. The Union exercised its contractual option not to take the grievance to arbitration. The Company is not seeking a deferral to the arbitral forum, but is seeking a deferral to a purported settlement.

In effect, the Company is seeking to graft unto the grievance-arbitration procedure a waiver provision that a failure to arbitrate constitutes a settlement of the grievance on the basis of the Company's last offer. That is a matter for negotiations, not something to be inferred. As negotiated, Section 19.01 of the collective-bargaining agreement gives the Union an unrestricted option, stating that "representatives of the Employer and the Union shall make an honest and sincere effort to adjust [the grievance] in an amicable manner. In the event, however, of the inability of the Employer and the Union to reach an agreement on the issue in dispute, the question may, at the option of the Union," be submitted for arbitration.

Having found that the charge was not filed until all the dispute resolution machinery required by the collective-bargaining agreement had been utilized without any resolution of the Lewis discharge grievance being reached, and that neither the Company nor the Union is seeking arbitration of the grievance, I find that the policies of the Act would not be effectuated by deferring this case to the arbitral forum.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By suspending Veronica Lewis January 28 and discharging her February 3, 1983, for engaging in protected concerted activity, the Company engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The policies of the Act would not be effectuated by deferring this case to the arbitral forum.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent, having unlawfully suspended and discharged an employee, must make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from date of suspension to date of her reinstatement, less any net interim earnings, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

The Respondent, Spann Building Maintenance Co., St. Louis, Missouri, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Suspending, discharging, or otherwise disciplining any employee for engaging in protected concerted activity.

[2] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make Veronica Lewis whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against her, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against her in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facilities in the St. Louis, Missouri area, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. General Teamsters Union, Local 483 and Ida Cal Freight Lines, Inc. Case 19–CC–1715

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On September 18, 1986, Administrative Law Judge David G. Heilbrun issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief; the Respondent, General Teamsters Union, Local 483, filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and a separate answering brief; and the Charging Party, Ida Cal Freight Lines, Inc., filed a brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, the cross-exceptions, and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions, as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order.

Ida Cal Freight Lines, Inc. is a trucking firm, operating in 36 States from its Nampa, Idaho terminal. At the time of the hearing, Ida Cal had 135 employee-drivers who were covered by a collective-bargaining agreement that expired February 28, 1986. Ida Cal also had 80 to 85 owner-operators whose employee status is in issue. The Respondent contends that the owner-operators are employees; Ida Cal argues that they are independent contractors.

On November 8, 1985, the Respondent filed an 8(a)(5) charge against Ida Cal, alleging that Ida Cal had failed to apply the terms of the existing collective-bargaining agreement to the owner-operators. On January 29, 1986, the Regional Director dismissed the charge on the ground that the owner-operators are independent contractors, and the General Counsel thereafter denied the Respondent's appeal of the dismissal. In November 1985, the Respondent also filed a grievance seeking a determination that the owner-operators were covered by the collective-bargaining agreement. Subsequently, it demanded arbitration of the grievance. Ida Cal rejected the grievance on substantive and procedural grounds and refused to arbitrate the matter. In January 1986 the Respondent Union filed a Section 301 action in United States District Court for the District of Idaho presenting the owner-operator issue. In February 1986 Ida Cal filed an 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) charge against the Respondent, resulting in the complaint giving rise to this proceeding. On April 16, 1986, the United States District Court stayed its proceedings pending the Board's decision in this case.

Underlying the 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) issue is the dispute over the status of owner-operators. We agree with the judge, for the reasons set forth in his decision, that the owner-operators, including those who have lease-purchase agreements with Ida Cal, are independent contractors and not statutory employees. In addition to Don Bass Trucking, 275 NLRB 1172 (1985), and Precision Bulk Transport, 279 NLRB 437 (1986), on which the judge correctly relied, see Container Transit, 281 NLRB 1039 (1986).

We do not agree with the judge that the complaint warrants dismissal because of insufficiency in the pleading. The complaint's substantive allegations, paragraphs 5 and 6, allege:

> (a) On or about November 11, 1985, Respondent filed a grievance with Ida Cal pursuant to the terms of the Contract requesting that "owner-operators" be covered by the Contract including the union security clause . . . .
> (b) At all times material since November 11, 1985, Respondent has demanded that Ida Cal proceed to arbitration pursuant to the terms of the Contract regarding the grievance described above in subparagraph (a).
> 6.
> On or about January 7, 1986, Respondent filed suit under Section 301 of the Act asking that the "owner-operators" be covered by the terms of the Contract, including the union security clause . . . . [Emphasis added.]

Paragraph 9(a) states that an object of the Respondent's conduct "is and has been," to force the independent contractors to join the Respondent, and paragraph 9(b) alleges that an object "is, and has been," to require Ida Cal to enter into an agreement prohibited by Section 8(e) of the Act. (Emphasis added.)

Although the judge's decision is not entirely clear, it appears that the judge viewed the General Counsel's position to be that the Respondent's conduct was lawful at the outset and became unlawful only upon the Regional Director's January 29, 1986 determination that the owner-operators are independent contractors. The judge concluded that the complaint is inadequate because it alleged only that the Respondent engaged in the original actions of November 1985 and January 1986 and not that the Respondent has continued to maintain those actions in the sense of not withdrawing them. In the judge's opinion, the latter was "the real contention" and "should have been so pled." We disagree.

We view the General Counsel's position to be that the owner-operators are independent contractors and that the Respondent's filing of the grievance and lawsuit, and the continuation of those actions, violated Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A). We find that the complaint properly pleads the filing of the grievance and the filing of the lawsuit in a straightforward manner. Although the complaint does not specifically allege that the Respondent is continuing to press its actions, the complaint language adequately indicates that the actions are ongoing. Accordingly, we conclude that the complaint is sufficient to plead the General Counsel's theory of the case.

Alternatively, the judge recommended that the complaint be dismissed on the merits. For the following reasons, we agree.

In Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 274 (Warwick Caterers), 269 NLRB 482 (1984), the Board held that a Regional Director's dismissal, and the General Counsel's upholding the dismissal, of a union's prior 8(a)(5) charges involving single-employer and accretion issues did not preclude the union from raising the issues as a defense to an 8(b)(7)(C) allegation. The Board held that such dismissal did not serve as a determination of the unit issues. The Board stated (269 NLRB at 483):

> [T]he Board is bound to hear, receive, and consider the Respondent's answer at a trial-like hearing. The Regional Director's prior consideration and investigation of the earlier charge serves a more limited and discretionary function than the hearing necessary under the Act and cannot, therefore, serve as replacement for the Board's adjudicatory responsibility.

In its supplemental decision following remand to the judge, the Board rejected the union's defense on the merits and concluded that the union's picketing violated Section 8(b)(7)(C). Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 274 (Warwick Caterers), 282 NLRB 939 (1987). The Board, however, reversed the judge's finding that the union violated Section 8(b)(3), (2), and (1)(A) by insisting on arbitration and seeking through the grievance procedure to compel application of its bargaining agreement with Elan to Warwick Caterers' employees, a separate unit. The Board held that the union's grievance action did not violate the Act because the unit question had not previously been determined by the Board. The Board stated, "Therefore, at that point, it was not unreasonable for the Union to continue to maintain its position on the single-employer and accretion issues and attempt to have an arbitrator resolve the dispute." 282 NLRB 939.

The two Warwick Caterers decisions are applicable in this proceeding to both the grievance-arbitration and the Section 301 actions. The complaint alleges, in essence, that the Respondent took these actions to compel union representation of the independent contractors. Although the Respondent did take the actions to compel representation of Ida Cal's owner-operators, there had been no adjudicatory determination at that time, or at the time of the complaint or the hearing, that the owner-operators were independent contractors. Furthermore, the Respondent's actions were consistent with a goal of obtaining an adjudication, through arbitration or court action, of the status of the owner-operators; the Respondent did not strike or picket. In addition, the Respondent's contention that the owner-operators are statutory employees was not unreasonable. The lease and lease-back or lease-purchase arrangements are recent developments. They began in 1984, often involving former employee drivers; the arrangements increased during 1985 and into 1986. Importantly, in determining owner-operator status, the Board uses the right-of-control test, which depends on the facts of each case, which is not determined by any one factor, and which often presents a close issue of fact.

Teamsters Local 705 (Emery Air Freight), 278 NLRB 1303 (1986), enf. denied in relevant part and remanded 820 F.2d 448 (D.C. Cir. 1987), in which the Board held that the union's grievance filing violated the Act, is distinguishable. The Board found that the union's grievance was not intended to preserve existing bargaining unit jobs, a legitimate work preservation object, because the union never represented the employees who did the work. Rather, in the context of threats and a strike, which had an unlawful secondary object, the Board concluded that the Union's grievance filing likewise had an illegal objective. By contrast, here the Respondent did not threaten or strike, and because the question whether owner-operators are employees turns on the facts of each case and had not yet been determined through an adjudicatory process, the Respondent had a legitimate object in seeking a resolution of the issue through grievance arbitration and through a Section 301 lawsuit.[1]

[1] Chairman Stephens and Member Cracraft find it unnecessary to decide whether Emery Air Freight was correctly decided; they agree it is distinguishable.

Member Babson agrees that Emery Air Freight is distinguishable and further finds it unnecessary to pass on the judge's discussion of that case here. In dismissing the complaint, Member Babson additionally relies on the fact that Ida Cal had control over the independent contractors that were the subject matter of the grievance and of the Sec. 301 action filed by the Respondent.

For the above reasons, we agree with the judge that the complaint should be dismissed.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

Daniel R. Sanders, for the General Counsel.

Louis L. Uranga (Uranga & Uranga), of Boise, Idaho, for the Union Respondent.

Robert M. Pattison (Jackson, Lewis, Schnitzler & Krupman), of San Francisco, California, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID G. HEILBRUN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard 14 and 15 May 1986 at Boise, Idaho. The charge was filed 12 February 1986 and the complaint issued 28 February 1986. The primary issue is whether General Teamsters Union, Local 483 (Respondent) threatened, restrained, or coerced persons with an object of forcing or requiring those self-employed to join a labor organization, or an employer to enter into an agreement prohibited by Section 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, and culminated such conduct by filing suit under Section 301 of the Act, in violation of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) of the Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of witnesses and after consideration of briefs filed by the parties, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Ida Cal Freight Lines, Inc. (Ida Cal) maintains an office and principal place of business in Nampa, Idaho, where it is engaged as an intrastate and interstate trucking company with annual gross sales of goods and services valued in excess of $500,000, of which more than $50,000 was derived from customers outside the State of Idaho or were provided customers within Idaho, which were themselves engaged in interstate commerce by other than indirect means. Additionally, Ida Cal annually purchases and receives goods and materials at its Idaho facilities valued in excess of $50,000, which were received directly from sources outside that State, or from suppliers within Idaho, which in turn had obtained them directly from sources outside the State. On these admitted facts, I find that Ida Cal is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Basis of Analysis

1. The independent contractor issue

a. Company operations

Ida Cal is a trucking firm engaged as an irregular route common carrier under Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) regulation. From a Nampa, Idaho terminal it operates in 36 States.

Its complement of drivers was formerly a standard work force of the industry and represented in collective bargaining by Respondent. Early in 1984 the imminent retirement of certain trucking equipment led to creation of several lease-purchase agreements, often with persons Ida Cal had been employing. In such cases, the lessee typically paid 10 percent down on one or more tractor units with potential for monthly payments over 3 years to a time of optional buy-out. Coextensively, the lessee was committed to a "transportation agreement" in which as "contractor" an industry termed "truck and driver" would be furnished Ida Cal.

The number of such lease and lease-back arrangements increased during 1985 and into 1986. The contracting person or entity was termed an "owner-operator." Additionally, Ida Cal utilized truck and driver services by other contractors who simply owned tractors or controlled such equipment by some unrelated means. In the recent representative past, an approximate overall configuration was that Ida Cal had 80 to 85 owner-operators based on 30 transportation agreements with outsiders, plus 8 to 10 lease and transportation agreements of which half were with persons who previously had been company drivers and which covered a total of 15 tractor units. In contrast with combined services provided by these owner-operators, a numerically predominant group of 135 "employee drivers" remains as the major component of Ida Cal's total personnel.

Ida Cal strives to provide reliable trucking of food products and freight by an array of pickup, delivery, backhauling, brokered loads, and related services. To this end, it requires company drivers and invites owner-operators, or their hired drivers, to telephone in on a regular basis for dispatch. The system also involves frequent calling to dispatchers from the road, customer premises, or distant points. The entire activity is permeated with regulatory requirements and traditional business practices under which driving logs, trip reports, bills of lading, expense receipts, and miscellaneous related documents are accumulated for submission on completion of specific trips.

b. The documented arrangements

The basic equipment lease served to identify units, establish costs and values, state maintenance, repair, operation, and insuring covenants, express the lessee's right of termination and lessor's rights in event of default, and closed with standard contractual verbiage. The transportation agreement evolved from what was originally used in 1984–1985 to one of revised form and content as introduced for 1986. Both covered compensation to owner-operators, apportionment of insurance coverages, establishment of impress account (later "escrow fund") and recitations of regulatory compliance. In terms of direct fulfillment of purpose, the earlier edition stated simply that the owner-operator "will either drive the Equipment or provide a driver at his own expense [as controlled and directed by Contractor]." A "Policy Statement, 1985" as its Exhibit A enlarged on various financial aspects of the transportation agreement. The current version is pronouncedly more detailed, tightly specifies numerous rights of Ida Cal, states that the owner-operator "shall determine the means and methods of performance of all transportation services [so] undertaken," and expressly disclaims any intent by the parties to create an "EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE" relationship by the contract. An even more extensive "Addendum" became effective during April 1986.

Ida Cal publishes and disseminates an "Information, Policies and Procedures" binder covering a variety of subjects with numerous reminders concerning Department of Transportation (DOT) and Federal Highway Administration (FHA) regulations, plus an extensive closing portion on the correct handling of perishable loads. This document, suitable as it is for the guidance of those actually driving trucks, was incorporated by reference in original transportation agreements for compliance by the contracting owner-operator.

c. Indicia of status

Ida Cal's many regular company drivers continue to be treated as employees under the general terms and conditions obtained from the most recent collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, they are paid on a per mile, per weight basis by weekly net checks after standard withholdings, have vacation and holiday benefits, receive noncontributory group life, health and dental insurance, and are to observe particular rules of motoring, routing, and refueling.

Owner-operators earn a percentage of revenue paid by customers for the loads hauled, purchase their own fuel, pay for repair and maintenance costs of the leased tractor unit, select their own itinerary subject to delivery commitments, employ qualified drivers at their discretion, and draw against their impress/escrow account for expense money. In practical terms, the chief document passing regularly from Ida Cal to owner-operators is a weekly "settlement sheet." Ken Hobbs is employed as a full-time accountant to prepare, to issue, and to correct the settlement sheets and accompanying paperwork in support of the various credits and deductions. It is here that compensation of owner-operators is entered based on the principal contractual basis of 73 percent of revenue plus special revenue items for other compensable services. From total earnings, the numerous deductions or adjustments are made. Most frequently these cover fuel purchases when made from Ida Cal itself, rated fuel, and mileage taxes in the states traveled, repair or maintenance services when procured from Ida Cal, insurance premium payments for coverage arranged through Ida Cal or on its own policies, and proportional payments of the basic equipment lease cost amounts. The net yielded from all applicable calculations represents clear income to the owner-operators after payment due for the leased tractors, contractual outlays, and particular operating expense of the weekly period in question. Owner-operators do not receive vacation, holiday, nor insurance benefits from Ida Cal. After a return home, they are not required to accept new loads if they have not reported availability. When at a distant delivery point, and following delivery, they are permitted to obtain brokered loads to other points or generally back toward the Pacific Northwest subject to approval by Ida Cal's dispatcher. The power of approval is retained in order to better assure that equipment actually at some distant point will be first committed to customer needs at that location.

DOT regulations prescribe minimum qualifications for those operating motor vehicles, require the thorough completion of a daily log showing driving, duty, and rest times within the spacing of 24-hour and 8-day limits, and characterize a regulated motor carrier as "employ[ing] a person to drive when it so requires or permits" this function in its business and regardless of whether the vehicle is owned by the motor carrier. In these regards, Ida Cal administers DOT driving tests to persons proposed by owner-operators for a $50 charge, and monitors trip log submissions by owner-operators or their hired drivers. Further, the earlier version of the equipment lease recited that Ida Cal was not to be considered owner of the leased unit, a point about which the current equipment lease is silent.

d. Particularized evidence

Within the broad operational outline shown to be typical there are significant variations, practices or episodes to consider. The most evident consists of correspondence or memoranda that relate to this issue.[1] On 26 February 1985 Executive Vice President Paul Sudmeier wrote to "Gerry" of T&G Leasing, Inc., an entity with whom a three-unit equipment lease had been in effect. Sudmeier's letter advanced implications of "undependability and dishonesty" as the basis for an asserted breach of the transportation agreement and, relatedly, the equipment lease under its sections 1 and 3(d). Gerry was requested to immediately turn in unit 196, with the writer's hope expressed that other units under lease would be run better to avoid further terminating.

On 25 and 28 June 1985, Day issued memoranda to all owner-operators concerning per mile insurance rates that were increased and, as an addendum to the Company's policies statement at the time, the "release" of a contractor to secure loads was preconditioned on detailed advice to a dispatcher of its destination, and revenues to the contractor would not be settled until actually received by Ida Cal.

On 26 September 1985, Richard Carter, Ida Cal's president, issued a lengthy memorandum to all owner-operators on the subject of insurance rates, with particular reference to a current "industry crisis" and the likelihood of soon sharply increased premium rates for less coverage. The memorandum advised that a "dramatic" increase to 6 cents per mile would be imposed effective 1 October 1985, and that this could soon increase to another penny if insurance carriers invoked a penalty clause for a retro-fund reserve. Carter's memorandum closed with a pointed reminder of how accident-free driving would be the best salvation into the immediate future. On 10 October 1985, Day tersely advised owner-operators that the retro-fund surcharge had been implemented by the insurance carrier, resulting in a retroactive increase of 1 cent per mile subject to reversion again to a basic 6 cents if no claims arose during a 60-day period.

[1] I disregard a memorandum written 30 November 1983 from then-operations manager John Day to all drivers on grounds that it predates material times of this case.

On 27 January 1986, Sudmeier wrote to an Idaho attorney for certain owner-operators including T&G Leasing. This letter alluded to considerable "unpaid rent" on several of the tractor units leased to T&G, and demanded their return or payoff by an early date.

Illustrative testimony was given by owner-operators Richard Smith and Robert Stewart, by former owner-operator Jeff White, and by former company driver Howard Morris. Smith is actually Ida Cal's director of maintenance, and in a capacity separate from this employment an owner-operator of three tractors leased from the Company. Smith hires his own drivers in reliance on Ida Cal's screening, and otherwise routinely fulfills a transportation agreement. He testified that maintenance and mechanical repair of his leased tractors would be undertaken most efficiently and economically because of personal expertise, either as an activity reimbursable to Ida Cal at its Nampa facility or to the extent that his drivers had such needs when on the road.

Stewart is independently purchasing his own truck and for 2 years has contracted services to Ida Cal under which he, his son, and occasionally his wife have driven. All three are company qualified to drive, yet Stewart testified that on some trips his wife is along largely for companionship. Stewart also testified that he wishes not to drive eastward from Idaho, and this preference is accommodated by Ida Cal dispatchers. Stewart had previously driven for T&G Leasing in its hauling for Ida Cal, however that relationship ended in a pay dispute he had with Jeff White as a principal of T&G.

White testified at Respondent's behest, outlining that he was a former company driver who converted to owner-operator in November 1984. He personally drove for 3 months until February 1985, when, because of chargeable accidents, he hired a driver for continuation under a transportation agreement. His entire arrangement with Ida Cal later terminated when his hired driver totaled the unit, and White is without information about any insurance proceeds or outcome of any claim by the hired driver for injuries. White is unfamiliar with the concept of brokered loads. A settlement sheet to White dated 11 October 1985 shows that deductions of that particular week included an amount of $514.90 for gross wages, subsistence, and employer withholdings on a driver named Roy Harwood. Hobbs explained in rebuttal testimony that Harwood had been offered to T&G as an available driver for a particular trip that week spanning 2186 miles. White testified that he attempted to stay in good stead with Ida Cal's dispatchers by always accepting a "forced dispatch."[2]

Morris also testified for Respondent as a former company driver from July 1983 to August 1985, during June 1985 he drove a 2-week period for owner-operator R. K. Wilson. This brief timespan was one in which Morris had actually tried out the condition of an R. K. Wilson tractor for possible purchase or lease as his own. Morris recounted that while an Ida Cal company driver his preferences as to load-taking and destinations were diminished by the advent of Gary Wilson as "chief dispatcher." Gary Wilson has in fact been Ida Cal's manager of operations since May 1985. Morris also testified to incidents when as a company driver in September 1984 he obtained a brokered load through negotiations, and when later driving for R. K. Wilson was directed by Ida Cal's dispatcher to pick up a brokered load and enter into a trip lease for its hauling with the broker.

The composite of testimony regarding the Ida Cal information policies binder is to the effect that it is fully complied with where written in regard to governmental regulations, is a basic source of guidance concerning vehicle inspection, operation, and care, is informational concerning general company dealings, and is technically valuable for its intricate description of refrigeration trailers.

e. Holding

A sharp focusing on this issue is provided from two recent Board decisions. In Don Bass Trucking, 275 NLRB 1172 (1985), a highly similar factual situation was involved as to an intrastate common carrier, and the significance of government-imposed regulations was specifically addressed. The Board favorably cited Air Transit, 271 NLRB 1108 (1984), in which the accepted reasoning was that more extensive regulation of the industry afforded lessened opportunity for control by a putative employer. To the extent inconsistent the earlier Mitchell Bros. Truck Lines, 249 NLRB 476 (1980), was expressly overruled.

Precision Bulk Transport, 279 NLRB 437 (1986), was another case of comparable facts, and here the Board held that equipment leases setting forth required ICC terminology fixing "exclusive possession, control, and use" of a truck with the carrier was an insufficient limitation on entrepreneurial status, and that countering facts showing enjoyment of certain freedom by owner-operators plus the business risks they bore were, as a composite matter, more indicative of the independent contractor relationship.[3]

[2] Forced dispatch is a per mile payment to owner-operators when they drive empty from a distant point to some other distant pickup point. An instance appears in White's settlement sheet of 11 October 1985 on which $172.80 was paid for 384 miles at 45 cents per mile in connection with load No. LA 14307.

[3] In this same vein, it is unavailing for Respondent to argue, as it does in its brief at 6, that deeming the carrier an "owner of said Equipment for the purpose of subleasing" is an "additional" control going "one step further" than government-imposed regulations. In reality, 45 C.F.R. Sec. 1057.12(d)(2) of the ICC expressly authorizes such a provision in any written lease.

Here the principal subjects of lease content, personal investment by owner-operators and their discretion in hiring drivers, method of compensation, latitude in trip routing, responsibility for taxes, fees, and insurance, conditional right to obtain brokered loads, and emancipation from originating dispatch requirements all signify that an independent contractor relationship did arise as recited between the parties in the revised transportation agreement and as influentially noted by the Board in Don Bass Trucking. The applicable common law test for these situations is identically stated in both Don Bass Trucking, 275 NLRB at 1173, and Precision Bulk Transport to be:

> Where the one for whom the services are performed retains the right to control the manner and the means by which the result is to be accomplished, the relationship is one of employment; while, on the other hand, where control is reserved only as to the result sought, the relationship is that of an independent contractor. The resolution of this question depends on the facts of each case, and no one factor is determinative.

On the whole record, I find that Ida Cal has not retained a right of controlling actual manner and means by which owner-operators perform their services. What is seen instead is a comprehensive contractual arrangement in which Ida Cal possesses enormous leverage and insinuates deeply into the handling of cost expenditures by or on behalf of owner-operators, yet leaving still a core situation of entrepreneurial risk-taking with typical prospects for business profit or loss depending on diligence and decision making.

On specifics, Ida Cal's processing of nominated drivers is essentially a service for a fee, with an eye to what DOT requires, and its information binder a useful compendium with which owner-operators comply fully when necessary and discretionarily otherwise.[4] Ida Cal's strictness in requiring reliable fulfillment of the truck and driver agreements is no more than other posturings between customer and supplier in a generally arm's-length business relationship.[5] Further, a "sharp contrast," of the type the Board notes,[6] is demonstrated in the comparison of capital investment, truck maintenance costs, compensation formula, occupational benefits and availability for work assignments as between owner-operators and regular company drivers.

Such contrasts predominate, even with some exception, as with former company driver Morris' isolated role in the full cycle of a brokered load, and the self-inflicted oddity of White being forced off his own leased truck. In the first instance, a particular business transaction went from potential to actual under close supervision of an employee available for this purpose, and as to the second instance Ida Cal did no more than harmonize its operations with lawful industry regulations. While Don Bass was an intrastate carrier only, and Precision Bulk involved contracts viewed more as "trip leases," the facts of this case constitute an indistinguishable amalgamation of these two recent precedents.

Here the essential objective was, as Sudmeier summarizingly testified, the creation of administratively feasible permanent transportation leases with prudent autonomy retained by the owner-operators, plus a residual potential for acquiring mutually remunerative brokered, trip-leased backhauls when available, convenient and not any impediment to Ida Cal's basic servicing of customers. I therefore find that none of the persons having transportation agreements with Ida Cal, or their hired drivers, and regardless of whether the unit or units in use were leased from Ida Cal, were its employees within scope of the established bargaining unit as last defined by the phraseology "all over-the-road truck drivers, short-line pickup and delivery drivers and full-time loaders and unloaders."[7]

2. The 8(b)(4)(ii) issue

A settled collective-bargaining relationship between these parties has resulted in various past labor contracts. The most recent was one of 3 years' duration from 1 March 1983 to 28 February 1986. Following its expiration, no new labor contract has been reached. The last one expressly entitled Ida Cal to subcontract "all or any portion of its work," and provided as article XVIII on adjustment of grievances that any "differences and controversies relative to the application or interpretation of any of the provisions of this agreement" were subject to decisions "final upon both parties" by a four-member board of arbitration including, where necessary to resolution, a selected "fifth party."

Following some years as a subsidiary of major corporations, Ida Cal was returned to "local ownership" in June 1983. Shortly after this, the prospect of creating operator-owners arose, and as early as 12 October 1983 Respondent's secretary-treasurer, Roy Corson wrote to Carter with notice that the bargaining agent would consider any such persons covered by its then-current labor agreement. Corson also requested a meeting to discuss "infusion" of owner-operators to the unit at Ida Cal. Further correspondence on the subject was exchanged, and one inconclusive grievance resulted during the period of mid-1984 to early 1985.

[4] The information binder is further discountable in its material on "pretrip inspections," ostensibly in reference to DOT regulation No. 392.7. This subject of the voluminous Federal Motor Carrier Safety Regulations Pocketbook presumes only to forbid vehicle operation by a driver unless nine enumerated "parts and accessories" of the vehicle are "in good working order." The information binder expands on these nine, one of which is simply "tires," yet except for "critical tire wear" (emphasis supplied) no mention is made of assessing proper tire pressure. In a subsequent page entitled "equipment care" drivers are exhorted to pridefully manage the rigs, and regarding tire pressure as "important for safety reasons" to check it periodically and while enroute "bump tires" at every stop. The literal result of this configuration is that bumping of tires would not necessarily be required when starting a trip, an unlikely circumstance showing still more that the information binder is simply not to be taken that seriously.

[5] The Board referred specifically to testimony in Don Bass Trucking that owner-operators were subject to termination for failure to comply with terms of the lease or other inappropriate derelictions.

b. Current posture

In November 1985, Respondent filed a grievance relative to the owner-operators, seeking a concession that they be covered by all conditions of the labor agreement and that financial relief flow to the Union and those of the "owner-operator division." The grievance was rejected on substantive and procedural grounds, following which Respondent unsuccessfully attempted to obtain Ida Cal's participation in the joint process of selecting an impartial fifth arbitrator. Additionally, by letter dated 8 January 1986, Respondent's counsel, Louis L. Uranga, wrote clarifyingly to Carter about the grievance.

On 17 January 1986, Attorney Uranga filed civil action No. 86-1023 in United States District Court for the District of Idaho invoking Section 301 of the Act. The complaint formally presented the essential owner-operator developments, seeking declaratory and monetary relief, plus that as would further appear "just and proper" to the court. The record does not disclose when the summons and complaint in this action were served on defendant Ida Cal, however, a final exchange of correspondence occurred between the parties in late January 1986, showing them still deadlocked on the fundamental dispute.

Concurrent with these dynamics Respondent had, on 8 November 1985, filed an 8(a)(5) charge against Ida Cal as Case 19-CA-17931. This was dismissed on 29 January 1986 by the Regional Director with Don Bass Trucking as the referenced authority. An appeal of this dismissal was denied on behalf of the General Counsel by letter dated 27 February 1986 in which a page of rationale also associating to Don Bass was contained. The final development to date in the lawsuit then occurred on 16 April 1986 when the court dealt with pending motions as supported by memoranda submitted following oral argument. An order of that date denied Ida Cal's Motion for Summary Judgment and granted plaintiff's motion to stay proceedings in order that the litigation "be held in abeyance until a decision is reached in the NLRB action filed by defendant Ida Cal."

c. Holding

As a threshold reason, this complaint warrants dismissal because of insufficiency in the pleading. Paragraphs 5 and 6 of the complaint, setting forth the heart of the matter, allege only that in November 1985 and early January 1986 Respondent grieved to arbitration and filed suit in United States district court, respectively. Complaint paragraphs 8 and 9 allege effects and objective of such activity, and beyond this the complaint, as formally amended at the hearing in minor inadvertent regards, contains only predictable conclusionary verbiage.

Thus, a fair reading of this fundamental pillar of labor relations law litigation is that it accuses Respondent of having pressed for arbitration on a broad contractual question, and having sought to compel this avenue of resolution under familiar Federal district court jurisdiction. However, facts of the case show that both actions were well prior to the Regional Director's administrative determination to which theory of the complaint is closely keyed, and the ordered stay of Federal district court proceedings as issued in April 1986.

The chronology of the situation is a critical consideration, for at the point in time when Respondent's conduct set forth in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the complaint took place the General Counsel would presumably not have then theorized that it triggerred a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A). It was only because of the Regional Director's administrative determination on 29 January 1986, a decision later upheld on appeal, that the General Counsel's position tilts.

What follows is the inescapable conclusion that Respondent is not being accused of its original actions in November 1985 and January 1986, but of maintaining those actions in the sense of not withdrawing the dispute from arbitration under the now-expired contract and relatedly discontinuing its court case. This being the real contention, it should have been so pled, but I must deal with the complaint as actually presented. The Agency is cloaked with both congressional and judicial imprimaturs of expertise, and this must manifest in matters as basic as complaint drafting. I recognize that paragraph 10 of the complaint does read, in reference to Respondent's activities as referred to in paragraphs 5, 6, 8, and 9, that it "did engage in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices." However, such mere conclusionary phrasing is insufficient to put Respondent on notice that it should, from the time the complaint issued on 28 February 1986, be prepared to defend not only its actions as originally legitimately done, but also its role in a continuum of events colored by the particularly extraneous factor of governmental voice exemplified in the Regional Director's official refusal to issue complaint in the CA case. The fact that Uranga had introduced himself into the grievance procedure by corresponding to Carter on 8 January 1986 is insufficient to change the technical character of the lawsuit he then filed on 17 January 1986, nor is there significance in this regard that the Union continued with board of arbitration activity during late January 1986.

Imprecision arises from the mutually exclusive assertions contained in paragraph 6 of the complaint as compared with the General Counsel's opening statement of record. In the former, Respondent's challenged action is correctly termed, asking the court to declare that owner-operators be covered by the union-security clause of the collective-bargaining agreement then in effect. As would therefore be assumed, the actual Federal district court complaint is silent on any traditional attempt to judicially compel arbitration, either in its averments or its paragraph for relief. However, the General Counsel's opening statement describes this action under Section 301 of the Act as one "to compel arbitration of the issue." A fundamental difference exists between these two notions.[8] If a section 301 action seeks direct relief from the court it is founded in content of the collective-bargaining agreement; if it seeks only to compel arbitration, which if ordered need not necessarily involve the court any further in the controversy, the lawsuit must pass muster under Steelworkers v. Warrior & Gulf Navigation Co., 363 U.S. 574 (1960), and be subject to a defendant's resistance under principles associated to the doctrine of that case. Stated otherwise, the second type of action is not within the literature on conflict and reconciliation between the arbitral and legal forums, but instead only a court involvement to the extent of assessing substantive arbitrability.

[8] See Pressmen & Plate Makers Local 4 v. NLRB, 794 F.2d 420 (9th Cir. 1986), in which the court observed that "the Union has not attempted to compel arbitration through a Section 301 suit."

Interestingly, the employer had also drifted into a self-contradictory position during the eventful month of January 1986. Following institutional skirmishing in the exchange of correspondence between the parties during November and December 1985, an escalation was first seen when Uranga wrote to Carter on 8 January 1986 in support of his client's grievance. Then against the background of midmonth filing of complaint in court the parties engaged in board of arbitration activity, and by 28 January 1986 the matter was sufficiently crystalized that Carter summarized Ida Cal's position in a two-page letter of that date written to union participants on the Board of Arbitration. This lawyer-like communication rejected grievance No. 3340, raised the specter of 8(b) and 8(e) violations were the employer to succumb, and, as a stated defense that could be "in part, in the alternative" claimed that Respondent had breached the contract "by resorting to other forms for relief" beyond the grievance procedure. This last quoted passage could only refer to the freshly filed lawsuit in Federal district court, and shows that the employer did not then consider such action to be a furtherance of the contractual grievance procedure. The charge in this matter, filed only 15 days later by counsel of record here, particularizes the asserted unfair labor practice conduct within the meaning of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) in the disjunctive, with phraseology touching both on the seeking of "arbitration or court award" but without associating the two distinct concepts. Respondent's answer to the complaint essentially admits paragraphs 5(a) and (b), however, these are devoid of allegations introducing the concept of judicially compelled arbitration. Finally, it is noteworthy that the answer admits only having "demanded arbitration until" issuance of complaint, and having voluntarily agreed to stay the court proceedings afterwards.

The critical significance of this overall interplay of positioning, conduct, and bindingly written expression by the parties is that arbitration was invoked only on the informal plane of collective-bargaining dealings, a court declaration of contract application to the basic dispute was sought, and there was never a linking of the two approaches by Respondent. This lack of nexus means that for reasoning purposes in relation to the concept of coercive "threatening" under Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A), the only view that may be undertaken of the court action is one confined to its intrinsic thrust and not as a matter associated to, or extending from, the contractual clause on adjustment of grievances.

As an entirely independent basis for disposition, I believe this complaint must be dismissed on direct examination of its merits. In this alternative consideration of the case, there are two distinct grounds on which dismissal is mandated. The first is that Respondent has correctly theorized it is entitled to a hearing of some sort in terms of the dispute, and the second that irregardless its filing of suit is protected by the applicability of the United States Supreme Court's decision in Bill Johnson's Restaurants v. NLRB, 461 U.S. 731 (1983), to this proceeding.

Aside from the fundamental inclination in our jurisprudence to accord fair hearing of disputes, the facts here singularly command such an entitlement. This is particularly true when the significance of refusal by the General Counsel to issue an unfair labor practice complaint as sought by a charging party is considered. Such declination to act was well described by the court in Electrical Workers UE v. General Electric Co., 407 F.2d 253 (2d Cir. 1968), as "administrative only, neither formally adversarial nor like a trial." Another court held that unless the "rare case" of a "pure question of Board law which involved no factual issues or contract interpretation issues" obtained, the General Counsel's adoption of a Regional Director's refusal to issue complaint was "a final and unreviewable decision . . . before any adversarial process or full hearing on the merits." Edna H. Pagel, Inc. v. Teamsters Local 595, 667 F.2d 1275 (9th Cir. 1982). Relatedly, the unreviewability of the General Counsel's manner of investigating unfair labor practice charges and determination of whether to issue complaint thereon is well settled. Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171 (1967); Dunn v. Retail Clerks Assn., 307 F.2d 285 (6th Cir. 1962); United Electrical Contractors Assn. v. Ordman, 366 F.2d 776 (2d Cir. 1966), cert. denied 385 U.S. 1026 (1967). From this composite of principles, Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 274 (Warwick Caterers), 269 NLRB 482 (1984), is an indistinguishable precedent for dismissal here. In Warwick a union's 8(a)(5) charge founded in alter ego theory was rejected, whereupon its continued picketing was charged by the employer as being violative under Section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act. On presentation to the Board, a remand of proceeding was ordered to substitute a "trial-like hearing" for the Regional Director's earlier upheld dismissal of the 8(a)(5) charges. The Board termed such prior consideration and investigation into the union claim of continuing rights of recognition and contract enforcement, as also separately sought through arbitration, a "more limited and discretionary function than the hearing necessary under the Act and cannot, therefore, serve as a replacement for the Board's adjudicatory responsibility." Here Respondent is jeopardized from challenging the Regional Director's finding that owner-operators are independent contractors, and essentials of the situation clearly warrant a "trial-like" adversarial presentation. Regardless of the conviction by which the Regional Director is now persuaded that coercion arises from Respondent having filed suit, this subordinates to the labor organization's entitlement to hearing. In this regard, it is totally conjectural to say, as the Charging Party argues in its brief at 37, that Respondent "surely made its best case in its presentation to the Regional Director in support of the charge in Case 19–CA–17931." On the contrary, there is no basis for such a presumption, nor can it now be known what extent of presentation may have been made by Respondent at that administrative level.

Regarding the second independent ground for dismissal, I emphasize that the decision in Bill Johnson's Restaurant was a suppressive holding in limitation of Board authority, and the exception carved out by the court was to suits having "an objective that is illegal under federal law." The Board has applied this distinction in Teamsters Local 705 (Emery Air Freight), 278 NLRB 303 (1986), where even assuming the applicability of Bill Johnson's the union was there found to have undertaken a plainly "unlawful secondary objective" when the work to which a grievance in question pertained had never in the recent past been performed by employees it represented and thus a legitimate work preservation objective could not have been present. Here the facts are diametrically opposite for the work sought to be preserved within the bargaining unit has been traditionally covered by Respondent's contract as a reflection of its role in the exclusive representation of such persons.[9]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Ida Cal Freight Lines, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has not committed any of the unfair labor practices alleged in this complaint.

Disposition

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

---

[9] It is unavailing for Charging Party to advance Laundry Workers Local 3 (Virginia Cleaners), 275 NLRB 697 (1985), for there again a labor organization had engaged in an objective that was illegal under Federal law by seeking state court enforcement of fines that it had unlawfully imposed under the Act.

[10] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Whittaker Corporation, Kettenburg Marine Division and Milton E. Johnston. Case 21-CA-21801

July 18, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On June 3, 1983, Administrative Law Judge Roger B. Holmes issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that Milton E. Johnston, the Charging Party, was discharged for the statements he made at an employee meeting called by the Respondent's president, Larry Miller, on November 22, 1982. The judge concluded, however, that Johnston's statements were not concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7; therefore, his discharge was lawful under the Act. We disagree.

The facts are not in dispute. On November 22, 1982, the Respondent's president, Larry Miller, conducted a series of meetings in his office with the employees, department by department, to inform them that they would not be receiving their regular annual wage increases. At each meeting, he invited questions, and several employees asked questions about his announcement. At the last of these meetings, after Miller completed his statement, Johnston raised his hand and stated:

> Well, I don't remember us being called together when there's been a good year and saying here's something extra. But now that there's a little downturn, I feel we're being asked to bear the brunt of it by not having an increase.

He further stated that, because he had not had the benefit of consulting the Company's books, he did not believe he could come to the same conclusion as the Respondent. Miller responded that the Respondent did not have to open its books to the employees. Johnston replied that he had not asked to see the books but merely stated that they were a source of information that he did not have. No other employee commented at the meeting on the wage policy; however, several employees expressed agreement with Johnston's comments afterwards. In reaction to Johnston's comments, the Respondent discharged him the next day for insubordination.

The Board held in Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493, 497 (1984) (Meyers I), remanded sub nom. Prill v. NLRB, 755 F.2d 941 (D.C. Cir. 1985), cert. denied 474 U.S. 948 (1985), reaffd. 281 NLRB 882 (1986) (Meyers II), enfd. sub nom. Prill v. NLRB, 835 F.2d 1481 (D.C. Cir. 1987), cert. denied 128 LRRM 2664 (June 20, 1988), that "in general, to find an employee's activity to be 'concerted,' we shall require it to be engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself." The Board thereby overruled Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1975), and similar cases which held that the individual assertion of a matter "of common concern" to other employees was concerted activity.[1] The Board cautioned, however, that > the definition of concerted activity we set forth . . . is by no means exhaustive. We acknowledge the myriad of factual situations that have arisen, and will continue to arise, in this area of the law.

> We also emphasize that, under the standard we now adopt, the question of whether an employee engaged in concerted activity is, at its heart, a factual one . . . . [268 NLRB at 496–497]

Specifically in Meyers I, 268 NLRB at 494, and again in Meyers II, 281 NLRB 882, we reaffirmed Root-Carlin, Inc., 92 NLRB 1313, 1314 (1951), and other cases holding that "the guarantees of Section 7 of the Act extend to concerted activity which in its inception involves only a speaker and a listener, for such activity is an indispensable preliminary step to employee self-organization." Thus, the "activity of a single employee in enlisting the support of his fellow employees for their mutual aid and protection is as much 'concerted activity' as is ordinary group activity." Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp. v. NLRB, 407 F.2d 1357, 1365 (4th Cir. 1969). Such individual action is concerted as long as it is "engaged in with the object of initiating or inducing . . . group action . . . ." Mushroom Transportation Co. v. NLRB, 330 F.2d 683, 685 (3d Cir. 1964).[2]

Furthermore, the object of inducing group action need not be express. For instance, "[i]t is obvious that higher wages are a frequent objective of organizational activity, and discussions about wages are necessary to further that goal." Jeannette Corp. v. NLRB, 532 F.2d 916, 918 (3d Cir. 1976).

[1] We therefore do not rely on the judge's discussion of such cases.

289 NLRB No. 116

"[D]issatisfaction due to low wages is the grist on which concerted activity feeds." Id. at 919.

Particularly in a group-meeting context, a concerted objective may be inferred from the circumstances. Indeed this case is strikingly similar to Enterprise Products, 264 NLRB 946 (1982), in which the Board found an employee's statements in analogous circumstances concerted. There, an employer called a meeting to ask employees to increase their productivity and to offer in exchange tickets to athletic or public amusement events. At this meeting the employer also told employees that it could not increase their wages or give them their customary annual bonuses. The employer asked the employees' opinion of its incentive proposal, and one employee responded, "No more money, no more production." For this he was discharged.

The Board found the remark to be concerted activity, noting that it concerned a common condition of employment and that the meeting was the employees' first opportunity to protest the employer's proposal. Id. at 947–948. Moreover, the employer there, by calling the meetings and soliciting the employees' responses, had "lumped [them] together and viewed [them] as a group." Id. at 949, quoting Frank Briscoe, Inc. v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 946, 949 (3d Cir. 1981).

The Board adopted the administrative law judge's decision in Enterprise Products, 264 NLRB at 949, in which it was conceded that:

> Cibrian's [the charging party] remarks had not constituted an overt appeal to his coworkers in the sense of having taken over the meeting, Brutus-like, to make an address to them seeking sympathy and support. . . . Cibrian had been the first employee whose opinion had been sought . . . . Accordingly, an employee in Cibrian's position likely would be aware that his reasons would be heard and considered by those who would answer after him. Thus, that he had directed his answer to [the respondent's president] would not have made him oblivious of its effect on other employees present . . . .[3]

Here, the Respondent's president called together the employees to announce that their anticipated wage increases would not be forthcoming. As these meetings provided the employees with their first knowledge of the Respondent's decision to suspend the wage increases, they were also the employees' first opportunity to comment on or protest that action. Johnston, not having had a chance to meet with any employee beforehand, made his statements as a spontaneous reaction to the Respondent's announcement. He phrased his remarks not as a personal complaint, but in terms of "us" and "we." Obviously, they were addressed to everyone assembled to discuss the topic of the proposed wage increase suspension, including his fellow employees.[4] His statements implicitly elicited support from his fellow employees against the announced change.

We find that, in the presence of other employees, Johnston protested, at the earliest opportunity, a change in an employment term affecting all employees just announced by the Respondent at that meeting. This is clearly the initiation of group action as contemplated by the Mushroom Transportation line of cases which was specifically endorsed by Meyers II, supra.

The judge erroneously concluded that Johnston did not engage in concerted activity because he did not try to enlist group support after the meeting and because actual group activity did not occur. In the context here, these facts are irrelevant. An employee does not have to engage in further concerted activity to ensure that his initial call for group action retains its concertedness. In addition, employees do not have to accept the individual's invitation to group action before the invitation itself is considered concerted.[5] El Gran Combo, 284 NLRB 1115 (1987); Mushroom Transportation Co., supra at 685.

In light of all the circumstances, we find that Johnston's remarks at the November 22 meeting were concerted activity protected by Section 7 of the Act. Accordingly, his discharge violated Section 8(a)(1).

AMENDED CONCLUSION OF LAW

By discharging Milton E. Johnston on November 22, 1982, in retaliation for his protected concerted activity, the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it o cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. We shall order it to offer Milton E. Johnston immediate and full reinstatement to his former job, with backpay to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[6] We shall also order the Respondent to remove any reference to the discharge from its files. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

[4] As one employee testified, Johnston "probably said something the rest of us didn't have the nerve to say . . . ."

[5] Nevertheless, Johnston's statements did elicit such support, albeit, after the meeting. This postmeeting support shows that other employees interpreted Johnston's remarks the same way we have.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Whittaker Corporation, Kettenburg Marine Division, San Diego, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging any employee for making statements to enlist support from employees to protest terms or conditions of employment.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Milton E. Johnston immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the discharge will not be used against him in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its San Diego facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

WHITTAKER CORPORATION, KETTENBURG MARINE DIVISION

Robert R. Petering, for the General Counsel.
Roy E. Potts and Robert C. Hayden, Esqs. (Overton, Lyman & Prince), of Los Angeles, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

ROGER B. HOLMES, Administrative Law Judge. The unfair labor practice charge in this case was filed on December 6, 1982, by Milton E. Johnston.

The General Counsel's complaint was issued on January 7, 1983, against Whittaker Corporation, Kettenburg Marine Division. The General Counsel alleges in his complaint that the Respondent has engaged in conduct that violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In summary, the General Counsel alleges that the Respondent terminated employee Milton E. Johnston from employment on November 23, 1982, and since that time, has failed to reinstate him because Johnston had engaged in conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act. In the answer to the complaint allegations, the Respondent denied the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

The trial in this proceeding was held on April 6, 1983, at San Diego, California. The time for the filing of posttrial briefs was set for May 11, 1983. The counsel for the General Counsel and the attorneys for the Respondent filed briefs, which were argued persuasively from their respective points of view.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The jurisdiction of the Board over the business operations of the Employer is not an issue in this proceeding. The Employer is engaged in the operation of a boat and yacht repair facility at San Diego, California. The Employer's business operations meet the Board's direct inflow jurisdictional standard.

II. THE WITNESSES AND CREDIBILITY RESOLUTIONS

Five persons were called to testify as witnesses during the trial of this proceeding. In alphabetical order by their last names, they are Milton E. Johnston, who is the Charging Party and the alleged discriminatee in this case; Gary A. Klers, who has been employed by the Respondent for the past 17 years and who was a supervisor for the Employer at the time of the trial; Linda Bodenhamer Klers, who has been the personnel administrator for the Respondent for the past 4-1/2 years; Larry E. Miller, who is the president of the Respondent; and Albert G. Schmidt, who is an electrician and who has worked for the Respondent for the past 2-1/2 years.

The findings of fact to be set forth in the sections to follow will be based on portions of the testimony from each of the five witnesses who testified at the trial, and findings will be based on documentary evidence and a tape recording introduced during the trial proceedings. It should be noted at the outset of this decision that a substantial number of the facts are not in dispute. However, the recollections of some of the witnesses differed concerning some of these past events. Understandably, in view of the passage of time between the occurrence of the events and the time of the trial, some witnesses were able to recall some things better than others. In addition, I have considered the fact that the witnesses viewed the events as they occurred from their own perspective, and this may explain some of the differences among the witnesses when they related their accounts at the trial.

In relying on certain portions of the testimony from each witness, I have also considered the demeanor of the witness on the stand during the trial; the consistency of the witness' account when it is considered in the context of the testimony from other witnesses and certain facts, which are not in dispute; the ability of the witness to recall the events in question because at times some witnesses were not as certain in recalling a particular event; and the employment position of the witness in the sense that a witness was identified more closely with one of the parties and therefore may have had a potential interest in the outcome of the litigation. With the foregoing in mind, I have based the findings of fact on the portions of the testimony that seem to me to be credible, accurate, and reliable. (See, for example, Krispy Kreme Doughnut Corp., 245 NLRB 1053 (1979), regarding the acceptance of some, but not all, of the testimony of a witness.) Although all the testimony and the documentary evidence introduced at the trial have been considered, the findings of fact to be set forth will be limited to the credited evidence in the proceeding. (See, for example, ABC Specialty Foods, 234 NLRB 475 (1978).)

III. THE EVENTS IN NOVEMBER 1981

Milton E. Johnston worked as a machinist for the Employer from January 1972 until his termination from employment on November 23, 1982.

Introduced into evidence as the General Counsel's Exhibit 5 was a copy of a petition, which Johnston had prepared, and which Johnston began circulating among employees of the Employer on November 16, 1981. The handwritten document consists of four pages, and it is dated November 16, 1981. The document expresses the employees' appreciation for the Company's granting of a retroactive pay raise, and it also asks for the Company's consideration of additional fringe benefits for the employees. The fringe benefits mentioned in the document pertain to adding six paid holidays over a 3-year period to the time between Christmas Eve and New Year's Day, and also to implementing a plan of $75 a week payments in the event of an accident, hospitalization, or after the eighth day of an illness. Johnston's name appears on page 3 at the top of a list of 11 names.

On the second day that Johnston circulated the petition, Bob Ballinger told Johnston that he wanted Johnston to accompany him to Miller's office. Miller had heard from a supervisor that Johnston was unhappy, that Johnston had been doing a lot of complaining, and that

Johnston was passing something around. (See Tr. 70–71.) Johnston, Ballinger, and Miller were the persons who were present in Miller's office during the conversation. Johnston testified (Tr. 26–27):

> Mr. Miller addressed me on the subject of equity among—of the other divisions of the corporation and other yards in the area regarding increases in the benefits and salaries. And he wanted me to understand that Kettenburg was a seperate [sic] entity and that we could not necessarily enjoy the same benefits that other divisions of the corporation had and keep pace with other yards in the area. And they felt that if he talked to me personally and explained to me, that it would [be] a better situation.

At the trial, Johnston acknowledged that he had never delivered the petition to the Company. Miller testified that he had not seen the General Counsel's Exhibit 5 prior to the time that the document was handed to him on the witness stand at the trial. According to Miller, the conversation he had with Johnston in November 1981 and the rumor he had heard that Johnston may have been circulating a petition in November 1981, had no effect on Miller's decision a year later in November 1982 to terminate Johnston from employment with the Company. (See Tr. 71.)

IV. THE EVENTS BEGINNING IN JANUARY 1982

Beginning in January 1982, Johnston was granted a leave of absence from work at the Company.

According to Linda Klers, the Company basically grants a 30-day leave of absence, but with another 30 days for medical leave. She stated (Tr. 52):

> And in Mr. Johnston's case, he had given us information that he would be back within a specified period of time, and that had been changed three or four different times whenever we could reach him to find out when, indeed, he could come back. And it basically extended from the latter part of January to the first part of May, so we just don't normally have leave of absences of that extent, nor do we continue to employ that individual. He would have been in a layoff status, and we would have employed someone else in his place.

According to Miller, the Company's policy normally is to terminate an employee if the employee overstays his leave of absence. Miller explained that the Company would not know whether such an employee would ever return to work, and, therefore, the Company replaces the employee. Miller stated that it was reported to him that Johnston had overstayed his leave of absence. When Miller was questioned at the trial regarding why the Company did not terminate Johnston when he had overstayed his leave of absence, Miller replied, "Frankly, I don't know."

V. THE EVENTS ON MONDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1982

On Monday, November 22, 1982, Company President Miller held separate meetings with about four or five groups of employees from various departments at the facility. Regarding his purpose for holding those meetings with employees, Miller said at the trial, "Purpose of the meeting was to advise the employees that I decided that our division in total would not be receiving an increase in their hourly rates." Miller did not speak to the different groups from a prepared text, but he attempted to convey the same words to each group. He conducted each meeting in the same manner and with the same format. Each meeting lasted for approximately 15 or 20 minutes.

After Miller had spoken to the employees and invited questions from them in one of the meetings, an employee named Buroyo told Miller that the most important thing was for the employees to get a full 40-hour workweek. Miller said that Buroyo also stated at the meeting that Buroyo understood how difficult it was because all the other people in the area were charging less than the Company was charging, and that, if he could get 40 hours a week, he would be happy.

Miller also recalled a comment from another employee in one of the meetings. That employee was fearful that the Company was going into a deeper trough from an economic standpoint. The employee wondered why the Company did not reduce its rates to a level comparable to the rates charged by other companies in the area.

Miller further recalled that still another employee asked him to repeat "when it was that I was going to review this situation for wages again, and I answered him, six to nine months."

All the foregoing took place before the last meeting of employees on November 22, 1982, which was the meeting at which Johnston was present. That last group met with Miller about 2:45 following the afternoon break period. The employees were from the machine shop department and the engine repair department. About 9 or 10 employees were in that group.

Miller recalled how the meeting began on that occasion. He stated (Tr. 82):

> Well, when everybody came into the room, my office's not too large, but when everybody came into the room I said I had chairs around and I said, "Okay, gentlemen, grab a chair." Well, Milt went up to the chair that was next to my office and he grabbed it and he shook the chair, and I think I might have said, "What's this?"

Miller then spoke to the employees who were present in that last meeting. He testified (Tr. 74, 76, and 77):

> Okay. The purpose of this meeting is to advise you that after careful consideration and thought, that it will not be possible for the employees of Kettenburg Marine Divion [sic] to receive an increase in your pay at this time.
> . . . .
> And the reason for this is that the rate of increase that I would typically put through at this time of year, if—if done, would cause our charging rate to go from thirty-three fifty an hour currently to approximately thirty-six dollars. We're in the midst of > the highest unemployement [sic] of people in the boat repair and ship repair in San Diego that we've been in in many years, and we're in the midst of the worst economic downturn that this country has dealt with since World War II. And the reason for not putting through these increases at this time is that I am sure that if we charge thirty-six an hour instead of the thirty-three fifty, which is already high compared to the competition, that we would be effectively driving jobs away from this business, working a hardship on the employees as well as the company in lost revenues and lost wages for employees.

> The other part of the—the other part of my talk was that—that because of the fact it's difficult at this point to know what the near term future holds, I'm going to review this situation in the next six to nine months and have another look at it, and I sincerely hope that at that point in time, that I'll have more confidence in the market and the general economy, and that some type of an increase will be possible at that time. And I also want you to know that this not only affects you as the hourly workers of this company, but it affects myself. I will not take an increase, nor will anybody that works for me till this period of time is over . . . [until] I feel that it's wise for the business to resume with increases and charging rates, as well as increases for hourly rates, for the employees.
> I think that is about all I said.

Johnston said that he made his comments to Miller at the meeting after Miller had stopped and appeared to be waiting. Johnston said, "I raised my hand and was acknowledged and spoke." Johnston stated at transcript 108 regarding his comments to Miller at the meeting:

> Well, I don't remember us being called together when there's been a good year and saying here's something extra. But now that there's a little downturn, I feel we're being asked to bear the brunt of it by not having an increase.

Johnston further testified (Tr. 109) regarding his comments at the meeting:

> . . . and I believe I said that I don't have the benefit of the books, so I cannot—I don't believe that I can come to the same conclusion that you can. At that time, Mr. Miller directed a statement to me that a company does not have to open its books and is not about to open its books to its employees. I replied in that I had not asked to see the books, but as a sorce [sic] of information that I didn't have.
> Q. In other words, it's your testimony that as to that exchange and your comments about the books, you were speaking in the first person, you were saying "I," you weren't saying "employees"?
> A. That is true.

According to employee Schmidt who was present at that meeting, Miller then asked if there were other questions. Dick Harris brought up the subject of the back gate at the facility being locked, which prevented the employees from having access to the parking lot. Miller asked Ballinger if the gate could be opened in the morning and in the evening so that the employees could use it to get in and out. Ballinger said it could be done.

After the meeting had concluded, some of the employees talked about the meeting. Schmidt said, "Well, I think we felt that Milt had probably said something the rest of us didn't have the nerve to say, and that he had been misunderstood by Mr. Miller." (See Tr. 104.) At the trial, Schmidt expressed his feelings that Johnston's comments were not appropriate. Schmidt said that Johnston was not present during that conversation after the meeting. There is no evidence that Miller or any other company management or supervisory person was made aware of the conversation described by Schmidt.

Miller was the one who made the decision to terminate Johnston from employment. At the trial, Miller stated his own reaction to the comments that Johnston had made at the meeting. "My reaction was that it was a rather insubordinate action . . . and that it was an affront on my word and . . . another way of indicating, perhaps, that I wasn't being truthful." (See also Tr. 65-66 where Miller gave his views and see Tr. 58-63 and 66-68 regarding the receipt into evidence, over timely objection, of the testimony regarding Miller's opinion of Johnston's comments at the meeting.)

During the same afternoon of the meeting, Miller called Linda Klers into his office. Miller told her what had happened in the meeting and his reaction to the comments. He also said he was considering the termination of the employee who made the comments, and he asked for her views regarding whether there were any problems involved in terminating the employee. According to Miller, Linda Klers advised him that she did not perceive any problems. He said, "Then I told her to prepare the documents for termination."

VI. THE EVENTS ON TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1982

In accordance with her standard procedure at the Company, Linda Klers prepared the papers relating to the termination of Johnston from employment. Introduced into evidence as the General Counsel's Exhibit 2 was a copy of the Employer's "Separation Report" regarding Johnston. Klers typed the document, and she took it to Miller for his approval. At that time, Klers also asked Miller some questions. During her testimony at the trial, the following occurred, which is reflected at transcript 50:

> Q. Did you at that time ask him anything further about what had happened at the meeting?
> A. Yes, I did. I wanted to know for my own self if there was any—when Mr. Johnston had made the comment, if there had been anyone else making any kind of pains, or did anybody gasp, or did anybody just not believe that he had made that comment, or was there any kind of reaction from anyone else in the room, and he said, absolutely, that the comment was made, and that that was the extent of it.
> Q. What was the reason for that inquiry?

> A. Well, just because it's part of my job, and the fact that I possibly—because of the concerted activity, and I try to look at all aspects of any kind of a termination.

Miller approved the "Separation Report" at that time, and he also signed Johnston's final paycheck. In part, the General Counsel's Exhibit 2 shows the following concerning the Employer's reason for the termination:

> Mr. L. E. Miller, Company President, called a group meeting to inform employees that there would be no salary increase at this time. Mr. Johnston challenged that decision, stating he did not know whether he could accept the decision or not without examining the books and records of the Company. Such comments are not in the best interest of our Company.

About 5 minutes before 4 p.m. on Tuesday, November 23, 1982, Johnston was told by his supervisor, Byron Burkhardt, to report to the office of Linda Klers. In her office, she informed Johnston that he was being separated from the Company, and that the information was contained in the "Separation Report." She then gave him a copy of the document. According to Klers, Johnston made the comment to her, "that's not what he had meant." Klers told Johnston that his supervisor was waiting for him in the shop area in order to make arrangements for Johnston to pick up his tools. Johnston then left Klers' office and talked with Burkhardt. Johnston made arrangements to return to the facility the next day in order to pick up his tools and clean out his locker.

VII. THE EVENTS ON WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1982

On Wednesday, November 24, 1982, Johnston returned to the Employer's facility. He got his tools and cleaned out his locker. After he had done those things, Johnston asked Burkhardt if he could use the telephone in the office in order to call upstairs to see if he could have a talk with Miller. Burkhardt informed Johnston that Miller already had left for the Thanksgiving holiday.

VIII. THE EVENTS ON MONDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1982

On Monday, November 29, 1982, Johnston went to the Employer's office around 11 a.m. and asked a secretary if he could see Miller. She replied that Johnston could see Miller, but he was busy on the telephone at that moment. Johnston waited, and then he had a conversation with Miller in his office.

Introduced into evidence as the General Counsel's Exhibit 4 was a microcassette containing a tape recording made by Johnston of his conversation with Miller on November 29, 1982, in Miller's office. There are what appear to be other conversations and other matters on the tape recording. To avoid any misunderstanding, the only portion of the tape recording that was actually received in evidence pertains to the conversation between Johnston and Miller, which is the first conversation on side A of the cassette. The other conversations and other matters are not part of the record in this case, and they have been disregarded. (In an earlier case before me, issues regarding the admissibility of two secretly made tape recordings were discussed. See Plumbers Local 598 (Rust/W.S.H.), 255 NLRB 450 (1981).)

Introduced into evidence as the General Counsel's Exhibit 3 was a typed transcript made by Johnston of his tape recording, which was introduced as the General Counsel's Exhibit 4. The transcript appears to be substantially accurate in reflecting what is discernible from the tape recording. There are a few words that are not so loud or so clear as to be free from doubt when the recording is played on ordinary office equipment.

In summary, Johnston asked Miller on November 29, 1982, for a letter of recommendation from the Company. Miller agreed to prepare such a letter and to have it ready for Johnston by the next afternoon.

Johnston then asked to discuss the subject of his dismissal. Miller agreed to do so. Johnston expressed his view that his dismissal "was rather highhanded and dictatorial as far as what, to me, was a comment to a statement you made upon request for comment." Miller expressed his view that Johnston's comment about examining the Company's records was "just another way of saying to me, well, I don't believe you." Miller was of the opinion that if he had to "put on a seminar about everything that's done," that would be all he would be doing. Miller also expressed his view that "if somebody feels they need, after I say something, to check the records to see about that, well, that's a real problem."

Johnston expressed his view that he had not made a request at the meeting to examine the Company's books. Johnston said that although his first statement at the meeting could have been misunderstood, he also said at the meeting that he did not ask to see the Company's books after Miller stated something to the effect that no company was going to open its books. Johnston further said, "I was making a statement and commenting that I could not come to the same conclusions as you do because I do not have the same sources of information."

Miller stated his view that he could not have a situation where a person was doubting that Miller was telling the truth. Miller related that he had agonized over the matter for 3 months, and he realized that he had to do what he did for the welfare of the Company and the employees. Miller pointed out the decision applied to everyone in the Company. Miller expressed the view that work in the repair yard was "very price sensitive," and that the Company's billing rate was not going to increase because of the "tough economy" into 1984. Miller said Johnston was "welcome to your opinions," but Miller wanted people "that trust what I'm saying the way it is, and that's that." Miller added, "And that's the only thing I've been telling people since I've been here is the truth."

Miller told Johnston that he would comment in the letter of recommendation about the quality of Johnston's work and his tenure with the Company, and that he would not put in any comment about the incident or anything "negative at all."

IX. CONCLUSIONS

In its decision in Hawthorne Mazda, 251 NLRB 313, 315 (1980), the Board held:

> Section 7 of the Act guarantees employees the right to engage in "concerted activities for the purpose of mutual aid or protection." It is axiomatic that employees who band together for the purpose of presenting grievances to their employer are engaged in protected, concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7.[24] It follows that an individual employee's attempt to induce fellow workers to join in a petition regarding a common grievance is protected activity.[25] Similarly, an employee engages in protected activity when he presents to the employer grievances on behalf of other employees.[26]

In its decision in Mills Patrol Service, 264 NLRB 323, 324 (1982), the Board observed, "In order for activity to be protected by Section 8(a)(1), it must be concerted in nature." In a case that involved union activities, the Board stated, "Employees promoting a union are by that action engaged in protected concerted activities, and individual acts in furtherance of that objective do not lose their protection merely because others are not consulted." Ohio Valley Graphic Arts, 234 NLRB 493 (1978).

Among the cases which are relied on by the General Counsel is the Board's decision in Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1975). With regard to its Alleluia Cushion decision, the Board stated in Pink Moody, 237 NLRB 39 (1978):

> In Alleluia Cushion, supra, we held that where an employee speaks up and seeks to enforce statutory provisions relating to occupational safety designed for the benefit of all employees, in the absence of any evidence that fellow employees disavow such representation, we will find implied consent thereto and deem such activity to be concerted. In Air Surrey [229 NLRB 1064 (1977)], we found as concerted activity an employee's individual inquiry at his employer's bank as to whether the employer had sufficient funds on deposit to meet the upcoming payroll, because the matter inquired into by the employee was of vital concern to all employees. And in Dawson Cabinet Company, Inc., 228 NLRB 290 (1977), we extended the Alleluia Cushion principle in order to find as concerted activity a female employee's individual refusal to perform a certain job unless she was paid the same wages as a male employee doing the same job, because the employee was attempting to vindicate the equal pay rights of the female employees.

There are, of course, many Board decisions where the Alleluia Cushion legal principle has been applied. In an earlier case before me, the legal principle was applied to an employee's making a complaint about carbon monoxide fumes in the work area to the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences of the State of Montana. Bighorn Beverage, 236 NLRB 736 (1978). The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit did not agree with that portion of the holding. 614 F.2d 1238 (1980). In another case before me, the Alleluia Cushion legal principle was applied to an employee's filing of a complaint with the California Fair Employment Practices Commission. However, the Board found actual concerted activity, as distinguished from an Alleluia Cushion theory, regarding the events at the meeting held on May 22, 1979, "when Johnson [the Charging Party in that case] asserted that she should be paid as much as the male business agents, other union members joined with her and protested that it was unlawful for Respondent to pay her less than the men." Hotel & Restaurant Employees Local 28, 252 NLRB 1124 (1980).

In Diagnostic Center Hospital Corp., 228 NLRB 1215 (1977), the Alleluia Cushion legal principle was applied where an employee had written a letter to the company's chairman of the board regarding a 10-percent wage increase and in protest of "alleged practices of 'racism, sexism and favoritism.'" See also the Board's decision in Self Cycle & Marine Distributor Co., 237 NLRB 75 (1978), regarding an employee's filing of an unemployment compensation claim with a state agency. See further the Board's decision in Michigan Metal Processing Corp., 262 NLRB 275 (1982), regarding two employees jointly filing a complaint with the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

As indicated above, there are many Board decisions where the Alleluia Cushion legal principle has been applied. The foregoing cases are by no means intended to be an exhaustive list. Instead, they illustrate the type of activity where the Alleluia Cushion legal principle has been applied.

To paraphrase and to summarize Johnston's statements to Miller at the meeting on November 22, 1982, his statements were to the effect that: (1) employees of the Company had not been called together and given "something extra" when the Company had experienced a good year, but the employees were being asked to bear the brunt of an economic downturn by not receiving an increase; (2) that Johnston did not have the benefit of seeing the Company's books, so he could not come to the same conclusion that Miller had reached; and (3) that Johnston had not asked to see the Company's books, but that he did not have the Company's books as a source of information. (See sec. 5 for the complete findings of fact.)

Insofar as the record shows, Johnston acted alone in making his statements to Miller at the meeting. For example, he did not seek support from other employees either before or after the meeting. That observation is not made in the sense of being critical, but simply to reflect the circumstances in which the comments were made. It is significant that no other employee joined in Johnston's statements during the meeting, or in any way indicated group action or approval of his statements at the meeting. Afterward, there was some conversation about Johnston's comments. That was described by Schmidt. However, Johnston was not a participant in that conversation, and there is no evidence of company knowledge of that conversation among the employees at the time that the Company terminated Johnston. Although some other employees made comments to Miller during the various meetings Miller held that day, the subject matter of their comments did not pertain to the subject matter of Johnston's comments. For example, note the finding in Rinke Pontiac Co., 216 NLRB 239, 242 (1975), "As indicated above, Terpevich's [the Charging Party in that case] activity at the October 25 meeting was essentially a continuation of the group discussions in which he and other salesmen participated among themselves following the Respondent's institution of the new insurance program with its incentive pay features." In addition, note also the following: "Moreover, it appears that Terpevich was not alone in raising questions about the pay plan at this meeting. Salesman Fuhrman also challenged its legality."

There was no collective-bargaining agreement applicable to the employees of the employer at the times material, and thus Johnston was not seeking to enforce the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement in making his comments to Miller at the meeting. In addition, the circumstances here are different from those where an employee was attempting to assert a right to ask a question of the Employer at a meeting prior to a representation election, and the Board found that the employee was "presenting such a grievance in protesting that he had been improperly forbidden the opportunity to ask a question which he thought would aid himself and his fellow employees in making a decision as to a collective-bargaining representative." Prescott Industrial Products Co., 205 NLRB 51 (1973).

The events, which occurred in November 1981 and which are described in section 3 of this decision, are remote in point of time insofar as the termination of Johnston on November 23, 1982, is concerned. A link or connection between the events in November 1981 and the events in November 1982 has not been established. The Respondent points out that no adverse action was taken by the Company against Johnston in November 1981. Furthermore, the Respondent points out that Johnston took an extended leave of absence from work beginning in January 1982, but the Company took no action to terminate Johnston despite the Company's usual policy to do so in such circumstances. Thus, the foregoing is some indication that Miller did not harbor animosity toward Johnston because of Johnston's activities in November 1981. In contrast, see the Board's decision in Hansen Chevrolet, 237 NLRB 584 (1978), where the time period involved was only 4 days. At 589, it is stated: "In any event, Prescott [the supervisor who made the decision to terminate the employee] knew that only 4 days before, Suggs [the Charging Party in that case] had been actively soliciting other employees to join in a concerted effort to obtain a change in the pay and fringe plans, and that Suggs still wished to write Mann [the company president] a letter."

After considering the foregoing, I conclude that the statements made by Johnston at the meeting held on November 22, 1982, do not constitute protected concerted activities within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act. I further conclude that the Employer's termination of Johnston on November 23, 1982, because of the statements made by him on the previous day, did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Accordingly, I must recommend to the Board that the General Counsel's complaint be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an Employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent has not engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged in the General Counsel's complaint in this proceeding for the reasons which have been set forth above.

July 19, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

Upon charges filed by Atlanta Metro Area Local (Metro), affiliated with the American Postal Workers Union, AFL-CIO (APWU) and Amalgamated Local 310 (Local 310), affiliated with the National Post Office Mail Handlers, Watchmen, Messengers and Group Leaders of the Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL-CIO (Mail Handlers), the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued an order consolidating cases and a consolidated complaint against the United States Postal Service, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Respondent filed an answer and an amended answer, and on September 24, 1987, the Respondent filed a motion to transfer the proceeding to the Board and a Motion for Summary Judgment. On September 29, 1987, the Board issued an Order Transferring Proceeding to the Board and Notice to Show Cause. On October 13, 1987, the General Counsel filed her response to the Board's Notice to Show Cause in which she agreed with the Respondent that this proceeding should be transferred to the Board and moved for summary judgment in her favor. Thereafter, the Respondent's request for "Special Leave to File a Reply to the Response of Counsel for the General Counsel to the Board's Notice to Show Cause" was denied.[1] Subsequently, however, the Respondent was granted leave to file a supplemental memorandum of law.

The determinative facts in this case are not in dispute. Based on the results of an investigation into gambling activity at the Atlanta, Georgia Post Office in the summer of 1986, the Respondent disciplined and discharged a number of employees in the bargaining units represented by the Mail Handlers and the APWU. The Unions[2] filed grievances on behalf of the employees and in the course of preparing the grievances discovered that some supervisors also had been involved in the gambling activity. Subsequently, the Unions requested the Respondent to provide them with information regarding the disciplining of supervisors arising out of the investigation into the gambling activity.[3] APWU, through Metro, requested this information to establish that the disciplinary action taken against the bargaining unit employees was "harsh, punitive, disparate and not for just cause," while the Mail Handlers, through Local 310, asserted that the information was necessary to show disparate treatment of unit employees by the Respondent. The Respondent refused to supply the Unions with the requested information.[4]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on the Motions for Summary Judgment

The requested information clearly deals with individuals outside the bargaining unit[5] and, therefore, the General Counsel has the burden of demonstrating the information's relevance.[6] The standard for determining the relevancy of requested information is a liberal discovery-type standard that merely requires that the information have some bearing on the issue between the parties.[7]

Here, the General Counsel asserts that the information regarding the discipline given supervisors for breaching the Respondent's regulations prohibiting gambling activity has some bearing on the grievances alleging harsh, unjust, and disparate treatment of unit employees for violating the same rule. The Respondent attempts to rebut this argu-

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] We accept the Respondent's assertion in its amended answer that Local 310 and Metro are not bargaining agents of the Mail Handlers and APWU for the purpose of processing grievances but that they are, instead, the contractually authorized agents of the APWU and Mail Handlers. Acceptance of this assertion, however, has no impact on our determination, as the Respondent admits the agency status among the APWU and the Mail Handlers and their affiliated locals. In this regard, the "Unions," as used in this decision, refer collectively to the APWU and Mail Handlers and/or their affiliated locals, Metro and Local 310.

[3] The filings of the parties do not indicate precisely the requests made by the Unions. The Respondent states that the Unions requested copies of investigative memoranda dealing with supervisors compiled by the Postal Inspection Service as part of the investigation into the gambling activity. The General Counsel states that the APWU, through Metro, requested "certain information with regard to the disciplining of supervisors arising out of the gambling activity." The Respondent also states that the Mail Handlers, through Local 310, requested "all documents concerning the discipline and alleged misconduct of supervisory employees involved in the illegal lottery."

[4] The Respondent did provide the Unions with information they requested relating solely to bargaining unit employees.

[5] The Respondent notes that the Postal Reorganization Act prohibits the Board from including supervisors in a bargaining unit. See 39 U.S.C. § 1202(1).

289 NLRB No. 123

ment by stating that the supervisors and unit employees have different responsibilities, are judged by different criteria and, therefore, are not similarly situated for purposes of discipline. The Respondent argues that the discipline received by the supervisors for violating the antigambling rule is not relevant to the grievances. We disagree.

It is undisputed that the Respondent's restrictions on gambling activity apply equally to supervisors and unit employees. Although, as the Respondent asserts, there may be legitimate reasons for imposing different degrees of discipline on supervisors and unit employees for similar misconduct, the only reason offered to justify such a disparity for the gambling violation here is the different level of responsibility exercised by each group. We do not agree, however, given the nature of the rule involved and its applicability to both groups that the different degrees of responsibility accorded each group automatically translates into different standards of discipline in this instance, thereby compelling a finding that the requested information has no bearing on the grievances.[8] Nor do we agree with the Respondent's assertion in its supplemental memorandum of law that Marshall v. Western Grain Co., 838 F.2d 1165 (11th Cir. 1988), supports its Motion for Summary Judgment.

In Marshall the court concluded that the plaintiffs had not established a racial discrimination claim under Section 703(a) of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq., by showing that the employer had given severance pay to nonminority, nonunit employees while refusing to give severance pay to the minority, unit employees, where the collective-bargaining agreement restricted severance pay for the unit members. In reaching this conclusion the court stated that unit and nonunit employees are "never" similarly situated. The Respondent seizes on this statement as support for its contention that the unit employees and supervisors in this case are not similarly situated for purposes of discipline and, therefore, that the requested information is not relevant. The context of the court decision, however, shows that, essentially, the court found that unit and nonunit employees can never be similarly situated for purposes of establishing a Title VII claim when one set of rules applies to the unit employees (through the collective-bargaining agreement) and another set of rules applies to the nonunit employees. That is not the situation in the instant dispute. Here, the same rule (a prohibition on gambling) is applicable to both the unit employees and the supervisors. Indeed, the reason offered by the Respondent in its Motion for Summary Judgment as support for its argument that the two groups are dissimilar was not that different rules controlling gambling applied to the two groups but that the groups had different degrees of responsibilities. Thus, because the gambling prohibition here applies to both groups, the requested information potentially has "some bearing" on whether the unit employees were harshly, unjustly, or disparately treated. In rejecting the Respondent's arguments, we also note that "[a]rbitrators regularly consider such evidence as relevant to determining whether a unit employee has been disciplined for just cause."[9] In this regard, an arbitrator who addressed the very information request involved here found the information relevant to the issue of the appropriateness of the discipline imposed on the unit members and to the defense of condonation. (See G.C. Exh. 3.)

Further, to the extent the Respondent seeks to justify at the arbitration any disparity that is exposed, the arbitrator can determine the weight to be given the evidence in light of the justification offered. Although the requested information, even if it contains evidence of disparate treatment, may not provide conclusive proof of the allegations in the grievances, this does not mean that the information fails to meet the relevancy standard by which such requests are judged.[10] Under the circumstances of this case, where both supervisors and unit employees violated the Respondent's gambling prohibition—a prohibition that applies equally to both groups—evidence relating to the discipline given supervisors is information that has some bearing on the determination of whether the unit employees have been treated harshly, unjustly, or disparately.[11]

Further, we agree with the arbitrator who found that information of this type is relevant to the defense of condonation. For example, if the requested information reveals that supervisors engaged in gambling activities with the bargaining unit employees, the Unions can claim that the Respondent condoned the activity. This defense may or may not prevail. We are not concerned with the merits of a nonfrivolous defense, however, but only with the information's relevance to it.[12]

[8] See Department of Defense Dependent Schools, 28 FLRA No. 33 (July 28, 1987). On remand from the court of appeals the Federal Labor Relations Authority reversed its original decision and found information on adverse actions taken against supervisors for making false statements necessary to the union's representational responsibilities. The union sought the information as evidence of disparate treatment given to unit employees for engaging in the same misconduct as the supervisors, i.e., making false statements.

[9] North Germany Area Council v. Federal Labor Relations Authority, 805 F.2d 1044, 1048 (D.C. Cir. 1986).

[10] See Pfizer, Inc., supra, 268 NLRB at 918 (information need not be dispositive of the issue between the parties but need only have some bearing on it).

[11] The Respondent also argues that allowing disclosure of the requested information, in effect, requires it to apply the bargaining unit's disciplinary standards to supervisors. The Respondent claims such an imposition of unbargained-for disciplinary standards for supervisors interferes with its broad discretion in this area. We disagree. As stated, any disparity in the discipline given supervisors and unit employees and its significance can be explained by the Respondent and that explanation can be considered by the decision maker in determining the weight to be given evidence of disparity.

Accordingly, we find that the General Counsel has carried her burden of establishing the relevance of the requested information and that the Respondent has not refuted its relevance.

Even assuming the information's relevance, however, the Respondent asserts that the information need not be disclosed because it is confidential.[13] In attempting to carry its burden of proof on this issue, as the party asserting confidentiality, the Respondent contends that disclosure should not be required because of the sensitive nature of the information. The Respondent notes that the information may show that the supervisors violated postal regulations and possibly state and Federal law. The Respondent further asserts that allowing access to such information risks eroding the undivided loyalty it requires of its supervisors.[14] The Respondent claims that supervisors will be less willing to act if the Unions can embarrass and harass the supervisors by gaining access to the type of information requested here. We do not agree that these asserted reasons for keeping the information confidential outweigh the Unions' interest in gaining access to the information.

That disclosure of the information may reveal that supervisors violated the Respondent's prohibition and possibly state and Federal laws against gambling is not a sufficient reason for finding that the information must remain confidential. Otherwise, virtually all requests for information on activities leading to disciplinary or potential legal action would be found to have such status. Moreover, unlike information reflecting confidential assessments by testing professionals of an individual's "basic competence," no established public policy against disclosure of the information requested here exists.[15] The information in question concerns willful activity of a kind that the Respondent has itself made the public basis for discipline and discharges of employees. Further, there was no showing that the supervisors expected the requested information to remain confidential or that the Respondent made a commitment to the supervisors to keep the information confidential.[16]

We recognize that the Respondent has a strong interest in preserving supervisor loyalty. We disagree with the Respondent, however, that disclosure of the requested information to the Unions for use in grievance proceedings threatens this interest. In the instant case, both supervisors and unit employees engaged in gambling activity and the Respondent itself investigated the activity. Thus, the unit employees who participated in the prohibited activity were as aware of any supervisory involvement as was the Respondent. In these circumstances we fail to perceive the threat that the Union's requests pose to the supervisors' loyalty. Moreover, as the General Counsel points out, supervisors who have engaged in prohibited conduct already have compromised their loyalty and have undermined their authority to enforce their employer's rules.

Thus, we find that the Respondent's interests in keeping the information confidential do not outweigh the Unions' interests in having the information disclosed.

Finally, the Respondent argues that it need not disclose the information because it is restricted from doing so under the Privacy Act of 1974, 5 U.S.C. § 552(a). The Respondent admits, however, that the requested information is stored in two record systems which provide for disclosure pursuant to the routine uses exception in the Privacy Act. Further, the Respondent admits that one of the routine uses which both record systems provide for is the following:

---

[12] Cf. Pfizer, Inc., supra, 268 NLRB at 918 (Board is not concerned with merits of a grievance in passing on information request).

[13] See Pfizer, Inc., supra, 268 NLRB at 919.

[14] The Respondent also asserts that it has an inherent right to keep confidential from the Union all information in a supervisor's personnel file "in virtually any circumstance" because revealing such information to the Union would tend to impair the supervisor's loyalty to the Respondent. It cites Postal Service, 280 NLRB 685 (1986), enfd. 841 F.2d 141 (6th Cir. 1988), as supporting this assertion, claiming that Postal Service, reflects the "mirror image" of the Respondent's request here. We disagree. In Postal Service, the majority concluded that a list of union officials and stewards who had applied for supervisory positions was relevant and ordered its disclosure to the union. In reaching this result the majority reasoned that the possibility that union officials or stewards might be disloyal to the union if they were aspiring to positions in management made it reasonable for the union to exclude them from union representational functions in order to avoid undermining employee confidence in the collective-bargaining representative. The majority thus found that the names of those who were applying for supervisory positions were relevant to the union's interest in avoiding injurious conflicts of interest in its representatives. It is clear, for the reasons stated below, that no such conflict-of-interest potential is implicated here. What the Respondent's argument amounts to is that it should never have to disclose anything about its supervisors to the Union if that disclosure would displease the Respondent's supervisors. The Postal Service case on which the Respondent relies provides no support for that proposition. Member Johansen dissented in Postal Service on other grounds.

[15] Compare NLRB v. Detroit Edison Co., 440 U.S. 301, 318 (1979) (in denying a request for psychological test results the court took judicial notice of established professional and governmental policies against disclosure and the sensitivity of any human being to disclosure of psychological information that may be taken to bear on the person's basic competence), with Salt River Valley v. NLRB, 769 F.2d 639, 642 (9th Cir. 1985) (in requiring disclosure of employee's personnel file the court relied on fact that though the information may demonstrate employee's level of success at his job, it did not attempt to provide an objective measure of his intelligence or psychological fitness).

[16] See Salt River Valley, supra, 769 F.2d at 642 (in requiring disclosure of employees' personnel file the court relied on employees' lack of expectation of confidentiality and lack of employer's committment to employees that information would remain confidential). Cf. Detroit Edison Co., supra, 440 U.S. at 306 (employer made express commitment to employees that information would remain confidential).

> Pursuant to the National Labor Relations Act, records from this system may be furnished to a labor organization upon its request when needed by that organization to perform properly its duties as the collective bargaining representative of postal employees in an appropriate unit.

Nonetheless, the Respondent asserts that the requested information is not relevant to the Unions' performance of their duties as collective-bargaining representatives and, therefore, the information need not be disclosed. Of course the problem with this argument is that its premise (that the information is not relevant) is erroneous. Thus, given our finding that the requested information is relevant and given that the very use for which the information has been requested is defined as a routine use for the information, we find that the Privacy Act does not prevent disclosure of the information.[17]

Accordingly, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to furnish the requested information to the Unions, and we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.[18] On the entire record the Board makes the following

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent provides postal services for the United States of America and operates various facilities throughout the United States in the performance of that function, including its facility in Atlanta, Georgia, the only facility involved in this proceeding. The Board has jurisdiction over the Respondent and this matter by virtue of Section 1209 of the Postal Reform Act of 1970.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges and the Respondent admits that the Unions are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

A. Recognition

Since about July 1974, the APWU has been, and remains, the exclusive representative of employees in the following appropriate unit by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act:

> All maintenance employees, special delivery messengers, motor vehicle employees and postal clerks employed by the Respondent.

Since about July 1971, the Mail Handlers has been, and remains, the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act: "All mail handlers, watchmen, messengers and group leaders."

The Respondent has been a party to successive collective-bargaining agreements with the APWU and the Mail Handlers since about July 1974 and July 1971, respectively.

B. Request and Refusal

About February 17, 1987, the APWU, through Metro, requested the Respondent to provide it with information regarding the disciplining of supervisors arising out of a gambling raid that resulted in disciplinary action against employees in the unit APWU represents.

About January 15 and May 12, 1987, the Mail Handlers, through Local 310, requested the Respondent to provide it with information regarding the disciplining of supervisors arising out of a gambling raid that resulted in disciplinary action against employees in the unit the Mail Handlers represents.

Since about January 29, 1987, the Respondent has refused to provide the requested information to the Mail Handlers or its Local 310 and since about February 20, 1987, it has refused to provide the requested information to the APWU or its Metro local. We find that these refusals constitute unlawful refusals to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By refusing on and after January 29, 1987, to bargain with the Mail Handlers and by refusing on or after February 20, 1987, to bargain with the APWU by refusing to produce the information these Unions requested concerning the disciplinary records of supervisors involved in gambling activity at the Respondent's Atlanta facility, the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5 and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices, we shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist and that it take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

---

[17] See Postal Service, supra at 693, enfd. 841 F.2d 141 (6th Cir. 1988).

[18] The Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment is denied.

Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

Bellwood Printing Pressmen, Assistants' and Specialities Union No. 670, Subordinate to the Graphic Communications International Union (Reynolds Metals Company) and Ronald E. Evans and International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, Lodge No. 10. Case 5–CD–288

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed on January 19, 1988, by Ronald E. Evans, an individual, alleging that the Respondent, Bellwood Printing Pressmen, Assistants' and Specialities Union No. 670, Subordinate to the Graphic Communications International Union (Local 670), violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing Reynolds Metal Company, the Employer, to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, Lodge No. 10 (IAM). The hearing was held on February 25, 1988, before Hearing Officer Steven John Anderson.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

Reynolds Metals Company, a Delaware corporation, is engaged in the manufacture and distribution of aluminum products from its facility known as the Bellwood printing plant which is located in Richmond, Virginia. The Employer annually sells and ships goods directly from its Bellwood printing plant to points located outside the State of Virginia, which goods are valued in excess of $50,000. The parties stipulate, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Local 670 and IAM are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

The Employer manufactures aluminum foil-backed labels, paper, and cartons at its Bellwood printing plant. The Employer currently has collective-bargaining agreements with both Local 670 and IAM. Local 670 was certified by the Board on May 21, 1958, as exclusive representative of the Employer's hourly production and maintenance employees, including its electricians. The electricians perform both new construction and repair electrical work at the plant. On August 22, 1958, pursuant to an agreement reached between the two Unions, Local 670 delegated the representation of certain employees engaged in the "manufacturing, erecting, repairs and dismantling of all machines and the work done by employees assigned to the machine shop" to IAM. The machinists perform all the mechanical repair work at the plant. They also build and install machines and piping, do rigging work for large equipment, and perform all the welding at the plant. IAM has never been certified by the Board, but since 1958 the Employer has voluntarily recognized IAM as the exclusive representative of all employees who perform the work of manufacturing, erecting, repairing, and dismantling of all machines.

The electrical panels in the Bellwood plant are typically affixed to brackets that can be mounted on the floor, on walls, or on existing platforms. These electrical panels can be mounted on brackets by themselves or on brackets holding other panels such as hydraulic, pneumatic, or mechanical panels. The brackets can be made out of steel or aluminum channel or angle iron, perforated channel iron known as "kindorf," and wood. The brackets made out of channel or angle iron are fabricated by the machinists at the plant. The brackets made out of kindorf are prefabricated. The installation of brackets for electrical panels can range from a simple procedure of mounting kindorf brackets by clamps or bolts to the more complex procedure of welding or milling of the channel or angle iron brackets and then mounting them.

In July 1987 a grievance was filed by Roger Young, an electrician represented by Local 670, claiming that certain work which belonged to Local 670 was being performed on overtime by the machinists represented by IAM. According to Young, he had been installing an electrical panel which required that brackets be attached to a platform on which to hold the panel, but after he left at the end of his shift, a machinist hung the brackets and was paid overtime as a result. This grievance was processed through the last step of the grievance procedure. The Employer denied the grievance because the machinist had been assigned to do the installation before Young started the project. The grievance did not go to arbitration.

best copy available

By letter dated January 6, 1988, Thomas Smith, Local 670's business representative, informed R. D. Kroniser, the Employer's plant personnel manager, that Local 670 intended to establish an "information picket . . . for the purpose of resolving the work jurisdiction dispute" between Local 670 and IAM concerning the assignment of the electrical bracket work.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the installation of brackets for electrical panels at the Employer's Bellwood printing plant.[1]

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends that the status quo should be maintained and that, in conformance with the historical plant practice, employees represented by either or both Unions should be assigned the work in dispute, as determined by the Employer based on considerations of skill, efficiency, and availability of manpower.

Local 670 contends that the disputed work should be awarded to the electricians whom it represents. In this regard, Local 670 claims that the installation of electrical panel brackets has always been the electricians' work; is more closely related to recognized electrical work; and does not constitute the machinists' work as described by the current IAM collective-bargaining agreement. Local 670 further contends that the disputed work should not be awarded to both Unions because such action would create grievances relating to the allocation of overtime between the two bargaining units.

IAM contends that the machinists whom it represents should be awarded the installation of all electrical brackets with the exception of the installation of the kindorf brackets, because, inter alia, only the machinists perform welding work. IAM states that it does not oppose sharing the work of installation of the kindorf brackets with the electricians represented by Local 670 because, according to IAM, this is consistent with the Employer's past and current practices.

The Charging Party contends that the disputed work should be awarded to the electricians represented by Local 670 because this work involves installation of electrical equipment which has been performed by electricians in the past.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed upon a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

As noted above, Local 670 threatened the Employer on January 6, 1988, that it would picket unless the jurisdictional work dispute was resolved. We find that an object of Local 670's threat was to force or require the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it. We, therefore, find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and there is no contention that there is an agreed-upon method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act.[2] Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certifications and collective-bargaining agreements

It is undisputed that the 1958 Board certification does not define in specific terms Local 670's work jurisdiction. Similarly, Local 670's current collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer does not contain a provision delineating the scope of the Union's work jurisdiction except to indicate that the Union is the representative of all production and maintenance employees excluding the machinists and certain other employees. Although the 1958 memorandum agreement between the Unions is more illuminating, it likewise does not specifically mention electrical bracket installation work in its description of each Union's work jurisdiction. According to this memorandum, Local 670 has jurisdiction over "the testing, making ready, and operating and adjusting machines," while IAM has jurisdiction over "the manufacturing, erecting, repairs and dismantling of all machines and the work to be done by employees assigned to the machine shop."[3] Article III, section 2, of IAM's current collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer defines a covered "employee" in a fashion comparable to the description of IAM's work provided by the 1958 memorandum agreement.

[1] No dispute exists as to the Employer's assignment to the machinists represented by IAM of bracket fabrication work that requires welding.

[2] It was stipulated that there does not exist an informal dispute resolution mechanism agreed to by all the parties.

Our review of the Board's certification of Local 670, the 1958 memorandum agreement executed by the two Unions, and Local 670's and IAM's collective-bargaining agreements reveals that these documents are sufficiently broad to encompass the type of work in dispute and that there is no specific reference to the installation of electrical panel brackets. In addition, none of these documents specifically indicates that the installation of electrical panel brackets is the work of employees represented by one of the Unions to the exclusion of the other. Accordingly, we find that the factors of certification and collective-bargaining agreements are inconclusive.

2. Company preference and past practice

The Charging Party, employed as an electrician at the Bellwood plant for 14 years, testified that he has seen electricians and machinists, separately and together, perform the disputed bracket installation work for electrical panels. He testified that he was not aware of any pattern relating to how this work is assigned to the employees, but that it is assigned to whomever "the supervisors want." In contradiction to the above testimony, the Charging Party also testified that Local 670 has never given up its exclusive right to the disputed work and recalled an incident of 8 years ago when George Southworth, a supervisor at the Bellwood plant, asked him, as the shop steward, for permission to have a machinists instead of an electrician perform the disputed work.

Local 670 presented two witnesses, Keith Grady and Roger Young. Keith Grady, a trustee and shop steward of IAM and a machinist at the Bellwood plant for 30 years, testified that bracket installation work has always been the sole responsibility of the machinists, but that he did not object to assigning the installation of brackets using kindorf to the electricians. He testified, primarily based on his own experience, that 95 percent of the bracket installation work is performed by the machinists and the remaining 5 percent by the electricians. When recalled as a witness for IAM, Grady indicated that he has performed bracket installations using kindorf, but individually prefers to use a stronger metal. Roger Young, an electrician employed 2 years at the Bellwood plant, testified that he has installed kindorf and angle iron brackets for electrical panels several times.

Wiley Via, the plant manager, George Southworth, currently a maintenance foreman, and Jessie Shelton, a mechanical maintenance supervisor, testified on behalf of the Employer. Their testimony reveals that since at least 1963 the Employer has had a practice of having employees represented by either Union perform the disputed bracket installation work. The Employer's witnesses testified that the Employer's selection for the assignment depends on the circumstances involved, including the skills needed, the availability of employees, and overall efficiency concerns. No contrary evidence was presented. Southworth testified that both the electricians and the machinists have been assigned the disputed work and any welding that may be involved is done separately by the machinists. In this respect, Southworth's testimony is consistent with testimony from the Charging Party and the Unions' witnesses.

The IAM's claim that the electricians worked only with kindorf brackets was refuted by the Employer's witnesses. The Employer's witnesses testified that the electricians had also used channel and angle iron. This was corroborated by Roger Young, an electrician. Young testified that he had recently installed a bracket built from angle iron. Young's testimony on this point was not specifically refuted.

The preponderance of the evidence shows that the installations of electrical panel brackets using kindorf have been performed by both the electricians and the machinists. The more complex installations, which usually require welding, are often performed by the machinists alone because they have the welding skills and the electricians do not, but that the electricians sometimes perform a complex bracket installation with the welding portion of the assignment being done by the machinists. The preponderance of the evidence further shows that, during the last 25 years, the Employer's practice is to assign the installation of brackets for electrical panels at its Bellwood printing plant to the electricians represented by Local 670 or to the machinists represented by the IAM depending on the circumstances involved, including the skills needed, the availability of employees, and overall efficiency concerns. Accordingly, the factor of the Employer's past practice supports an award to employees represented by both Unions and does not favor an exclusive award of the work in dispute to employees represented by either Union.

The record reflects that the Employer's preference is to continue assigning the disputed bracket installation work to employees represented by either Local 670 or IAM depending on the nature of the work and the circumstances involved. Consequently, we find that the factor of employer preference also favors an award of the electrical panel bracket installation work to employees represented by both Unions rather than exclusively to one particular group of employees.

[3] In view of the conflicting and inconclusive evidence, we do not construe "machines" to include or exclude brackets for electrical panels.

3. Relative skills

Plant Manager Via testified that to install brackets for electrical panels the following skills are needed generally: measuring and cutting materials; drilling holes; and sometimes tapping holes, welding, and milling of slots. He indicated that the electricians do not possess the welding and milling skills. The record reflects that the machinists have all these skills.

There is no dispute that both the electricians and the machinists have the requisite skills to perform installations involving kindorf brackets. There is also no dispute that the machinists have the requisite skills to perform installations of brackets made out of heavier materials. The dispute centers on whether the electricians have the requisite skills to perform the installations involving the heavier materials.

The Charging Party and witnesses for the Employer and Local 670 testified that the electricians possess the requisite skills to perform the installations of brackets made out of heavier materials. Their evidence was supported by further testimony indicating specific examples of bracket installations involving heavier materials which were performed by electricians. No contrary evidence from IAM was presented.[4]

Based on the preponderance of the evidence, we find the factor of relative skills favors awarding the disputed work to employees represented by both Unions and does not favor an exclusive award of the work in dispute to employees represented by either Union.

4. Economy and efficiency of operation

The Employer's witnesses presented evidence that economy and efficiency are best promoted by the assignment of the disputed bracket installations to either the electricians or the machinists, depending on the circumstances involved. In this regard, Plant Manager Via testified that the Employer assigns the installations of electrical panels based on the complexity of the job, employee availability, and sometimes the skills required to do the job. His testimony was corroborated by Foreman Southworth. According to Via's testimony, it is more efficient for the Employer to make the selection between electricians and machinists on a case-by-case basis to achieve a more efficient utilization of manpower and less employee idle time because the number of electricians and machinists on the job fluctuates. Via explained that the Employer does not assign only the kindorf bracket installations to the electricians or all the bracket installations to the machinists because the electricians can perform installations besides those involving kindorf and the machinists are not always available when all the brackets need to be installed. Via also testified that no accidents or safety problems have arisen in connection with the performance of the disputed work. The Unions and the Charging Party did not present any evidence to refute the Employer's evidence relating to this factor. Therefore, the considerations of economy and efficiency favor allowing the Employer to use its discretion in assigning the disputed bracket installation work to either the electricians or the machinists represented by the Unions, rather than making an exclusive assignment.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that none of the factors favors an award of the disputed work involving the installation of brackets for electrical panels to employees represented by one Union to the exclusion of other employees to whom the Employer has assigned such work in the past. In these circumstances, we conclude that employees represented by either Union are entitled to perform the work in dispute and that the Employer has the right to assign the work, in accordance with its past practice, to employees represented by either Union, depending on the circumstances involved.[5] We reach this conclusion relying on the factors of company preference and past practice, relative skills, and economy and efficiency of operation. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by either Union, not to the Unions or their members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

[4] IAM presented testimony to the effect that because brackets using heavier materials usually are fabricated and welded by the machinists (work not in dispute), the electricians cannot perform the entire bracket work. Based on the record as a whole, we do not find persuasive this attempt to have the assignment of the disputed work dictated by what skills are needed to perform work not in dispute.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of Reynolds Metals Company represented by Bellwood Printing Pressmen, Assistants' and Specialities Union No. 670, Subordinate to the Graphic Communications International Union and employees of the Employer represented by International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, Lodge No. 10, are entitled to perform the work of installing the brackets for electrical panels at the Bellwood printing plant located in Richmond, Virginia.

2. Bellwood Printing Pressmen, Assistants' and Specialities Union No. 670, Subordinate to the Graphic Communications International Union is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force Reynolds Metals Company to assign the disputed bracket installation work exclusively to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, Bellwood Printing Pressmen, Assistants' and Specialities Union No. 670, Subordinate to the Graphic Communications International Union shall notify the Regional Director for Region 5 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On July 29, 1983, Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified and set forth in full below.

I. THE BARGAINING ORDER

The judge found that commencing with the Union's organizational campaign, the Respondent engaged in a course of serious unfair labor practices that affected virtually all employees at the plant.[3] He concluded that these unfair labor practices in the small unit precluded the possibility of holding a fair election. Noting that a majority of the Respondent's production and maintenance employees had signed union authorization cards during June 1982,[4] the judge concluded that the imposition of a bargaining order would best protect the employees' sentiments pursuant to NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969).[5] The judge, however, did not make the bargaining order retroactive to June 30, the date on which the Respondent had embarked on its course of unlawful conduct. The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to make the bargaining order retroactive to that date. We find merit in the General Counsel's exception.

Although acknowledging that the Board has issued retroactive bargaining orders since Trading Port, Inc., 219 NLRB 298 (1975), the judge decided that the entry of a prospective bargaining order in this case would best effectuate the purposes of the Act. He reasoned, inter alia, that a retroactive bargaining obligation was inappropriate because the Union had failed to demand recognition when it obtained majority status, and because the retroactive order might have deleterious effects on the Respondent's already precarious financial condition. We note, however, that in Peaker Run Coal Co., 228 NLRB 93 (1977), the Board rejected the argument that a retroactive bargaining order is inappropriate in the absence of a demand for recognition and bargaining. See also Rodeway Inn of Las Vegas, 252 NLRB 344 fn. 3 (1980). Furthermore, speculation concerning the effects of a bargaining order on the Respondent's financial condition will not deter the Board from ordering relief that is necessary to remedy the Respondent's unlawful conduct and to restore the status quo ante. Accordingly, we find that, consistent with precedent, the Respondent's bargaining obligation should attach as of the date that the Respondent embarked on its unlawful antiunion campaign. Groves Truck & Trailer, 281 NLRB 1194 (1986); Martin City Ready Mix, 264 NLRB 450, 453 (1982). We shall therefore order the Respondent to bargain with the Union as of June 30.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The judge found that William Childers Sr. was an agent of the Respondent and that his conduct therefore was imputable to the Respondent. The Respondent did not except to these findings. The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's failure to find that Childers Sr. was a supervisor under the Act. In light of the adopted finding that the conduct of Childers Sr. is imputable to the Respondent, we find it unnecessary to address the General Counsel's contention.

The judge further found that the Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to recall employees Fenslau, Elmore, Campbell, Elder, Collins, Jenkins, and Spencer. Although we adopt the judge's findings, we do not rely on his conclusion that the involvement of Fenslau, Elmore, and Campbell in the April 1982 theft of parts from the plant constituted a legitimate reason for the Respondent's refusal to recall them. The record establishes that the Respondent recalled employee Cichoracki even though it knew that he was involved in the same theft. We also do not rely on the judge's conclusion that Elmore's suspected involvement in the theft of plant equipment on June 30, 1982, constituted a legitimate reason for the Respondent's refusal to recall him because the record establishes that the Respondent did not have any evidence that Elmore committed this theft. Furthermore, we do not rely on the judge's finding that Spencer's constant complaints about having to do foundry work constituted a legitimate reason for the Respondent's refusal to recall him because the record does not show that Spencer made such complaints constantly.

[3] These unfair labor practices included the Respondent's interrogation of employees about their union sentiments, solicitations of and promises to remedy employee complaints, threats to discharge or lay off employees because of their union activities, and promises to employees of improved working conditions if they abandoned the Union. The judge also found that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(2) and (1) by suggesting and assisting in the formation of an employee in-plant committee. The Respondent did not except to these findings.

[4] All dates hereafter are 1982 unless otherwise indicated.

[5] The Respondent did not except to the judge's issuance of a bargaining order.

289 NLRB No. 126

II. THE UNILATERAL LAYOFF OF NOVEMBER 29

Having determined that the Respondent's bargaining obligation attached on June 30, we next consider the General Counsel's contention that the Respondent's unilateral layoff of seven employees on November 29 violated Section 8(a)(5). The General Counsel argues that the Respondent breached its duty to bargain by unilaterally laying off these employees without notice to the Union. In addressing this argument, we must determine what bargaining obligation the Respondent assumed concerning these layoffs, which were caused solely by economic factors. We note that, depending on the factual situation and the allegations set forth in the complaint, Board decisions have required employers to bargain over the decision to lay off for economic reasons and the effects of that decision or have required bargaining only over the effects of the decision to lay off.[6] For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that an employer's decision to lay off employees for economic reasons is a mandatory subject of bargaining and that the Respondent violated the Act by failing to bargain over its layoff decision and the effects of that decision.

The Respondent's decision to lay off the employees on November 29 constituted an economically motivated business decision that resulted in the loss of work for unit employees. In determining the Respondent's bargaining obligation in this circumstance, we shall apply the principles set forth in Otis Elevator Co., 269 NLRB 891 (1984) (Otis).[7] Although all four Board Members in Otis agreed that the employer's decision was not a mandatory subject of bargaining, they applied different legal analyses in reaching their conclusions. The plurality opinion of Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter applied a two-factor test—whether the decision turned on a change in the nature or direction of the business or whether it turned on labor costs—and concluded that the decision turned on a change in the nature of the business. In a concurring opinion, Member Dennis applied a two-step test: (1) whether the decision was amenable to resolution through the bargaining process, and, (2) if so, whether the benefit for labor-management relations and the collective-bargaining process outweighed the burden placed on management. Concluding that the decision to consolidate operations was not amenable to resolution through the bargaining process, she agreed that the decision was not a mandatory subject of bargaining.[8] Under either the two-factor or two-step test, we find that the Respondent's decision to lay off the seven employees for economic reasons was a mandatory subject of bargaining.

When a business is confronted with an economic problem such as declining sales, excessive inventory, or an unprofitable department, it may have several options to address this problem. Management may decide, for example, to lay off employees, to shut down the unprofitable department, or to consolidate operations and transfer work to a more efficient plant. Although job losses may result whether the decision is to lay off, shut down, or consolidate, the focus of the decision to lay off differs from the focus of the other two decisions in a critical manner. In deciding to lay off employees, management directly alters employees' terms of employment. This decision, like the decision to reduce workers' wages, necessarily turns on labor costs because the decision itself is to modify terms of employment to save money during economic downturns. By contrast, the decisions in FNM to shut down and in Otis to consolidate part of the business involved a direct modification of the business structure. Those decisions had only a secondary effect of altering employees' terms of employment. Accordingly, pursuant to the Otis plurality two-factor test, the decision to shut down part of the business or consolidate operations affects the scope, direction, or nature of the business and need not be bargained.[9] On the other hand, the decision to lay off turns on labor costs and must be bargained.

The Otis two-step test of Member Dennis mandates the same conclusion. A decision to lay off is predicated on the assumption that savings will accrue from reduced labor costs during a period when a full complement of workers is unnecessary. Labor-related considerations therefore form the basis for the decision. As a union has control over this labor-related factor, it can offer alternatives to the layoff, such as wage reductions, modified work rules, or part-time schedules for a larger group, to save the company money during the economic downturn. Accordingly, the layoff decision is amenable to resolution through the collective-bargaining process. With regard to the burden placed on the business, we note that a decision solely to lay off employees does not involve an investment of capital, an alteration of the company's basic operations, nor a need for confidentiality. Although management has a legitimate concern with the need for speed and flexibility in effectuating a layoff to remedy its economic plight, we believe that the legal requirements that exist to ensure meaningful bargaining in a timely fashion address this concern adequately.[10] We therefore find that the burden borne by management in having to bargain over an economic layoff decision is outweighed by the benefit for the collective-bargaining process.

[6] Compare Felbro, Inc., 274 NLRB 1268 (1985), enfd. in relevant part sub nom. Garment Workers Local 512 v. NLRB, 795 F.2d 705 (9th Cir. 1986); Gulf States Mfrs. Co., 261 NLRB 852 (1982), modified 704 F.2d 1390 (5th Cir. 1983); Peat Mfg. Co., 261 NLRB 240 (1982) (employer violates Sec. 8(a)(5) by failing to bargain over the decision to lay off) with Intersystems Design Corp., 278 NLRB 759 (1986); Tylertown Wood Products, 251 NLRB 515 (1980) (employer must bargain over the effects of the decision to lay off).

[7] Otis concerned an employer's decision to consolidate its operations and transfer the bargaining unit work to another facility. The Board determined whether the employer was obligated to bargain over this decision in light of the Supreme Court's holding in Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1964), and First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, 452 U.S. 666 (1981) (FNM). The Court held that the employer's decision in Fibreboard to subcontract unit work was a mandatory subject of bargaining, whereas it held in FNM that an employer's decision to shut down part of its business was not a mandatory subject of bargaining.

[8] In another concurring opinion, Member Zimmerman applied a test that encompassed only the first step of the Dennis two-step test. He also concluded that the employer's decision was not amenable to resolution through collective bargaining.

[9] An employer may still be required to bargain over a layoff as an effect of these nonbargainable decisons, however. See Litton Business Systems, 286 NLRB 817 (1987).

In light of the above analysis, we conclude that the decision to lay off employees for economic reasons is a mandatory subject of bargaining. Consequently, an employer must provide notice to and bargain with the union concerning the decision to lay off bargaining unit employees and the effects of that decision. Our conclusion is consistent with those of several circuit courts of appeal that have addressed this issue. See, e.g., NLRB v. Advertisers Mfg. Co., 823 F.2d 1086 (7th Cir. 1987); Garment Workers Local 512 v. NLRB, 795 F.2d 705 (9th Cir. 1986); NLRB v. Carbonex Coal Co., 679 F.2d 200 (10th Cir. 1982). As the Seventh Circuit emphasized in NLRB v. Advertisers Mfg. Co., supra at 1090:

> Laying off workers works a dramatic change in their working conditions (to say the least), and if the company lays them off without consulting with the union and without having agreed to procedures for layoffs in a collective bargaining agreement it sends a dramatic signal of the union's impotence.
> . . . .
> Layoffs are not a management prerogative. They are a mandatory subject of collective bargaining. Until the modalities of layoff are established in the agreement, a company that wants to lay off employees must bargain over the matter with the union.

This requirement will ensure that the employees' bargaining representative will have the opportunity to propose less drastic alternatives to the proposed layoff. Moreover, the employer's duty to bargain will require meaningful negotiations concerning the decision to lay off, and not merely the notification to the union of a decision that is a fait accompli. To ensure meaningful negotiations, we will continue to scrutinize the "totality of the [parties'] conduct throughout the course of bargaining . . . ." Atlanta Hilton & Tower, 271 NLRB 1600, 1603 (1984). In light of the economic circumstances motivating a company's decision to lay off employees, however, we will require that negotiations concerning this decision occur in a timely and speedy fashion. Thus, should a union fail to request bargaining in a timely fashion once the company has provided it with notice of the layoff decision, we will find that the company has satisfied its bargaining obligation. See, e.g., Paramount Liquor Co., 270 NLRB 339, 343 (1984); Smyth Mfg. Co., 247 NLRB 1139, 1168 (1980). Furthermore, the establishment of compelling economic circumstances may excuse a company's failure to bargain over the layoff decision. See, e.g., Aquaslide 'N' Dive Corp., 281 NLRB 219 fn. 2 (1986); Advertisers Mfg. Co., 280 NLRB 1185 (1986). We emphasize, however, that only in extraordinary situations will this exception apply. See Angelica Healthcare Services Group, 284 NLRB 844 (1987).

To illustrate the limits of our holding, we stress that our analysis today applies only to an economically motivated decision to lay off employees. We recognize that a managerial decision is often not easily categorized under a label such as layoff or consolidation. For example, the permanent contraction of a company's work force, which might be viewed as a mass layoff, may be part of a change in the scope and direction of the business enterprise and, therefore, not bargainable under FNM, supra. In this regard, we reaffirm the caveat that "the appellation of the decision is not important" to a determination of whether the decision requires bargaining. Otis, 269 NLRB at 893. Nothing in today's decision concerns an employer that shuts down a part of its business for economic reasons; the Court has made clear that bargaining over that decision is not required. FNM, supra. Nor does this decision affect in any way the Board's Otis rationale concerning an employer's decision to consolidate its operations and transfer work to another facility. Finally, we do not address layoffs that occur pursuant to a collective-bargaining agreement.

Applying our analysis to the present situation, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) through its unilateral layoff of the seven employees on November 29. The General Counsel has not alleged that the layoffs occurred as a result of discriminatory reasons on the Respondent's part. Indeed, the record establishes that the layoffs resulted from a lack of orders. To address this economic problem, the Respondent decided to lay off seven employees without notifying the Union or bargaining over the decision. The layoff was not the result of the Respondent's decision to change the nature or scope of the business. Rather, the decision was to effect changes in these employees' terms of employment to reduce labor costs during a period of economic difficulty. The Respondent was thus obligated to bargain over this decision. The record is devoid of evidence that this unilateral layoff was in accord with an established past practice whereby the Respondent had laid off employees without notice to or bargaining with the Union. Nor has the Respondent demonstrated compelling economic circumstances justifying unilateral action. Cf. Aquaslide 'N' Dive Corp., supra. Accordingly, the Respondent's failure to notify and bargain with the Union regarding the November 29 layoffs violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

[10] As discussed below, once the employer has given the union notice of the proposed decision to lay off employees, we will require that the union make a timely request to bargain and will then require that the bargaining occur in a timely and meaningful fashion.

THE REMEDY

Having determined that an employer violates the Act by failing to bargain over its decision to lay off employees, we must formulate a remedy that redresses the wrong committed. As the Supreme Court has observed, our "task in applying § 10(c) is to take measures designed to recreate the relationships that would have been had there been no unfair labor practice." Franks v. Bowman Transportation Co., 424 U.S. 747, 769 (1975). With this responsibility in mind, we conclude that ordering the employer to bargain with the union concerning the layoff decision, as well as the effects of that decision, and to reinstate the laid-off employees with backpay constitutes the appropriate remedy for this decision-bargaining violation.[11] See NLRB v. Sandpiper Convalescent Center, 824 F.2d 318 (4th Cir. 1987); NLRB v. Advertisers Mfg. Co., supra. The employer's backpay liability shall run from the date of the layoffs until the date the employees are reinstated to their same or substantially equivalent positions or have secured equivalent employment elsewhere. Backpay shall be based on the earnings that the employees normally would have received during the applicable period, less any net interim earnings, and shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in the manner prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded.[12]

We believe that the remedy requiring bargaining and full backpay relief furthers the purposes of the Act. This remedy provides an economic incentive for an employer to comply with the "rule that requires an employer to negotiate with the union before changing the working conditions in the bargaining unit . . . [thereby] prevent[ing] the employer from undermining the union by taking steps which suggest to the workers that it is powerless to protect them." NLRB v. Advertisers Mfg. Co., supra. Furthermore, these discussions may result in less drastic alternatives being effected, or they may convince the union that the layoffs represent the only reasonable solution to the employer's economic problem. As bargaining may preclude the necessity of laying off employees, we find that backpay commencing on the date of the layoff is warranted to remedy a failure to bargain. In making this determination, we recognize that a reviewing court may question this award of full backpay in the absence of evidence demonstrating that bargaining would have prevented the layoffs. We do not require such a showing, however, for two reasons. First, requiring a finding that bargaining would have prevented the layoffs to justify a backpay order requires the Board or a court to engage in a post-hoc determination of the economic situation, instead of letting the parties decide themselves at the time of the layoff. This requirement thus unnecessarily injects the Government into an area in which the collective-bargaining process should be permitted to function. Second, the requirement is contrary to our customary policy to order a respondent to restore the status quo when the respondent has taken unlawful unilateral action to the detriment of its employees. The "consequences of Respondent's disregard of its statutory obligation should be borne by the Respondent, the wrongdoer herein, rather than by the employees." Hamilton Electronics Co., 203 NLRB 206 (1973). See also Southwest Forest Industries, 278 NLRB 228 (1986). We therefore find that full backpay relief is appropriate.

[11] By contrast, requiring bargaining over the decision and reinstatement with full backpay does not constitute an appropriate remedy for an effects-bargaining violation. In that situation, the propriety of the employer's decision is not in question. In order to ensure that bargaining will occur over the effects of the decision, however, we order a limited backpay remedy pursuant to Transmarine Navigation Corp., 170 NLRB 389 (1968), should an employer fail to bargain over the effects. See Litton Business Systems, supra at 822. This limited backpay remedy requires that backpay run from 5 days after the date of the Board's decision until the occurrence of the earliest of the following conditions: (1) the date the employer bargains to agreement with the union on those subjects pertaining to the layoff about which the employer is required to bargain; (2) a bona fide impasse in bargaining; (3) the failure of the union to request bargaining within 5 days of the Board's decision and order or to commence negotiations within 5 days of the employer's notice of its desire to bargain with the union; or (4) the subsequent failure of the union to bargain in good faith; but > in no event shall the sum paid to any of these employees exceed the amount he would have earned as wages from the dates on which he was laid off or terminated to the time he was recalled or secured equivalent employment elsewhere, or the date on which the Respondent shall have offered to bargain, whichever occurs sooner; provided, however, that in no event shall this sum be less than these employees would have earned for a 2-week period at the rate of their normal wages when last in the Respondent's employ. [Id.]

[12] In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Having found that the Respondent failed to bargain over the November 29 layoffs in violation of the Act, we shall order the Respondent to bargain with the Union concerning that layoff decision and the effects of that decision. The Respondent shall reinstate employees Childers, Krohn, Mauk, and D. Farrier and award them backpay as specified above. With respect to employees Hill, Kalar, and Miles, whose layoffs were converted to permanent layoffs on December 8, their backpay and reinstatement rights shall be cut off as of that date. We provide the more limited remedy as to those three because we have affirmed the judge's finding that, contrary to the General Counsel's allegations, the conversion of their temporary layoffs to permanent layoffs was not a sham done for unlawful motives and because the General Counsel did not allege that the unilateral decision to make the layoffs permanent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[13]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Lapeer Foundry and Machine, Inc., Lapeer, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and to bargain with the International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW or its designated local union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees, including tool room employees, shipping and receiving employees, truck drivers, employed by the Respondent at the Lapeer plant, but excluding office clerical employees, technical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Interrogating employees concerning their union membership and sentiments.

(c) Soliciting employee complaints and promising to remedy them as an inducement to employee rejection of the Union as their bargaining representative.

(d) Threatening employees with discharge or layoffs because of their union activities.

(e) Promising employees improved working conditions if they rejected the Union as their bargaining representative.

(f) Creating, dominating, or interfering with the formation or administration of any labor organization (or in-plant committee) or contributing financial or other support to it.

(g) Unilaterally laying off employees without providing the Union with notice and opportunity to bargain about the decision to lay off employees, and the effects of that decision.

(h) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize and, on request, bargain with the Union as of June 30, 1982, as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, and other terms and conditions of employment, and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) On request, bargain with the Union concerning the decision to lay off employees on November 29, 1982, and the effects of that decision.

(c) Reinstate and make whole those employees laid off on November 29, 1982, for any loss of pay or other employment benefits suffered as a result of its unlawful conduct in the manner set forth in the remedy portion of this decision.

[13] We do not agree with our colleague that the Respondent failed to establish that employees Miles, Kalar, and Hill were permanently laid off or that the reinstatement and backpay rights of those employees should be left for the compliance stage of the proceeding. Initially, we note that the General Counsel alleged in the amended complaint that the Respondent had permanently laid off those three employees on December 8. Furthermore, we have adopted the judge's specific finding that the Respondent decided to lay off those employees permanently for legitimate business reasons, i.e., the lack of steady work for those employees to perform in the foreseeable future. The fact that two of them may have been recalled subsequently does not change the nature of the decision here. This permanent layoff decision was independent of the November 29 decision to effect a temporary layoff. The General Counsel chose to allege that the subsequent decision to make the layoffs permanent was discriminatory, but the judge dismissed that allegation and the General Counsel has not excepted to that dismissal. Contrary to the implication of our colleague's dissent, whether the Respondent may have violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by deciding to make the layoffs permanent without notifying the Union or affording it an opportunity to bargain over that decision cannot be ascertained because no violation of that section of the Act was alleged in the complaint or litigated at the hearing. Thus, we conclude that the Respondent's action in making those three employees' layoffs permanent has not been shown to be unlawful and that those employees therefore would not have been employed by the Respondent as of December 8 regardless of the Respondent's earlier unlawful action. Consequently, the remedy of backpay should be tolled as of that date. Finally, we do not leave this issue for compliance because the parties have litigated the lawfulness of the Respondent's permanent layoff decision and we have adopted the judge's conclusion regarding this issue.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Lapeer, Michigan plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[14] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

MEMBER JOHANSEN, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I join my colleagues in all aspects of this decision except in their findings, reflected in the remedy portion of the decision, that the layoffs of employees Miles, Kalar, and Hill were converted to permanent layoffs on December 8, 1982, and that the make-whole remedy for these employees is tolled as of that date. In my view, there is no substantive finding concerning the permanent layoff notices issued these employees December 8 on which to base a conclusion that the Respondent is purged of liability for its failure to bargain over the November 29 layoff. If, however, the Respondent can show that any of their jobs were abolished on December 8 or thereafter and thereby toll its obligations for reinstatement and backpay, it should raise those issues at the compliance stage of the proceeding. In that event, the burden is on the Respondent to prove that any one of these jobs is no longer available.[1]

When the judge described these employees as being "on permanent layoff status," his language merely acknowledged the Respondent's description of the written notices it sent out on December 8. The judge's analysis did not purport to resolve whether the Respondent made a decision prior to December 8 to which no bargaining obligation attached or even that it made any decision at all before issuing the permanency notices. With no allegation that the permanency notices violated Section 8(a)(5), there was no reason for him to resolve that issue, and thus his discussion of the notices in dismissing the 8(a)(3) allegations tracked the terminology of the notices themselves, which even the Regional Director adopted in issuing complaint. To attach any further meaning to the judge's language is to render a distinction without substance.[2]

Two observations are made to justify a limited make-whole remedy for these employees: (1) the "conversion" to permanent layoff status on December 8 "was not a sham done for unlawful motives"; and (2) the General Counsel did not allege the "conversion" independently to violate Section 8(a)(5). I neither take issue with these observations nor apprehend their relevance. The fact that the permanency notices were not "a sham" but genuinely economically motivated no more mitigates the Respondent's liability for its unilateral action than the fact that the layoff announced 9 days earlier was itself a response to economic hardship. As set forth more fully in the remedy portion of this decision, our theory of violation has nothing to do with unlawful motive or lack of substantial business justification for the Respondent's unilateral action but is based on the fact of unilateral action itself. The Respondent was no more privileged to proceed unilaterally when it declared some of the layoffs permanent on December 8 than when it laid off the workers in the first place, and permanency notices did nothing to cure the defect of that unilateral action.

As to the second observation—that allegations over the permanency notices were based not on Section 8(a)(5) but on Section 8(a)(3)—making no assumptions as to the legality under Section 8(a)(5) of the December 8 notices, I note the following: Because it is clear from the record that the Respondent did not offer to bargain over the November 29 layoffs, it could not lawfully have made determinations about the permanency of any of those layoffs based solely on economic data at hand on December 8. Rather, it would have had to base its projections also on the outcome of November 29 layoff bargaining—bargaining that had not occurred; or else it could only have assumed that those negotiations would have validated the decision to effect an indefinite layoff on November 29; that Miles, Kalar, and Hill would have been among those lawfully placed on indefinite layoff on November 29; and that further economic decisions could be lawfully predicated on those assumptions.

[14] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

[2] References in the record to economic justification for the permanency notices are too vague to support any viable distinction between the Respondent's action on the dates of the two sets of notices—and certainly insufficient to support a finding that the December notices were based on a decision to which no bargaining obligation would have attached. Labels of "permanency" notwithstanding, two of the three employees were recalled within months to the same departments from which they had been laid off, and the Respondent's conflicting testimony concerning the third, Kalar, suggests that his work was either contracted out or absorbed by three other individuals after he was laid off—in neither case suggesting an unbargainable decision. Respondent witness Rassey's testimony goes far in negating any inference as to a distinction of substance in that he twice could not recall whether the second set of notices announced a "definite" or "indefinite" layoff.

These are the types of assumptions my colleagues and I are unwilling to make in ordering the Respondent before bargaining to restore conditions to the status quo ante prior to November 29 by extending full reinstatement and backpay relief to the other four employees laid off on that date. As stated in the remedy portion of the decision, it is not the Board's policy in cases of unbargained layoffs to engage in a post-hoc determination of the parties' economic situation, and I am unwilling to do so here to conclude, as do my colleagues, that Miles, Kalar, and Hill would not have been employed by the Respondent as of December 8 irrespective of a failure to bargain on November 29. In short, with an unremedied refusal to bargain accruing from November 29, it is simply not possible to ascertain what the employment status of these employees would have been when the Respondent asserted its claim of exacerbated economic hardship on December 8 or to conclude that make-whole liability for their original layoffs has been negated upon that assertion even if the permanency notices were accomplished in otherwise full compliance with Section 8(a)(5).

This is not to suggest that the Respondent is foreclosed from showing that any number of other events recognized as tolling make-whole liability, such as the elimination of jobs,[3] cessation of pertinent segments of its operations,[4] or other decisions not subject to mandatory bargaining, have intervened either on December 8 or thereafter. Such issues may be raised and resolved at the compliance stage of this proceeding without the need to litigate a further charge.

Accordingly, I cannot conclude that either of the stated justifications supports limiting the term of the make-whole remedy affecting these three employees.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM A. GERSHUNY, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing was conducted in Flint, Michigan, on May 10-13, 1983, on complaint issued April 15, 1983, alleging a number of violations of Section 8(a)(1), (2), (3), (4), and (5) of the Act during the course of an organizational drive and seeking, inter alia, a bargaining order.

On the entire record, including my observation of witness demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, the answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer subject to the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent acquired the foundry at Lapeer at a bankruptcy sale and, with a $1 million loan from the Economic Development Corporation for the rehabilitation of the plant and equipment by May 1982, began the hiring process in September 1981. The prior owner had had serious problems with the union representing its employees, had a poor reputation among its customers, and had gone into bankruptcy. The plant and equipment remained idle for more than 1-1/2 years and, at the time of acquisition by Respondent, were in a terrible state of disrepair. Respondent hired many of the former employees, despite knowledge of their prior union membership; others, with no prior foundry experience, were screened, trained, and referred by the Michigan Employment Security Commission to Respondent who received a tax credit for maintaining an on-the-job training program.

Limited production began in January due to the lack of orders. During the next 6 months, Respondent was plagued with numerous customer complaints about product quality and frequent equipment breakdowns. Employees were not laid off, but rather were used for plant rehabilitation so as not to jeopardize the Company's loan.

During June 1982, a majority (18) of the approximately 27 production and maintenance employees signed union authorization cards. A representation petition was filed on June 28 and served on June 29. By notice served August 27, a hearing on the petition was scheduled for September. However, none was conducted due to the filing of charges on July 6 and September 7, 1982, and January 10 and March 3, 1983.

B. The Status of Childers Sr.

The complaint alleges that Childers Sr., either as a supervisor or as an agent of Respondent, engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1). Respondent contends that he was a leadman only and that his conduct is not attributable to it.

Childers, with 23 years' foundry experience with the former owner, was one of the first employees hired in the fall of 1981. Placed in charge of the automatic molding operation, Childers, in 1982, worked directly under Plant Superintendent Cappella; he was paid at the hourly rate of $7, in contrast to the $5 rate for other production employees; a number of admittedly nonsupervisory employees similarly were paid $7 per hour; he assigned work to, and directed the work of, a number of production employees; he discussed complaints with employees and took their complaints to management; he claimed to have authority to issue verbal reprimands and to suspend and discharge employees, although there is no evidence that such authority ever was exercised. With other department leaders, he attended regular production meetings conducted by Cappella and President Rassey; and, at Rassey's request, he admittedly solicited grievances from production employees and interrogated them as to their involvement in the organizational campaign.

There is grave doubt in my mind whether the evidence supports the contention of supervisory status. Childers was not salaried and there is no evidence that he exercised discretion in the production operation or the authority he claimed to possess when he gave an affidavit to the Board. At the hearing, Childers, an older man, clearly was confused and testified that, although he had been offered that authority, he had refused to accept it. Moreover, there is evidence suggesting that no employee believed him to have that authority and, indeed, employees seeking time off or with complaints went directly to Rassey or Cappella.

There is, however, no need to decide that issue because the record clearly reflects that, at all relevant times, he was placed by Rassey in such a position that he would be considered by employees as its agent, as defined in Section 2(13) of the Act. B-P Custom Building

Products, 251 NLRB 1337 (1980); Han-Dee Pack, 249 NLRB 725 (1980).

Childers conveyed to employees information received from Rassey and Cappella about the Company's attitude toward organization; he was instructed by Rassey to determine the nature of employee complaints and to report to him; he was told by Rassey he was the "spokesman" for the employees; he was authorized to be Rassey's spokesman concerning the creation of an in-plant committee; and he obtained from the front office the material and clerical assistance in early September to enable the employees to conduct an election to determine whether they wanted Petitioner or a committee to represent them. Thus, whether his authority rose to the level of a supervisor, Childers was placed by management in a position where employees reasonably could believe he spoke on their behalf. Accordingly, his conduct during the summer of 1982 is imputable to Respondent.

C. Childers' June 30 Meeting with Employees

On June 29, Respondent was served with the representation petition. The next day, June 30, the plant's second furnace unexpectedly blew a coil, thereby shutting it down along with the other furnace that also was down for major repairs. A layoff of all nonessential employees was decided. In a morning meeting with Rassey concerning the furnaces, Childers was shown the petition and reminded of their conversation the year before, in which Rassey said he would close the plant if the Union "got in." He was also asked to find out why the employees were unhappy and wanted a union.

He did so shortly thereafter, while having lunch with a number of employees in the lunchroom. Within hearing of all, he said that he had just come from a meeting in the office; that Rassey was just served with the petition; that the furnace problem would necessitate a lengthy layoff; that two employees, Fenslau and Spencer, would not be recalled because employees had complained that their hourly rate ($7) was higher than theirs ($5); that management blamed Kolar, Fenslau, and Spencer for the Union; and that it was a bad time to organize. He also asked who had signed cards.

I find and conclude that this meeting constituted an unlawful interrogation of employees about their union activities, an unlawful threat that employment would be denied to those employees responsible for the organizational drive, and an unlawful promise that employee complaints would be remedied by not recalling certain employees whose hourly rates were higher than most production employees, all in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Whether subsequent layoffs or refusals to recall certain employees were unlawful is considered below.

D. Childers' Solicitation of Grievances

Within days of the June 30 furnace breakdown and layoffs, Childers was asked by Rassey to find out what the employee problems were. He did so on a number of occasions, telling employees to inform him of their complaints. He then would relay the complaints to Rassey, who would straighten them out. Given the pendency of a representation proceeding, there is no question about Rassey's intent—it was to discourage employee support of a union as their bargaining representative by demonstrating his willingness to deal directly and promptly with their complaints. Such activity is violative of Section 8(a)(1).

E. Respondent's Antiunion Animus

The credible record evidence is overwhelming that, from September 1981 when it first began hiring its work force, management made it known that the plant would close if a union came in. Plant Superintendent Cappella testified that this attitude of the Company was "common knowledge." He admitted telling a number of employees that the Company could not afford "GM" wage rates. Rassey admitted telling job applicants that, if the Company had labor problems similar to those of the former owner, "I'd be forced to shut down, too." Other credible employee testimony reflects that, at various times, Rassey told them that he would not be afraid to shut down if a union came in and that he had told this to the city's redevelopment authority. In addition, on the morning of June 30, following breakdown of the furnace and receipt of the petition, Rassey reminded Childers Sr. what he had told him in September—he would close the plant if a union came in. Rassey's intentions in telling this to all job applicants, including employees of the former owner who had been represented and who had seen the plant go into bankruptcy because of labor difficulties, were manifest—if you want continued employment, do not organize.

This animus on the part of Respondent is highly relevant in considering the lawfulness of other conduct of Respondent.

F. Cappella's Interrogation

Plant Superintendent Cappella admitted asking an employee, in early July after filing of the petition, if he had signed an authorization card. The employee, a relative of Cappella's wife, was at the Cappella home with his family and asked Cappella if the Company was going to "make it." Cappella replied that it would and asked if the employee had signed a card. The employee responded that he had not. However innocent this conversation may have been, it is, under the circumstances present here, violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act because of its tendency to interfere with the free exercise of the statutory right of employees to organize.

G. Rassey's July 8 Meeting with Hill

Credible evidence establishes that, on July 8, laid-off employee Hill returned to the plant to meet with Rassey about the continuation of his medical insurance coverage. During their conversation, Rassey said that he would sponsor ball teams, picnics, and bowling leagues (subjects never mentioned before); that he would initiate an incentive program; that the employees did not need a "third party," but that they could settle their problems directly with him; and that he had told the city he would close if a union came in. Rassey's statements constitute unlawful promises of benefits in order to undermine employee support for the Union, an unlawful threat to cease doing business if forced to deal with a union, and an unlawful solicitation of grievances to be handled without the need for a bargaining representative, all in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

H. Rassey's July 16 Meeting with Curran

In support of the allegations of paragraph 12 of the complaint, employee Curran testified that, in a July 16 meeting with Rassey in the latter's office, Rassey told him the Company was "in trouble" with the Board and that he should keep his mouth closed about the Union; he inquired whether Curran had spoken with the Board and as to the substance of that conversation. During Rassey's lengthy testimony, he was not asked about this meeting.

Nevertheless, paragraph 12 must be dismissed for want of proof, as I am unable to credit any of Curran's testimony, based primarily on my observation of his demeanor on the stand. He was aggressive and hostile and his testimony was exaggerated. Moreover, by his own admission, Curran was having personality problems of such a bizarre nature as to cast serious doubts on his ability to accurately recount events and conversations. He regularly carried with him a tape recorder so that there would be no "misunderstandings" in his daily dealings with Rassey or Cappella. During another meeting with Rassey on September 10 (discussed below), Curran lost control of himself, throwing papers at Rassey and storming out of the office and the plant. The following morning, he returned to meet again with Rassey at the latter's office, armed with a tape recorder and accompanied by his wife, who was to serve as a witness.

I. The September 1 Meeting

On the morning of September 1, 4 days after having been served with a notice scheduling a hearing for September 8 on the representation petition, Rassey met with all employees. The credible testimony of employees Kalar, Stroup, and Hill and the admissions of Childers Sr. and Cappella establish that Rassey suggested the formation of an in-plant committee that would function in lieu of a union; that, with the assistance of management and on company time, the employees voted to be represented by the committee rather than by the Union; that, thereafter, Cappella designated three employees to serve on that committee; that the committee never functioned; and that, thereafter, at the direction of Rassey and again on company time, a "decertification affidavit" was circulated among the employees.

More specifically, Rassey advised the employees of the scheduled hearing; told them that, although he could not advise them what to do or assist them, if the hearing were to be canceled a decertification petition would be needed immediately; told them that they should consider whether they wanted a shop committee to serve as their bargaining representative; and suggested they give him three names of persons to serve on that committee. The employees thereafter conferred in private and on company time, during which time some employees stated that the plant would close if a union came in. They decided to conduct a secret election that afternoon. With material and clerical assistance from the front office, ballots reading, "Would you like to form your own bargaining unit and your own committee to represent you?" were distributed. Eighteen employees voted "yes" and eleven voted "no." The ballots were then stored in the office safe. The following day, Cappella designated three employees to serve on the committee, which never came into existence otherwise. Thereafter, one employee was instructed by Rassey to circulate an affidavit addressed to the Board, advising that the employees wanted to be represented by an in-plant committee and not by Petitioner. There is no evidence as to the disposition of this document.

I find and conclude that these acts on the part of Rassey and Cappella constitute a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act and represent a bald attempt to interfere with and frustrate the statutory representation processes.

J. The June 30–July 1 Layoffs and Subsequent Recalls

1. The layoffs

On June 30, 1 day after being served with the petition, Respondent experienced a major, unexpected coil burnout in its only remaining operational furnace. The other, at the time, was undergoing major repairs to its coils. There is no contention and the record does not suggest that a breakdown did not occur or that it was other than unforeseen. Nor is there any doubt about the fact that the breakdown left Respondent with no iron-pouring capacity for some weeks.

Eighteen employees, not essential to furnace repairs, were laid off on June 30 and July 1. All but one were card signers; one card signer was not laid off.

The contention is that the layoffs were discriminatory and, thus, unlawful, as evidenced by their timing and the fact that, in the past when both furnaces were down, the entire work force was retained.

I find and conclude that the June 30 and July 1 layoffs were not unlawful. The testimony of Cappella and Rassey in this respect is undisputed by any General Counsel witness with a knowledge of the plant's overall operation and is credible.

When Respondent acquired the plant in September 1981, both furnaces were dismantled. One was operational by December and both by January. Normally only one furnace is used at any one time. Prior to June, there never was an occasion when both were down at the same time due to coil problems. When furnace relining was necessitated, it was done in a day or two and the employees were reassigned to plant and equipment rehabilitation work generally, because Respondent was contractually obligated to complete plant rehabilitation by May 1982.

On June 30, one furnace was down for repairs and the other "blew" a coil, requiring outside repairs, which normally take from 3 to 6 weeks. Faced with severe budgetary constraints (a fact not disputed), Rassey and Cappella, after consultations with the outside coil expert, laid off all employees not essential to the furnace teardown and repair. Although there may have been work for some employees in the core, grinding, and molding operations, it was decided not to continue those operations due to the uncertainty of a startup date and the fact that cores and moldings cannot be kept for any period of time. After further consultations with the expert, Respondent decided to attempt an innovative means of operating the furnance with fewer than all coils. By July 4, the experiment proved successful and the furnace was operational. Recalls began immediately.

The Act preserves to all employers, including those who openly display antiunion animus, the right to make business decisions for good reasons, bad reasons, or simply no reason at all, so long as the actual reason is not an unlawful one. And if, as here, the credited evidence is suggestive of both a lawful and an unlawful reason for that decision (i.e., to lay off and recall certain employees), the employer nevertheless acts lawfully if the same decision would have been made even if there were no protected employee activities. NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

I find and conclude that the layoffs of June 30 and July 1 were undertaken solely for legitimate business reasons and that, in any event, Respondent would have made the same layoff decisions irrespective of the employees' involvement or suspected involvement in the organizing effort.

Never before had Respondent been faced with a comparable operational crisis. In the past, there had been general rehabilitation work that was available to the employees; in the past, the furnace shutdowns were for but brief periods; and, in the past, similar budgetary constraints were not experienced. Thus, the General Counsel's "past practice" theory is without credible factual support. In addition, the timing of the breakdown was simply fortuitous, there being no suggestion in this record of Respondent's involvement in the timing of the breakdown. It should be added, Respondent's imaginative method of bringing the furnace into full operation while the coil was being repaired not only suggests a strong profit motive on the part of this small businessman, but also dispels completely any inference of unlawful motivation in the layoffs.

2. The recalls

Several days after the June 30–July 1 layoffs, Respondent began the recall of employees. Of the 11 recalled, 10 were card signers and 1, Kalar, was a "suspected ringleader." Seven, all card signers, were not recalled. The decisions were made on the basis of a review of the work record of each, as reflected in company records and as personally known by Rassey and Cappella. In this connection, I credit their testimony, which I believe to be candid and convincing and consistent with the undisputed evidence of a startup operation plagued by costly equipment breakdowns, poor production quality, slow sales, and tight budgetary constraints. On the other hand, the testimony of the seven employees not recalled was disturbingly exaggerated, painting an unreal picture of the operation and their duties.

The circumstances surrounding the decision not to recall will be discussed separately as to each of the seven employees.

Fenslau, a truckdriver and mechanic, was laid off on July 1 after completing a customer delivery. He had a "horrible" work record, with 13 warnings for being late (more than the other 6 employees combined). Moreover, 2 months earlier, on April 23, 1982, in the presence of a police officer called to the plant, he admitted stealing parts from the plant valued at several thousand dollars, and implicated three other employees. Credible testimony in this regard of the police officer, Rassey, and Cappella establishes that, after Rassey consulted with the police, each of the four was given another chance to prove himself, was put on job probation for 6 to 12 months, and was told to return the property immediately. Criminal charges were not filed by Rassey. Some, but not all, of the property was returned and, while his work improved for a week or so, he developed an attitude of not wanting to work. Finally, Rassey learned from a customer that, during the course of Fenslau's July 1 delivery run, Fenslau told the customer that there would be a union at the foundry, that the foundry would be shut down, and that the customer should purchase his castings elsewhere. Fenslau did not deny making these statements.

As found above, Childers Sr. (Respondent's agent) told employees on June 30 that Fenslau would not be recalled because other employees were complaining of his higher rate of pay and that Fenslau was one of three suspected ringleaders in the organization drive. Childers, however, played no role in the final decision about recall.

I am unable to find that the decision not to recall Fenslau was motivated by either of these factors. If Rassey wanted to placate the employees, he could simply have reduced Fenslau's hourly rate. As noted above, one of the other suspected ringleaders was recalled from the June 30 layoff.

Absenteeism, tardiness, and employee theft are national problems of epidemic proportions and neither this conduct nor the making of disparaging statements to a customer concerning the viability of the employer is conducive to the maintenance of the kind of employer-employee relationship that the policy of this Act seeks to foster.

I find and conclude that Fenslau's union activities were not to any degree a motivating factor in the decision not to recall him from layoff and that the decision about him was not unlawful, nor was his hourly rate a motivating factor.

Elmore, the crane operator who handles tons of hot iron, frequently was found sleeping in the elevated cab of the crane and was reprimanded orally at least once for carelessly dropping a load. He, like Fenslau, admitted the theft of valuable parts from the plant and was put on job probation. Moreover, he was suspected by Cappella of having stolen plant equipment on June 30, when he was laid off. He was not a suspected organization leader. He had no prior foundry experience and was employed in the training program.

As in the case of Fenslau, I find and conclude that his card-signing activity and his union support were not to any degree a motivating factor in the decision not to recall him and that the decision was lawful.

Campbell, a job trainee who worked as a "floater" with no specific production job, had an excessive absenteeism problem and received a warning for yelling at other employees. He was implicated by Fenslau in the plant thefts and, according to the police report, admitted his involvement. I find that his minimal protected activity—card signing—was not to any degree a motivating factor in the decision not to recall him and that the decision was lawful.

Elder, also a job trainee with no prior foundry experience, had difficulty following instructions and, partially as a result, received work-related injuries. In addition, he had falsely given as an application reference the name of a friend of Rassey, although he was not known to that person. The failure to recall him was not motivated to any degree by his union support or his activity in distributing cards and the decision was lawful.

Collins, a job trainee employed as a janitor and a card signer but not otherwise active in the campaign, had difficulty performing his assigned work to the satisfaction of Cappella to the point of open disagreement. I find nothing in this record to indicate that the union activity at the plant played any role whatever in the decision not to recall him and that the decision was lawful.

Jenkins, also a job trainee, had received a number of warnings for tardiness, was a slow worker, and openly stated he did not care to work in a foundry. Again, union activity played no role in the decision not to recall him and the decision was lawful.

Spencer, with no foundry experience, was hired at an hourly rate to reconstruct and make repairs to the roof (which in part had fallen in), rather than contracting with an independent roofer to do the work. When not performing roofing work, he was used on various production jobs. He had difficulty working with Curran, who did roofing carpentry work, complained constantly about having to do foundry work or anything less than a total roof replacement. He, like Fenslau, was paid at a higher hourly rate than other production employees and was described by Childers Sr., on June 30, as a suspected ringleader. Like Fenslau, he was not recalled, I find, for reasons having nothing to do with the union activities at the plant or his hourly rate of pay. I find the decision to be lawful.

K. The "Discharge" of Curran on September 10

In support of the allegations of paragraphs 18 to 20 of the complaint (the constructive discharge of Curran for the unlawful purpose of pacifying other employees who perceived favoritism), the General Counsel elicited the testimony of Curran and his wife (a nonemployee). The former testified that he was called to Rassey's office on September 10 where he was handed a three-quarter-inch-thick stack of AVOs (avoid verbal orders) and was asked to sign them to "pacify" some employees who thought him to be receiving special treatment; that he did not read the documents, thought the whole thing to be a joke, "saw red," and threw them back at Rassey, saying, "I'm going to get out of here and do you and me a favor"; that he did not report to work the following morning, but instead returned to Rassey's office with a tape recorder and his wife as a witness; that Rassey again told him all he had to do was to sign the reprimands and everything would be all right; that he suggested to Rassey that he continue to work for him on a contractual basis, to which Rassey agreed; and that he never returned to the plant thereafter, because he thought he was discharged. His wife corroborated his testimony, but contradicted him about the color of the reprimand slips.

For reasons discussed above (see sec. II,H), I am unable to credit the testimony of Curran. In addition, his testimony about the documents simply is untrue: AVOs are not warning slips; they are white and not orange; and an entire pad of AVOs is not three-quarter-inch thick. Under the circumstances here, the testimony of his loyal wife similarly is not credited.

I instead credit the testimony of Cappella, Rassey, and Office Manager Reside. Their testimony was convincing and consistent with undisputed facts relating to Curran's conduct on the job. Reside testified that, as she had done in the case of other employees, she prepared and gave to Rassey nine warning notices based on information obtained from Curran's timecards (failure to punch in or out; reporting late) and one slip based on Curran's unauthorized entry into the office and his rummaging through the Company's accounts receivable files. After overhearing the discussion between Rassey and Curran on September 10, she prepared one last slip, noting that Curran refused to accept the other warnings and "quit 9/10/82." Rassey testified that Curran was called in to discuss his work habits, which were changing for the worse; that Curran refused to look at the warning slips, threw them back at him, and left the office and plant before the end of the shift; that the following morning, he called Curran to inquire about a handsaw (Curran regularly carried both company and personal property on his truck) and Curran stated he would be right down to the plant; that Curran, his wife, and his tape recorder arrived soon after; that Curran admitted getting hot the day before, thinking that Rassey was "coming after me to fire me"; that he never demanded that Curran sign the notices; and Curran suggested they enter into a contractual relationship, to which he agreed.

I find and conclude, based on the credited evidence, that Curran voluntarily quit his employment on September 10 when confronted with undisputed evidence of improper conduct on the job; that Respondent's confronting Curran with such evidence was solely for the purpose of disciplining and counseling an errant employee; and that, in doing so, it was not Respondent's intent to pacify other employees who perceived that Curran was receiving favoritism from Respondent or who were seeking to organize a union. As to these allegations, the General Counsel's contention is a severely strained one, ignoring undisputed evidence of bizarre behavior and flagrant disregard for company rules requiring use of the timeclock and the privacy of company business records. Curran's job was not in jeopardy on September 10. Rather, Respondent was exercising its protected right to manage its business and direct its work force to ensure its continued viability. Curran, for reasons known best to himself, elected not to discuss his refusal/failure to clock in or out on a number of occasions and his unauthorized review of business accounts. This record can support but a single conclusion—that Curran voluntarily quit his employment on September 10—and the allegations must be dismissed.

L. The November 1982 Layoffs

Paragraphs 22 and 31 of the complaint as amended allege the unilateral layoff of seven employees on November 29, 1982, without notice to the Union and without opportunity to bargain, in violation of Section 8(a)(5). The complaint does not allege the layoffs to be discriminatory in violation of Section 8(a)(3).

It is undisputed that Respondent gave no notice to the Union of the layoffs and afforded it no opportunity to bargain over the decision itself or its effects. Of course, the Union had not at that time been certified or recognized as the bargaining agent for the unit employees. Whether Respondent was under a duty to bargain with the Union over the November 29 decision to lay off the seven employees and, if so, whether Respondent initially must reinstate the employees with backpay pending such bargaining are issues considered below in the remedy section of this decision.

M. The Permanent Layoffs of December 8, 1982

Paragraph 21 of the amended complaint alleges that three of the seven employees who were laid off on November 29 were "permanently" laid off on December 8 because of their union activities and, in the case of one, for the additional reason that he threatened to take a vacation pay claim to the Board. Although paragraph 30 of the complaint alleges only a violation of Section 8(a)(4), it is clear from the wording of paragraph 21 that the General Counsel intended to plead also a violation of Section 8(a)(3). However, no 8(a)(5) violation is alleged.

One of those three, Miles, was not called to testify. Another, Kalar, testified that, when originally laid off, it was for "at least 2-3" weeks, but that on December 9 he received a written notice saying his layoff was permanent because there was no foreseeable need for his services, despite the existence of uncompleted work in the pattern shop; that the pattern shop had unsuccessfully tried to make new patterns and finally resorted to purchasing them from suppliers; that new patterns needed adjustment before use; that the level of pattern repair work decreased in the 6 months prior to his layoff; that, in November, he was unsuccessful in making a new pattern for a Chrysler job; that, during a December 8 meeting with Rassey concerning his claim for vacation pay, Rassey took the position that Kalar was ineligible, Kalar said he would call the Board about it and Rassey said, "go ahead"; and that the vacation pay claim was subsequently disallowed by a state agency on grounds of ineligibility. The third employee, Hill, testified that on December 12, Rassey told him he was permanently laid off because Respondent was no longer going to do corework (the work performed by Hill); that several weeks later Rassey called to inquire about the location of the notebook containing formulas for coremaking, so that a "few little jobs" could be done; that in March 1983, he was recalled to perform corework principally; and that his union activity consisted solely of signing a card.

Cappella and Rassey testified without contradiction that Miles was laid off because of a lack of steady work of the kind he performed. As to Hill's corework, both testified that there simply were no cores to be made for the foreseeable future and that Hill ultimately was recalled when work in the core department resumed. As to Kalar, again both testified that patterns for use at the foundry were made outside; that a full-time patternmaker was not needed for the pattern repair work (which could be done part time by others); that, due to a severe decline in sales, there was insufficient work to keep Kalar busy 2 hours a day; that there was no foreseeable work for months; and that business considerations were the only reasons for Kalar's permanent layoff.

For reasons set forth above, I credit the testimony of Rassey and Cappella over that of the employees. Again, it should be noted that the testimony of the employees was based on surmise and speculation, rather than on hard information about the operation of the plant and Respondent's business prospects. On the other hand, the testimony of Rassey and Cappella about to the Company's declining sales stands uncontroverted on this record.

On this record, I find the conclusions to be inescapable: that the three employees were put on permanent layoff status solely for legitimate business reasons, having nothing to do with their union activities or Kalar's vacation pay claim and threat to "call the Board"; that the same decision would have been made irrespective of such employee activity; and that the December 8 decision was not unlawful.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (2) of the Act, Respondent will be directed to cease and desist therefrom and to post an appropriate notice to employees.

Moreover, for reasons set forth below, Respondent will be directed to bargain with the Union on request. On June 28, 1982, when it filed a representation petition, the Union represented a majority (18) of the employees at the plant. By September 1, when Respondent succeeded in "convincing" the employees that they might want their own in-plant committee to represent them rather than the Union, that majority had been lost, with a majority of the employees (18) now voting to reject the Union. Respondent's unlawful conduct during that period has been recited above and need not be repeated here. Moreover, the unit is small and, thus, any antiunion conduct tends to be magnified. Finally, the unlawful conduct touched virtually every employee in the unit. Accordingly, I find and conclude that, due to Respondent's serious and pervasive unfair labor practices, the possibility of ensuring a fair election is slight, and employee sentiment, on balance, would be better protected through a compulsory bargaining order. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969).

The more serious issue, however, is whether that bargaining order should be prospective or retroactive, i.e., whether the purposes of that Act would be served best by ordering reinstatement with backpay of the seven employees laid off in late November for legitimate business reasons, all but three of whom were subsequently recalled (see sec. II,L and M, above), as a prerequisite to decision and/or effects bargaining. This issue was not addressed in the General Counsel's brief.

Since Trading Port, 219 NLRB 298 (1975), when a split Board rejected the prospective bargaining order approach of Steel-Fab, 212 NLRB 363 (1974), it has been Board policy to make Gissel bargaining orders retroactive and each court of appeal that has considered the policy has endorsed it. Alumbaugh Coal Corp. v. NLRB, 635 F.2d 1380 (8th Cir. 1980); Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 305 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied 450 U.S. 996 (1981); Ann Lee Sportswear v. NLRB, 543 F.2d 739 (10th Cir. 1976); and Plumbers Local 669 v. NLRB, 681 F.2d 11 (D.C. Cir. 1982). In Trading Port, bargaining was ordered as of the date of union demand for recognition. If applied here, Trading Port would compel bargaining from a date prior to the November layoffs and would further require the reinstatement of the seven employees with backpay as a condition precedent to such bargaining, because notice and opport;unity to bargain was not given to the Union. This would be so, although the layoffs were not alleged to be violative of Section 8(a)(1) or (3) and were found above to be for purely legitimate business reasons related to a severe and continuing decline in business.

Although strictly bound by Board precedent and policy, I nevertheless am of the opinion that Trading Port was not intended to be applicable to the circumstances of this case for a number of reasons: (1) Here, unlike Trading Port, the Union never evidenced its majority status or made a demand for recognition. The Union had a majority status as of June 28 when it filed its petition, yet did not demand recognition. It made no recognition demand at the time of the initial unfair labor practice charge of July 6, 1982 (layoffs of June 30), even though it specifically claimed in that charge to represent a majority of unit employees at the time. Nor did it seek recognition at the time it filed the second charge (company effort to establish in-plant committee), when it knew it had lost majority status due to Respondent's conduct. Rather, the Union delayed any contract with Respondent until November 19 (almost 5 months after achieving majority status) and then, remarkably, it made a general, pro forma demand, at the request of the General Counsel, only for contract bargaining and not recognition (Jt. Exh. 1). The record thus compels the conclusion that the union letter of November 19 was solely for the purpose of litigative posturing. (2) The June layoffs (and the subsequent recalls) were not violative of Section 8(a)(1), (3), or (4) and were not alleged to be violative of Section 8(a)(5). (3) The November layoffs were not alleged to be unlawful under Section 8(a)(1) or (3) and were found to be dictated solely by legitimate business reasons.

Given the absence of a demand for recognition, the propriety of the June layoffs, the legitimate business reasons for the November layoffs, the precarious nature of Respondent's financial condition resulting from his effort to resurrect a failed business (which is uncontroverted), the uncontroverted evidence of employee Fenslau's efforts to sabotage Respondent's business relationship with a customer, and the possibility that a retroactive bargaining order coupled with a restoration of the status quo might jeopardize the continuing viability of this small business and the remaining jobs, I am of the opinion that the purposes of the Act are best served and the interests of the parties best balanced by the entry of a prospective bargaining order, effective as of the date of this Order.

July 20, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

On October 14, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Donald R. Holley issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs.[1] The Respondent file an answering brief and a brief in support of the decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge concluded that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) when it suspended and discharged Gregory A. Flannery because he wrote and had published an article entitled, "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom." Contrary to the judge, however, for the reasons set out below, we find that the Respondent's actions violated the Act.

The Respondent is an Ohio corporation with an office and place of business in Cincinnati, Ohio. The Respondent publishes and distributes a chain of weekly newspapers in the Cincinnati metropolitan area. Gregory A. Flannery, the Charging Party, was employed as a reporter in the Respondent's editorial department from November 1984 until his discharge on February 2, 1987.

In October 1985 Flannery helped to initiate a union organizing campaign among employees in the Respondent's editorial department. The union campaign culminated in a Board-supervised election in April 1986 in which the editorial department employees voted against union representation by a vote of 24 to 19. The efforts to organize the Respondent's editorial department employees, however, did not end with the April 1986 election. Flannery and other employees formed a committee called "The April '87 Committee," which immediately began efforts to organize the employees leading to an April 1987 election. Toward this goal, in June 1986 Flannery and others mailed to the Respondent's employees an "opinion survey." In July 1986 the results of this survey were mailed to employees and certain members of management. Flannery also passed out prounion "business cards" at the July company picnic, which was attended both by employees and management personnel.

The Respondent was well aware of Flannery's continuing efforts to organize its employees. The uncontroverted evidence reveals that in August 1986 when some literature that had been posted on the employee bulletin board was taken down, Dan Crowe, the Respondent's vice president, spoke with Flannery and asked him how long the union "agitating" was going to continue. Flannery responded that it would continue until April 1987 when another election could be held. Furthermore, in October 1986 Flannery posted on the employee bulletin board a handwritten "Six Month Update," which urged employees to vote for union representation in April 1987. On October 16, 1986, Douglas Sandhage, the Respondent's executive editor, asked Flannery if he had posted the document. Flannery admitted to Sandhage that he had.

In December 1986 an article that Flannery wrote entitled, "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom," was published in The Cincinnati Review of Politics and the Arts.[3] The article, which is reproduced in full in the judge's decision, purports to recount the April 1986 union campaign and the opposition encountered during the drive. Written as an historical review of the union drive, the article discusses the purported antiunion acts of certain of the Respondent's supervisors and employees. Flannery testified, without contradiction, that he gave copies of the published article to fellow employees and talked about using the article as part of the union campaign.

The Respondent first became aware of the article on January 9, 1987. The undisputed testimony reveals that Managing Editor Dennis O'Conner telephoned Sandhage on January 9, 1987, and told him about the article. Although he had not yet seen the article, O'Conner told Sandhage that he considered it libelous. O'Conner obtained a copy of the article at Sandhage's request and gave it to Sandhage who, in turn, contacted Margaret Halva, vice president of personnel for Suburban Communications Corp. On January 12, 1987, Halva began an investigation into the circumstances surrounding the article and, on January 22, 1987, Halva suspended Flannery without pay pending completion of the investigation. Although Halva interviewed employees named in the article and others during her investigation, at no time did she or Sandhage interview Flannery or question him about the article. Based on Halva's recommendation, the Respondent discharged Flannery on February 2, 1987. It is undisputed that the Respondent suspended and discharged Flannery solely because of the article "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom."[4]

[2] We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by maintaining rules 18 and 29. We make clear, however, that the Respondent may adopt rules in which the content of the rules is necessary to the credibility of the institution and/or the quality of its product, and the rules themselves are narrowly tailored, unambiguous, and designate the category of employees to whom the rules are applicable; provided, however, that such rules do not improperly impinge on the relevant rights of the affected employees. See Peerless Publications, 283 NLRB 334 (1987).

The judge concluded that Flannery's publication of "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom" was not concerted activity under Meyers Industries, 281 NLRB 882 (1986), (Meyers II), which defines "concerted" activity for the purpose of determining the existence of certain types of violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The General Counsel has excepted to the judge's decision, inter alia, on the ground that the judge failed to analyze Flannery's discharge under Section 8(a)(3). The General Counsel argues that Flannery's article was "inextricably intertwined" with the ongoing union organizing effort and that his suspension and discharge because of the article thus violated Section 8(a)(3). We find merit in the General Counsel's exception.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees, inter alia, "the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations . . . and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection . . . ." Even though an employee may be acting alone, an employee attempting to form, join, or assist a labor organization is nevertheless protected by Section 7 of the Act. Carpenters Local 925, 279 NLRB 1051, 1055 fn. 40 (1986). In Auto Workers Local 980, 280 NLRB 1378 (1986), we adopted the judge's finding that the employer union violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) when it discharged an employee for providing information about her labor dispute to a newspaper reporter. Implicit in our decision was the conclusion that the employee's action in publicizing her labor dispute was within the scope of activities protected by Section 7. Accord: Operating Engineers Local 139 (AGC of Wisconsin), 273 NLRB 992 (1984), enf. denied on other grounds 796 F.2d 985 (7th Cir. 1986) (publication of a newspaper to question union representatives and persuade the union to change its position is protected by Section 7).[5]

Although the attempts to organize the Respondent's editorial department employees resulted in a Board-supervised election in which the Union was defeated, it is clear both that Flannery and others continued their unionizing efforts and that the Respondent had actual knowledge of those continued efforts. Prounion materials were openly mailed to employees and management, posted on employee bulletin boards, and distributed at the company picnic. Furthermore, the Respondent's knowledge of Flannery's involvement in the ongoing organizing campaign is evidenced by the questioning of Flannery by Crowe and Sandhage in August and October 1986, respectively. Flannery's article, "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom," recounted his version of the union campaign and was plainly one aspect of the continuing efforts to organize. Thus, we conclude that Flannery's writing and publication of "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom" was union activity protected by Section 7 and that a discharge based on it constitutes discrimination in violation of Section 8(a)(3).

The Respondent argues that, even if Flannery's conduct is otherwise within the scope of activities protected by Section 7, Flannery lost the protection of the Act because his article was false or abusive and injured the Respondent's reputation. In NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1229 (Jefferson Standard), 346 U.S. 464 (1953), the Supreme Court held that employees may communicate with third parties in circumstances where the communication is related to an ongoing labor dispute and where the communication is not so disloyal, reckless, or maliciously untrue as to lose the Act's protection. See also Emarco, Inc., 284 NLRB 832 (1987). Applying these standards to the case at bar, we find that Flannery's article was not so disloyal, reckless, or maliciously untrue so as to lose the [4] The Respondent's letter to Flannery, informing him of the Company's decision to discharge him, stated:

> The Company has completed its investigation of your violation of Company Rules 18 and 29:
> 18. Making false, vicious or malicious statements concerning any employee, supervisor, the Company, or its product.
> 29. Unlawful, improper or unseeming conduct on or off the Company premises or during non-working hours which affects the employee's relationship to his/her job, to his/her fellow employees or to his/her supervisors, or affecting the Company's product reputation or goodwill in the community.

Our investigation has revealed that you did, indeed, violate these rules. The seriousness of these violations warrants your immediate discharge. Your suspension of January 22, 1987 is converted to an immediate discharge.

Your discharge under Rules 18 and 29 is based on the following: Your conduct and the article you authored in the Cincinnati Review, injured the reputation, image, integrity and truthfulness of Cincinnati Suburban Press newspapers, its management, and has embarrassed, humiliated and ridiculed your fellow employees.

Your disruptive conduct has impaired employee relationships with fellow employees and our supervisors.

[5] Although the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals denied enforcement to our decision in Operating Engineers Local 139, the court expressly noted that it "would sustain the NLRB's alternative finding that an individual employee engages in concerted activity by taking action to align the union membership with his own position against the union representatives." 796 F.2d at 989.

Act's protection. Although the Respondent argues that Flannery's article was inaccurate, it has failed to show any evidence of malice or recklessness on Flannery's part. The Respondent's mere labeling of Flannery's article as "libelous" or "slanderous" cannot substitute for affirmative evidence of malice.

In contending that Flannery's conduct was unprotected, the Respondent relies heavily on the sentence in Flannery's article that, "One effort at persuasion by executive editor Doug Sandhage would have been laughable had it not indicated an insidious disregard for the truth." The Respondent argues that this language impugned its integrity and the truthfulness of its newspapers. It is clear, however, that the reference to Sandhage in the article related solely to, and was made in the context of, reciting management's opposition to the Union, and it neither disparaged Sandhage's personal integrity or truthfulness with respect to the publication of the newspaper nor disparaged the integrity or truthfulness of the Respondent's products, the publication of a newspaper, generally. In these circumstances, we conclude that Flannery's reference to Sandhage in the article was not such as to forfeit the protection of Section 7. See Emarco, supra, and Richboro Community Mental Health Council, 242 NLRB 1267 (1979).

Furthermore, while substantial evidence was submitted by the parties regarding whether the article accurately revealed the number of "merit increases" Sandhage allegedly claimed the Respondent gave employees in 1985, the judge found that Flannery "sought in his article to state what he honestly believed Sandhage had said to [Flannery] and others about merit increases given in 1985." We also note that the record contains substantial evidence to support Flannery's version of the other disputed factual assertions contained in the article. Although the Board need not determine whether the assertions were, in fact, accurate,[6] this evidence negates the Respondent's contention that the article was "maliciously untrue." Thus, there is no showing that Flannery's article was written with a reckless disregard for the truth or maliciously with a deliberate intent to damage the Respondent. Nor can we find that the article, in the context of an ongoing union campaign, was so disloyal as to remove Flannery's conduct from the Act's protection.

Having found that Flannery was engaged in protected union activity under Section 7 of the Act when he wrote and had published the article "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom," we conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) when it suspended Flannery on January 22, 1987, and discharged him on February 2, 1987, for having written the article.[7]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Cincinnati Suburban Press, Inc., a Subsidiary of Suburban Communications Corp., Cincinnati, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Suspending, discharging, or otherwise discriminating against any employee for engaging in protected union activity.

(b) Distributing, maintaining in effect, or enforcing company rule 18 involving the making or publishing of "false" statements.

(c) Distributing, maintaining in effect, or enforcing company rule 29 involving prohibition of "improper" or "unseeming" employee conduct on and off company premises.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Gregory A. Flannery immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him, with interest.[8]

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful suspension and discharge and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the suspension and discharge will not be used against him in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

[6] See, e.g., Professional Porter & Window Cleaning Co., 263 NLRB 136, 139 fn. 12 (1982).

[7] In light of our disposition of this case, we do not pass upon the judge's analysis under Meyers II. Similarly, we find it unnecessary to pass on the General Counsel's other contentions that Flannery's suspension and discharge were unlawful.

The General Counsel requests a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[8] Backpay for the unlawful suspension and discharge shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed as prescribed in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987).

(d) Withdraw and abolish its company rule 18 involving the making or publishing of "false" statements.

(e) Withdraw and abolish its company rule 29 involving prohibition of "improper" or "unseeming" employee conduct on and off company premises.

(f) Post at its East and West Cincinnati, Ohio facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[9] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DONALD R. HOLLEY, Administrative Law Judge. On an original charge filed in Case 9-CA-23931 on 23 January 1987[1] by Gregory A. Flannery, and amended charges filed by the same individual on 23 and 26 February, the Regional Director for Region 9 of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint on 9 March, which alleged, in substance, that Cincinnati Suburban Press, Inc., a Subsidiary of Suburban Communications Corporation (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by suspending Flannery on 22 January, discharging him on 2 February, and promulgating and maintaining, since 23 August 1986, two invalid company rules. Respondent filed timely answer to complaint denying it had engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged.

The case was heard in Cincinnati, Ohio, on 30 April. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to participate. On the entire record, including the posthearing briefs filed by the parties, and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, an Ohio corporation, with an office and place of business in Cincinnati, Ohio, is engaged in the publication, circulation, and distribution of a chain of weekly newspapers in the Cincinnati, Ohio metropolitan area. During the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint, it derived gross revenues from the conduct of the above-described business in an amount exceeding $200,000, held membership in or subscribed to various interstate news services, and advertised various nationally sold products, including Marlboro cigarettes and Owens-Corning fiberglass. It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION

It is admitted, and I find, that the Newspaper Guild (the Union and/or the Guild) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Facts

The facts concerning events that gave rise to this proceeding are, for the most part, not in dispute.

The Cincinnati Suburban Press, Inc. is one of seven subsidiaries of Suburban Communications Corporation (SCC). It commenced business in the Greater Cincinnati, Ohio area in 1972, when it purchased weekly community newspapers that were already established. Since then, it has acquired additional established weekly community newspapers and created others. At the time of the hearing, it published 19 weekly community newspapers, shoppers (advertising for retail concerns), and Reds Vue, a tabloid that focuses on the activities of the Cincinnati Reds baseball team.[2] Its circulation approximates 260,000, and some 6000 advertisers utilize the papers.

During 1985, the Guild attempted to organize certain employees in Respondent's editorial department. Although Respondent employs approximately 200 employees in its Cincinnati operations, only approximately 40 work in its editorial department. Those employees who work in the east division office located in the Mt. Carmel section of Cincinnati and in its west division located in the Monford Heights area are involved in this proceeding.

The record reveals that alleged discriminatee Gregory Flanner was one of the employees who originally contacted the Guild in 1985 regarding representation for editorial department employees. Flannery, a reporter in the west division office, solicited for the Union during the 1985 campaign, wrote and distributed literature for the Union, and acted as the Union's observer at an NLRB-supervised election held on 10 April 1986. The Union lost the election 24 to 19.

Flannery's testimony in the instant proceeding reveals the Union's failure to win the 1986 election did not cause him to abandon his efforts to obtain representation for Respondent's editorial employees. Subsequent to the election, he and a segment of those employees formed what they called the April '87 committee, which immediately commenced efforts to cause employees to vote for union representation when a second election could be held in April 1987. Thus, in June 1986, Flannery and another employee prepared and mailed to the homes of editorial department employees a survey, which sought employee responses to inquiries concerning their satisfaction with their pay, other conditions of employment, and the actions of management. In late July, the results of the survey were mailed to Respondent management. Subsequently, Flannery attended a company picnic in late July and distributed business-type cards that urged employees to obtain union representation if they wanted better pay and a better deal.[3] Thereafter, in October 1986, Flannery prepared and posted on Respondent's employee bulletin board a document entitled "SIX-MONTH UPDATE." In the document, he alleged that certain nonbargaining unit employees had received promotions, that others received better vacation pay, and he observed editorial department employees had received nothing but more work. The so-called update, espoused the need for union representation.[4] With respect to his literature-posting activities, Flannery testified that when he questioned Doug Sandhage, executive editor, and Dan Crowe, a Respondent vice president, about literature that had been removed from the bulletin board in August, Crowe asked him how long the literature posting and agitating for the Union was going to continue. Flannery replied it would continue until they could have another election in April 1987.[5]

Respondent's employee handbook reveals it opposes union representation of its employees. Moreover, during the 1985 union campaign, the editorial staff was divided on the issue of representation, and a number of antiunion employees actively campaigned against representation by the Guild.[6]

In December 1986, Flannery composed an article entitled, "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom," which was published in late December in a quarterly periodical named The Cincinnati Review. Although the record fails to reveal precisely how or to what extent The Cincinnati Review is circulated in the Cincinnati area, it does reveal it is available at bookstores. It is undisputed that Flannery's submission of the "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom" eventually caused Respondent to suspend him on 22 January 1987 and discharge him on 2 February 1987. Consequently, the article is quoted in its entirety below:[7]

IN RESEARCHING A STORY on the occult in Cincinnati, I once asked the high priestess of a witches' coven for an interview. She said, "I was told never to trust reporters." But I got the interview after praising the advice of her counselors.

Now that I have tried (and failed) to unionize a newsroom, I have a deeper respect for the witch's warning.

Last winter I chaired a campaign to elect the Cincinnati Newspaper Guild bargaining agent for the 43 editorial employees of Cincinnati Suburban Press. The company publishes 19 weekly newspapers. We expected strong opposition from management. But we did not expect dirty tricks from fellow reporters.

When we filed election petitions with the National Labor Relations Board in January, 65 percent of our staff had signed union membership cards. Yet when NLRB agents counted the ballots on April 10, we lost by five votes.

What made the difference? Part of the staff was swayed by an environment of distrust that resulted from tactics our editors would have decried had they been used in a political campaign: phony letters. Spying. Cover-up.

Six weeks before the election, we realized the union organizing committee had a leak. Someone was feeding information to management. One of our late-night discussions about the union's constitution appeared in printed form as an anti-union leaflet distributed by the company—on the very day after we had met.

Literature from the Cincinnati chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists (SDX) was falsified and distributed to the staff; that is, someone doctored an SDX membership application, inserting the admonition, "There are several ways to become a professional journalist—joining the Guild isn't among them." Virginia Watson Rouslin, journalism teacher at the University of Cincinnati and president of the SDX Chapter, said the application was falsified. SDX has no position on the Guild.

A phony record of minutes from a meeting of the Guild was posted in the editorial offices. This deception was not so clever as the SDX job. Guild president Paul Furiga recognized the forgery immediately; its author had used the wrong stationery.

Adherence to fact is the core of journalistic integrity, yet two staff members kept silent when factual errors were used to management's advantage. Dan Crowe, vice president and general manager of Cincinnati Suburban Press, claimed in a speech that the company had never laid off any employees. But shortly after the election, photographer Mark Bowen, leader of the anti-union campaign, said he was one of two longtime employees once laid off by the company. Bowen said he didn't tell his colleagues because the disclosure might have lost votes for his side. Bowen was named the company's "Journalist of the Year" for 1985.

Open and free discussion is the ideal of the American press, yet we found ourselves struggling just to be heard in the newsroom. Pro-union literature, posted with the explicit permission of management, disappeared from the employees' bulletin board.

Even a notice from the NLRB announcing voting procedures was defaced. The bifurcated way this incident became known illustrates the atmosphere in our two newsrooms (East and West divisions) at the time of the election. Amy Williams, a copy editor in the company's West division, saw that someone had marked an "X" in the "no" box on a sample ballot. The notice containing the ballot, posted in compliance with federal law, contained a warning against marking the ballot. Williams and I worked in the same office, but because there could be so little open exchange of information, I learned that the ballot had been defaced only after she called her husband Joel Williams, a copy editor in the East division, who then told reporter Jane Kammer Habig, a member of the organizing committee, who in turned phoned me.

Front-line supervisors opposed the union, but with no small amount of distaste for the task. Anti-union journalists, on the other hand, ostracized the few friends the Guild had left in the West division, making it difficult to discuss the union or even to point out destructions of government property by members of the staff.

The most striking ploy by the anti-union campaign was worthy of Chicago's electoral legends. The dead didn't try to vote, but columnist Terry Gingrich did. Gingrich didn't work in either of our newsrooms. Since NLRB regulations only allowed office employees to participate, Gingrich's ballot was invalidated, with the consent of the company's attorney.[1]

The level of argument presented by those opposed to the Guild did not always indicate thorough going research or critical analysis. Still, it sufficed. Reporter Joe Jacobs, for example, fretted that contract negotiations would lead to the loss of Nerf-basketball in the newsroom.

REPORTER STAN KLEINE, who helped initiate contact with the Guild, had a change of heart during the campaign. We found out the hard way, when Kleine started wearing a handmade label button with the message, "CBS." His translation: "Collective bargaining sucks."

That's not the kind of argument that lends itself to examination of labor law or analysis of economic history. Nor did the tactics of the oppostion [sic] reflect the toleration and ethical restraint one would expect in a newsroom.

Granted, different aims govern the actions of a reporter on the beat and a union foe at the office. But persuasion that distracts from the issue, or depends on falsified literature, or is founded on information obtained through breach of confidence, is morally indistinguishable from the deception and evasion for which journalists sometimes criticize public officials.

> In addition to the insurgent anti-union effort waged by co-workers, management used a heavy hand in defeating the Guild. The staff was divided into four groups compelled to attend anti-union harangues by company attorneys at local hotels. Literature of dubious veracity was mailed to employees' homes, placed on their desks and posted on office bulletin boards.
> One effort at persuasion by executive editor Doug Sandhage would have been laughable had it not indicated an insidious disregard for the truth. In January, Sandhage confided to me that CSPI had given 20 merit raises to editorial employees in 1985. Later the same day he told another reporter the company had given 12 merit raises last year. To still another reporter Sandhage said 11 merit raises had been given.
> As the campaign heated up, several reporters and copy editors were given "merit" raises, combined with a stiff dose of propaganda. When the NLRB inquired, Sandhage went back to those reporters and copy editors to make a clarification: They had received "adjustments," not merit raises, he said, and the company didn't give merit raises.
> If duplicity and sneaking about marked the employees' efforts to thwart the Guild, bullying characterized management's efforts. Jane Kammer Habig, a member of the organizing committee, had her hours cut by one-third. I was placed on probation—an action rescinded after the NLRB issued a complaint against the company. Lynn Ratterman, a West division reporter, was fired the day after she signed a union membership card; the NLRB investigated but did not issue a complaint since she was a probationary employee.
> QUESTIONS ABOUT PRESS CREDIBILITY usually dwell on ideological bias, but there is another issue. What is sometimes lacking in contemporary journalism is commitment to a rigorous methodology in the pursuit and dissemination of truth. A recent edition of the Quill, published by SDX, asked if journalism schools adequately train students in the practice of skepticism. An equally important question is whether journalists are sufficiently trained in the art of fair play.

Although the record reveals Flannery obtained some of the alleged facts set forth in the above-described article from other employees, it is clear he composed the article without consulting with any of his fellow employees. He testified the audiences he was attempting to reach through the article were his fellow employees and other labor supporters in town. After the article was published, Flannery distributed approximately five copies of it to his fellow employees, and he gave copies to Guild members who work at the Post and Enquirer, two Cincinnati daily newspapers.[8] He testified he engaged in that activity as part of an effort to demonstrate the need for a union at Respondent. Additionally, Flannery testified that at a meeting held at employee Jim Broderick's house on 21 January there was discussion of possible use of the article as background information on the ongoing union campaign for the Guild. Broderick corroborated his testimony concerning the meeting.

Respondent management learned of the existence of the above-described article on 9 January. After Doug Sandhage, Respondent's executive editor who oversees both the east and the west divisions read the article, he contacted Margaret Halva, SCC vice president of personnel, indicating he felt Flannery should be fired for referring to him in the article as one who has an insidious disregard for the truth. Halva, in turn, contacted John Reddy, an SCC vice president who was then acting general manager of Respondent's Cincinnati operation. Reddy instructed Halva to conduct an investigation to ascertain the facts and circumstances surrounding the article and its impact on their operation.

While Halva testified she started receiving calls from employees about Flannery's article during the week of 12 January, the record fails to reveal that any of the employees named in the article were aware of it until around the third week in January. Apparently, employee Joe Jacobs was the first employee named in the article to actually read it. He testified that during the third week in January his immediate supervisor, Dick Maloney, called him to indicate he was going to come to his home with something he would not be happy about. Maloney subsequently took a copy of the article to Jacobs' home and the employee read it. He reacted by refraining from talking to Flannery for about a week and keeping discussions with Flannery on a professional level thereafter.[9] Similarly, Mark Bowen, a photographer who was assigned to Respondent's west division, testified he became aware of Flannery's article when Allison Smith, the associate editor in the west division office, provided him with a copy. Bowen testified he reacted by telling Allison, Doug Hubbuch, managing editor of the west division, and Sandhage that the portion of the article related to him was a lie and was misleading.[10] Bowen, whose desk was near Flannery's, requested and received Sandhage's permission to move his desk to the far side of the west division office. Additionally, he was informed he would not be required to accompany Flannery on assignments; that he could travel independently if Flannery required.

Halva indicated during her testimony that she discussed the Flannery article with Sandhage, Hubbuch, Smith, and Flannery's immediate supervisor, Laura Hobbs, during the period extending from 12 to 22 January. She claims she ascertained through such discussions that there was considerable disruption in the newsroom of the west division office[11] and, for that reason, she recommended to Reddy on Monday, 19 January, that Flannery be suspended.

[8] The parties stipulated that on 27 April 1987 the assistant managing editor of the Cincinnati Post saw a copy of Flannery's article posted on the Guild bulletin board at her paper.

[9] Jacobs admittedly made the remark concerning Nerf-basketball attributed to him in the article.

[10] Bowen indicated he was selected journalist of the year in 1985 before the union campaign began and Flannery's phraseology in the article erroneously made it appear he was rewarded because he was antiunion.

In Reddy's absence, Halva suspended Flannery on 22 January. At that time, she handed him a suspension letter that had been prepared at Reddy's direction and a list of items that were to be investigated to determine the discipline to be imposed on him.[12] The letter indicated Flannery was to be suspended pending completion of an investigation in regard to his violation of the following company rules:

> 18. Making false, vicious or malicious statements concerning any employee, supervisor, the Company, or its product.
> 29. Unlawful, improper or unseeming conduct on or off the Company premises or during non-working hours which affects the employee's relationship to his/her job, to his/her fellow employees or to his/her supervisors, or affecting the Company's product reputation or goodwill in the community.

The above-described suspension letter indicated the following list of matters would be considered by Respondent in its investigation:

> 1. Disloyalty
> 2. Adverse impact on image of CSPI.
> 3. Allegation—Managements insidious disregard for the truth.
> 4. Creation of dissention and disruption.
> 5. Attitude and conduct
> 6. Adverse effect on newspapers reputation.
> 7. Adverse effect on integrity of newspaper.
> 8. Malicious and vicious statements.
> 9. Violation of ethical standards associated with journalistic responsibilities.
> 10. Bringing into question the truthfulness of the newspapers publications.
> Your article in Cincinnati Review, your conduct with employees and supervision.

On Tuesday, 20 January, Halva continued her investigation of the Flannery matter by interviewing persons mentioned in the article.[13] Sandhage testified he told Halva, and Reddy as well, that the portion of Flannery's article related to him contained errors and was untrue;[14] that he felt the article went against every grain of everything they had ever taught Flannery; and that he thought something should be done about it.[15] Jacobs testified he told Halva he was disappointed, shocked, and outraged when he read the article as it portrayed him as an idiot. He added he expressed concern that the comments in the article might damage him professionally. The record fails to reveal what Supervisors Kleine and Williams and employee Bowen discussed with Halva when she interviewed them.[16]

After discussing Flannery's article with the persons named in it, Halva caused Personnel Administrator Hamilton to ascertain whether Flannery had signed off on and had thereby indicated that he was aware of the Company's rules, its editorial policy, its ethics policy, and his job description.[17] It is undisputed that Flannery was familiar with the Company's rules, policies, and his job description.[18] Similarly, it is uncontested that Flannery attended several libel seminars while employed by Respondent, and he was thus familiar with the subject.

On 2 February, Flannery was terminated by a letter from Reddy, the body of which states:[19]

> The Company has completed its investigation of your violation of Company Rules 18 and 29.
> 18. Making false, vicious or malicious statements concerning any employee, supervisor, the Company, or its product.
> 29. Unlawful, improper or unseeming conduct on or off the Company premises or during non-working hours which affects the employee's relationship to his/her job, to his/her fellow employees or to his/her supervisors, or affecting the Company's product reputation or goodwill in the community.
> Our investigation has revealed that you did, indeed, violate these rules. The seriousness of these violations warrants your immediate discharge. Your suspension of January 22, 1987 is converted to an immediate discharge.
> Your discharge under Rules 18 and 29 is based on the following:

[11] No evidence that would reveal production was affected was offered by Respondent.

[12] G.C. Exh. 8.

[13] Although Halva testified the employees voluntarily came to the office to see her, but the record reveals they were summoned to appear.

[14] Flannery admitted he mistakenly placed his conversation with Sandhage concerning merit increases as having occurred in January 1985, when it actually occurred in December 1986.

[15] Respondent placed accrediting evidence, in the form of handwritten documents that revealed merit increases, pay adjustments, and probationary increases given to employees during 1985 and the first quarter of 1986, in the record as its Exhibits 11 and 12 to support Sandhage's claim that he, as a member of Respondent's salary administration committee, would not have told Flannery or others in 1985 that differing numbers of merit increases had been given. Flannery testified Sandhage told him 20 merit increases had been given in 1985, but he later stated, in a conversation he had with Donna Pazdera Conner, that 12 had been given in 1985. As a rebuttal witness, Jane Habig credibly testified Sandhage told her in late December 1985 that 11 merit increases had been given and he was giving her a 30-cent merit increase effective immediately. She credibly testified her increase was delayed until January 1986, and that Sandhage called her to the office at that time to tell her the increase was a pay adjustment rather than a merit increase. Flannery and Habig were credible witnesses and I believe them. I am convinced Flannery sought in his article to state what he honestly believed Sandhage had said to him and others about merit increases given in 1985.

[16] Halva testified reporter Jenny Key and receptionist Ruthie Day approached her to discuss office reaction to the article at some unstated time.

[17] Sandhage summarized Respondent's editorial and/or news policy indicating it is that Respondent will be a local newspaper, will be authoritative, and will be trustworthy and honest. He testified the ethics policy requires that employees be objective, truthful, fair, and balanced when reporting news.

[18] The reporter job description requires that reporters "maintain a positive public relations image for the newspapers." See R. Exh. 7.

[19] G.C. Exh. 9.

> Your conduct and the article you authored in the Cincinnati Review, injured the reputation, image, integrity and truthfulness of Cincinnati Suburban Press newspapers, its management, and has embarrassed, humiliated and ridiculed your fellow employees.
> Your disruptive conduct has impaired employee relationships with fellow employees and our supervisors.

The parties stipulated that Supervisor James Sulkin was terminated for violating company rules 18 and 29 in January 1986 because work stopped on an occasion when he agreed vocally with an employee that a union was needed at Respondent. Additionally, Halva testified an executive in another subsidiary of SCC was terminated pursuant to rules 18 and 29 because he uttered a slanderous remark.

Analysis and Conclusions

To sustain the complaint allegation that Flannery was suspended and thereafter terminated by Respondent because he engaged in protected concerted activity, the General Counsel's evidentiary burden was to prove: (1) that Flannery engaged in "concerted" activity; (2) that the activity was protected; (3) that Respondent was aware of the concerted nature of the activity; and (4) that Respondent suspended and thereafter discharged Flannery because he engaged in protected activity.

Obviously, a threshold issue in this case is whether Flannery engaged in "concerted" activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act when he prepared "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom." Although the record reveals he obtained information set forth in the article from other employees, it is clear he did not discuss his intention to write and publish the article with other employees before he acted. Notwithstanding the fact that he alone prepared and caused the article to be published, the General Counsel contends his activity was "concerted" as it constituted a continuation of the organizational activity he and other employees were engaged in immediately prior to the time the article was written and published.

Emphasizing the fact that Flannery prepared the article without first discussing it, or revealing his intention to write it, with other employees, Respondent contends Flannery's activity was not "concerted." It further contends the activity under consideration was divorced from the organization campaign then in progress as the article made no reference whatsoever to an ongoing union campaign. It contends the article merely constituted an anatomy of a union campaign, which had occurred some 9 months before the article was written and published.

The Board's broad definition of "concerted activity" is set forth in Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493, 497 (1984) (Meyers I). There it stated:

> In general, to find an employee's activity to be "concerted," we shall require that it be engaged in with, or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself.

The above definition was restated and futher explained in Meyers Industries, 281 NLRB 882, 887 (1986) (Meyers II). There the Board observed:

> We reiterate, our definition of concerted activity in Meyers I encompasses those circumstances where individual employees seek to initiate or to induce or to prepare for group action, as well as individual employees bringing truly group complaints to the attention of management.

Applying the foregoing principles to the facts in the instant case, I find the General Counsel has failed to prove that Flannery engaged in "concerted activity" when he wrote "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom." To establish that the activity was concerted, the General Counsel was obligated to prove that: (1) the activity was undertaken "with, or on the authority of other employees" (Meyers I); or (2) that, by engaging in the activity, the employees sought to "initiate or to induce or to prepare for group action" (Meyers II). Noting the facts, supra, reveal Flannery did not discuss the content of his article, or his intention to write it, with other employees before it was prepared and published, I am precluded from finding Flannery's activity was engaged in "with, or on the authority of other employees."

Similarly, in my view, the facts in this case do not warrant a finding that the article under consideration was written to "initiate or to induce or to prepare for group action." The General Counsel's principal contention is that the testimony and evidence, which reveal Flannery was engaged in an ongoing organization campaign with other employees, adequately placed Respondent on notice of the fact that his composition of the "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom" constitute concerted activity. Noting the article makes absolutely no reference to an ongoing union campaign, I find it failed to place Respondent on notice that the article was part and parcel of the ongoing union campaign. Second, the General Counsel adduced what I consider to be subjective testimony, which was to the effect that: Flannery intended to gain the support of outside union supporters and employees in the ongoing campaign by composing the article; copies of the article were distributed to employees after it was published; and, when the article was produced at the 21 January employee meeting, there was discussion concerning possible use of the article as background in the ongoing organizational campaign. I attach minimal significance to such subjective testimony because the record clearly fails to reveal Flannery's reasons for composing the article were known by Respondent, and it fails to reveal Respondent was aware that copies of the article had been distributed among employees or that the article had been discussed at a meeting of employees. In the final analysis, I, in agreement with Respondent, conclude that, in the circumstances of this case, the content of the article must be viewed to determine whether it was intended to "initiate or induce or prepare for group action." Clearly, the article, which fails to request or suggest that persons who read it should take any action whatsoever, fails to reveal it was composed or published to "initiate or induce or prepare for group action."

In sum, for the reasons stated, I find that the General Counsel has failed to prove that Flannery was engaged in concerted activity when he wrote and published "Dirty Tricks in the Newsroom." Additionally, I find the record fails to reveal that Respondent was aware, at the time it suspended and subsequently discharged Flannery, that he was engaged in concerted activity when he wrote and/or published the article under discussion. In the circumstances described, Respondent did not violate the Act as alleged by suspending and thereafter terminating Flannery because he wrote the article. Accordingly, I recommend that those portions of the complaint that allege the employee was suspended and discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) be dismissed.

Remaining is resolution of the issues raised by paragraph 5 of the complaint. There, the General Counsel alleges that by promulgating and maintaining rules 18 and 29 since August 23, 1986, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The record, specifically Flannery's testimony, reveals rules 18 and 29 have been set forth in Respondent's employee handbook since at least November 1984. As it is clear the rules were promulgated far beyond the 10(b) period, the promulgation allegation is without merit.[20]

As noted above, the rules under discussion are contained in Respondent's employee handbook, which is given to employees when they are hired. They prohibit employees from:

> 18. Making false, vicious or malicious statements concerning any employee, supervisor, the Company, or its product.
> 29. Unlawful, improper or unseeming conduct on or off the Company premises or during non-working hours which affects the employee's relationship to his/her job, to his/her fellow employees or to his/her supervisors, or affecting the Company's product reputation or goodwill in the community.

In support of the contention that rule 18 was unlawfully maintained, the General Counsel cites American Cast Iron Pipe Co., 234 NLRB 1123 (1978), enfd. 600 F.2d 132 (8th Cir. 1979), and Spartan Plastics, 269 NLRB 546, 552 (1984). In American Cast Iron, the Board considered the legality of three (3) rules: (1) rule 27, which prohibited distribution on company property of any "written or printed matter of any description not in the performance of company business without Company permission"; (2) rule 29, which prohibited "Making false, vicious or malicious verbal statements concerning any employee, the Company or its products and methods of manufacture"; and, (3) rule 30, which prohibited "Distribution of false, vicious or malicious written statements about any employee, the Company, its products or methods of manufacture on Company property." The Board affirmed without comment, Judge Leiner's finding that rules 29 and 30 were unlawful per se because they prohibited and punished the merely "false," as opposed to the "vicious or malicious," and were therefore overbroad.

When enforcing the Board's Order in American Cast Iron, the Eighth Circuit stated, "We agree with the Board that the major flaw in both rules (29 and 30) is that they proscribe 'false' as well as 'vicious or malicious' statements." The court then observed (at 137):

> It is well-established that, while employers may proscribe "maliciously false" statements, employers may not proscribe and punish for publication of "false" statements. Texaco, Inc. v. NLRB, 462 F.2d 812, 815 (3d Cir.), cert denied, 409 U.S. 1008, 93 S.Ct. 442, 34 L.Ed.2d 302 (1972); Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp. v. NLRB, 407 F.2d 1357, 1366 (4th Cir. 1969). Punishing employees for distributing merely "false" statements fails to define the area of permissible conduct in a manner clear to employees and thus causes employees to refrain from engaging in protected activities.

In the instant case, Respondent's rule 18 is substantially identical to rule 29, which was considered by the Board and the court in American Cast Iron. It is unlawful, as alleged, for the reasons set forth above.

In my view, the court's reasoning in American Cast Iron applies with equal force to Respondent's rule 29. By prohibiting improper or unseeming" conduct on and off the company premises, the rule fails to define the area of permissible conduct in a manner clear to employees. Viewing Respondent's actions in the instant case, which presented a close "concerted" activity issue, employees may reasonably assume that Respondent may utilize rule 29 to punish them for engaging in lawful protected concerted activity in the future because it considers such activity to be "improper or unseeming." Thus, rule 29 may well cause employees to refrain from engaging in protected activities.

In sum, I find, for the reasons indicated, that, by maintaining rules 18 and 29 since 23 August 1986, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Cincinnati Suburban Press, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Guild is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By maintaining rules that prohibit employees from making "false" statements or engaging in "improper" or "unseeming" conduct on and off company premises without clearly defining areas of permissible conduct in a manner clear to employees, Respondent caused and is causing employees to refrain from engaging in protected activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by suspending Gregory Flannery on 22 January 1987, or by terminating his employment on 2 February 1987.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

---

[20] At some earlier time, rule 29 was apparently numbered rule 31 in the employee handbook, but the text has not varied.

The General Counsel requests that a visitatorial clause be included in any order issued in this case. Compliance with the order in this case will pose no complicated problems. Accordingly, the request is denied.

July 20, 1988

ORDER DENYING MOTION TO DISMISS AND REMANDING PROCEEDING

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On September 23, 1986, Administrative Law Judge Gerald A. Wacknov issued his decision in this proceeding[2] finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to bargain in good faith with the Union regarding the terms of a successor collective-bargaining agreement, by unilaterally discontinuing provisions of the expired collective-bargaining agreement, and by placing contract proposals into effect prior to an impasse in bargaining. Subsequently, the Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and an answering brief.

Thereafter, on June 23, 1987, the Respondent filed a motion to dismiss the complaint in this case based on the Board's decision in John Deklewa & Sons, Inc.,[3] which issued after the judge's decision and after the exceptions had been filed in this case.[4] On July 7, 1987, the General Counsel filed an opposition to the Respondent's motion.

On October 30, 1987, the Board issued a Notice to Parties of Opportunity to Submit Statements of Position. The notice invited the parties[5] to address the following issues raised by Deklewa, but not discussed or decided there:

1. May construction industry bargaining relationships that originated prior to the effective date of the 1959 amendments to the Act and that have thereafter continued without interruption be presumed to be other than Section 9 relationships under the holdings of John Deklewa & Sons, supra?
2. In determining the current status of a construction industry bargaining relationship that originated prior to the 1959 amendments, is it necessary to consider whether the relationship was lawful at the outset?
3. Would the Board be barred by Section 10(b), as construed in Machinists Local 1424 v. NLRB (Bryan Mfg. Co.), 362 U.S. 411 (1960), from making a determination regarding the lawfulness of pre-1959 events?
4. What record evidence, if any, pertaining to the initial or continuing aspects of recognition is necessary to establish a Section 9 relationship when the recognition predated 1959? The parties should specifically address the record evidence in this case and raise any additional relevant evidence which might warrant a remand.

Subsequently, the Respondent, the General Counsel, the Rocky Mountain Chapter of the Associated Builders and Contractors, Inc., Associated Builders and Contractors of Wyoming, Inc., the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, the AFL-CIO's Building and Construction Trades Department, and the Associated General Contractors of America, filed briefs and statements of position.

The record reveals the following relevant facts. The Respondent is engaged in the construction industry as an asphalt paver and in the sand and gravel business. The Respondent and the Union had a collective-bargaining relationship for more than 30 years, the origins of which predated the enactment of Section 8(f) of the Act in 1959. The parties' latest contract expired on June 30, 1985,[6] and the Respondent gave proper notice to the Union in April that the Respondent wished to terminate the agreement. Negotiations for a new contract commenced on June 7, and the parties met on 10 occasions through October 21 without reaching an agreement.

The Respondent's contract proposals sought to delete or change substantially virtually every significant provision of the expired contract. In response to the lack of progress in negotiations, the Union began a strike on July 3. On that same date the Respondent advised the Union that it would begin hiring permanent replacements, would stop enforcing the union-security provision of the expired contract, and, because there was an impasse in bargaining, would implement its last wage offer made to the Union. The Union replied that even though there was a strike, there was no impasse, and the Union expected to continue negotiating with the Respondent.

By letter dated July 9, the Respondent advised the Union that it intended to implement for returning strikers and replacement employees its proposals pertaining to subcontracting, hours of work, and overtime, and that all employees would be covered under the Respondent's health and welfare and deferred compensation plan. The Respondent presented its final proposal at the bargaining session on July 19, and on July 23 the Respondent notified the Union that the various proposals had been implemented. The Union was still on strike at the time of the hearing in this case.

Analyzing the evidence pursuant to principles evolved under Sections 9(a), 8(d), and 8(a)(5) of the Act, without reference to Section 8(f)'s provisions for construction industry collective-bargaining relationships, the judge found that throughout the negotiations the Respondent insisted on proposals which it knew would not be accepted by the Union, and which ensured the futility of bargaining. Accordingly, the judge concluded that the Respondent failed to bargain in good faith, unlawfully made unilateral changes in employees' terms and conditions of employment, and that the employees' strike was an unfair labor practice strike.

Positions of the Parties

The General Counsel contends that the Board should presume irrebuttably that construction industry bargaining relationships which started before the effective date of the 1959 amendments to the Act and which have continued without interruption are governed by Section 9(a) of the Act, and therefore the Respondent was obligated to bargain in good faith with the Union over the terms of a successor contract. The General Counsel adds that because the relationship in question here predates the enactment of Section 8(f), it was at its inception either a lawful 9(a) relationship or an unlawful relationship under Section 8(a)(2) of the Act. The General Counsel submits that the Board should conclude that the Respondent recognized the Union under Section 9(a) as the majority representative of the unit employees because the law presumes that parties act lawfully. Further, the General Counsel argues that Congress intended that Section 8(f) would operate prospectively only, and therefore relationships established before Section 8(f)'s enactment cannot be regarded as relationships protected by Section 8(f). Alternatively, the General Counsel asserts that, even if Section 8(f) had retroactive effect, that retroactivity was necessary to shelter nonmajority bargaining relationships only for the 6 months preceding Section 8(f)'s enactment because of Section 10(b). Accordingly, the General Counsel argues that the legality of the relationship at issue here stems from Section 9 and is shielded by Section 10(b). In any event, the General Counsel contends that Section 10(b) of the Act bars the Respondent from asserting that the relationship was an unlawful 8(a)(2) agreement at its inception.

In agreement with the General Counsel, the AFL-CIO and its Building and Construction Trades Department urge that collective-bargaining relationships in the construction industry which have existed continuously since before the enactment of Section 8(f) should be treated in the same manner as relationships in industries not covered by Section 8(f). Accordingly, the AFL-CIO argues that because Section 9(a) is applicable to the parties' relationship, there was a presumption of majority support on the expiration of the last collective-bargaining agreement, which is rebuttable by showing relevant circumstances existing at that time, but not by inquiry into events concerning the legality of the inception of the relationship.

The Respondent contends that under Deklewa, supra, construction industry bargaining relationships which originated prior to the enactment of Section 8(f) and which have continued uninterrupted may not be presumed to be 9(a) relationships, and that to establish a 9(a) relationship here the General Counsel must show that the Union was certified as a result of a Board election or at least that voluntary recognition was based on a card check. In this regard, the Respondent asserts that there is available evidence which demonstrates that its relationship with the Union was a voluntary prehire agreement as contemplated by Section 8(f). Further, the Respondent argues that in determining the current status of a construction industry bargaining relationship that began prior to the 1959 amendments, it is unnecessary to consider whether the relationship was lawful at the outset because, by Section 8(f), Congress intended to legalize all such relationships. Thus, the Respondent submits that Section 10(b) is not applicable here. In any event, the Respondent contends that it is not necessary to determine the status of pre-1959 construction industry bargaining relationships in this case because the Respondent did not agree to a contract containing a union-security clause or a recognition clause until 1966.

The Rocky Mountain Chapter of the Associated Builders and Contractors, Inc., the Associated Builders and Contractors of Wyoming, Inc., and the Associated General Contractors of America contend that both Deklewa and the legislative history of Section 8(f) demonstrate that there is no logical or factual basis for presuming that a bargaining relationship initiated in the construction industry before 1959 is or was a 9(a) relationship. Instead, these amici argue that the Board must presume that an agreement between a construction industry employer and a union is an 8(f) agreement and that this presumption is rebuttable only by evidence of Board certification or recognition by the employer concurrent with a showing that the union has majority support.

Discussion and Conclusions

After careful consideration of the parties' and amici's arguments, we conclude that all construction industry bargaining relationships, including those which began prior to the enactment of Section 8(f), cannot be presumed to be 9(a) relationships; that the lawfulness of the origination of the relationship is irrelevant to determining the current nature of the relationship; and that Section 10(b) as construed in Machinists Local 424 v. NLRB (Bryan Mfg. Co.), 362 U.S. 411 (1960), does not preclude finding that a construction industry bargaining relationship, whatever its age, is not a 9(a) relationship. We also hold that we will find full 9(a) status with respect to all construction industry bargaining relationships only if the signatory union has been certified following a Board election or has been recognized on the basis of an affirmative showing of majority support. (See discussion, infra, at 980). Applying these principles to the facts of this case, we conclude that the case must be remanded for further consideration and for the parties to have an opportunity to introduce relevant evidence.

In Deklewa,[7] supra, the Board overruled the "conversion doctrine," under which a bargaining relationship which began as an 8(f) relationship could be found to have "converted" into a full 9(a) relationship by means other than a Board election or voluntary recognition based on a simultaneous showing of majority support.[8] The Board in Deklewa also emphasized that "[i]n light of the legislative history and the traditional prevailing practice in the construction industry" the burden of proving 9(a) status in construction industry cases is on the party asserting the existence of a 9(a) relationship. Deklewa, supra at 1385 fn. 41.[9] This allocation of the burden of proof reflects the Board's recognition that, in enacting Section 8(f), Congress found that entering into prehire agreements was the prevalent practice in the construction industry.[10] As fully set forth in Deklewa, a review of the legislative history demonstrates that prior to the 1959 amendments > it had become established practice in the construction industry for employers to recognize and enter into collective-bargaining agreements with a construction industry union for periods ranging from 1 to 3 years even before any employees had been hired.

S. Rep., 1 Leg. Hist. 423. Deklewa, supra at 1380. This practice had become so widespread and routine that Congress deemed it necessary to add Section 8(f) to the Act because the Board's application of Section 8(a)(2) to the industry was resulting in "substantial instability in the industry by the invalidation of established industry practices . . . ." Deklewa, supra at 1380.

Several Board decisions since Deklewa have clarified the means by which a party can prove 9(a) status in the construction industry. In American Thoro-Clean, Ltd., 283 NLRB 1107, 1108–1109 (1987), the Board stated:

> In doing away with the conversion doctrine as applied to collective-bargaining agreements permitted under Section 8(f), we held in Deklewa that in light of the legislative history of Section 8(f), and the prevailing practice in

[7] Deklewa set forth the following principles: (1) a collective-bargaining agreement permitted by Sec. 8(f) shall be enforceable through the mechanisms of Sec. 8(a)(5) and Sec. 8(b)(3); (2) such agreement will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Sec. 9(c) and 9(e); (3) in processing such petitions, the appropriate unit normally will be the single employer's employees covered by the agreement; and (4) on the expiration of such agreements, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship.

[8] Accordingly, the Board overruled in relevant part R. J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693 (1971), enf. denied sub nom. Operating Engineers Local 150 v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1973). Under the conversion theory, a 9(a) relationship could be established by showing, for example, that during a relevant period unit employees were referred from an exclusive hiring hall, that a majority of unit employees were members of the signatory union, or that the 8(f) contract contained an enforced union-security clause.

[9] This latter point is not necessarily a change in the law. See Stine Scovil Construction Co., 269 NLRB 465 (1984), in which the Board refused to find that a construction industry employer's admitted failure to abide by a collective-bargaining agreement violated Sec. 8(a)(5) because the General Counsel failed to allege or submit proof that the union had 9(a) status or that the contract was not an 8(f) contract. Carmichael Construction Corp., 258 NLRB 226 fn. 1 (1981), enfd. 728 F.2d 1137 (8th Cir. 1984), cited by the AFL–CIO and its Building and Construction Trades Department, is not to the contrary. There, the Board, in affirming a judge's conclusion that the respondent employers violated Sec. 8(a)(5), relied on the respondents' admissions that the union had majority status. Similarly, Bay Area Sealers, 251 NLRB 89 (1980), modified on other grounds 665 F.2d 970 (9th Cir. 1982), also cited by the AFL–CIO, is consistent with placing the burden of proving 9(a) status on the party asserting it. There, the Board affirmed a judge's finding that, although the respondent employer proved that it was engaged primarily in the construction industry, the General Counsel successfully satisfied its prima facie burden of establishing that the union was the 9(a) representative of unit employees at the time the parties' collective-bargaining agreement was executed.

[10] Deklewa did not modify longstanding precedent holding that the threshold burden of resolving any ambiguity concerning whether an employer is primarily in the building and construction industry falls on the party seeking to avail itself of 8(f)'s statutory exception. See Carpet Local 1247 (Indio Paint), 156 NLRB 951 fn. 1 (1966). Here, it is undisputed that the Respondent is an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry.

> the construction industry, the party to an 8(f) relationship which asserts the existence of a collective-bargaining relationship under Section 9(a) of the Act would have the burden of affirmatively proving the existence of such a relationship, through either (1) a Board-conducted representation election or (2) a union's express demand for, and an employer's voluntary grant of, recognition to the union as bargaining representative, based on a showing of support for the union among a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit. [Citation omitted.]

Further in Precision Striping, 284 NLRB 1110 (1987), the Board pointed out that an employer-conducted poll prior to the initial recognition may, in proper circumstances, establish a Section 9 bargaining relationship in the construction industry.[11]

Notwithstanding the emphasis in Deklewa and its progeny on traditional means of proving 9(a) status, the General Counsel and the AFL–CIO and its Building and Construction Trades Department contend that there should be another way to establish 9(a) status in the construction industry, i.e., by showing that the collective-bargaining relationship began before the enactment of Section 8(f). We note initially that this theory has no support in Board precedent. Of course, the theory would have been equally arguable under the rule of R. J. Smith as an alternative to the now-abandoned conversion doctrine,[12] or at any time subsequent to Section 8(f)'s enactment, but our review of precedent failed to reveal any indication that it was so argued.[13]

More importantly, reliance on the mere fact that a collective-bargaining relationship predates Section 8(f) to establish 9(a) status differs fundamentally from reliance on a Board election or recognition based on a contemporaneous showing of majority support for the union because it does not take into account employees' representational desires and does not further the fundamental statutory interest in employee free choice. In this respect, such a presumption shares some of the same shortcomings that led the Board to abandon the conversion theory in Deklewa. Indeed, the conversion doctrine at least required proof that at some point after the parties entered into an 8(f) relationship, the union actually achieved majority support in a permanent and stable employee work force. The theory advanced here would eliminate the need for any such showing based on an irrebuttable presumption arising from the mere fact of a continuous bargaining relationship entered into before the enactment of Section 8(f).

Furthermore, the presumption urged in this case has no basis in fact. The Board recently stated in Buckley Broadcasting Corp., 284 NLRB 1339 (1987), that

> [a]s an evidentiary matter, presumptions should arise when it is believed that proof of one fact renders the inference of the existence of another fact so probable that it is sensible and timesaving to assume the truth of the inferred fact until it is affirmatively disproved. [Fn. omitted.]

Buckley, supra.[14] Applying this principle here, we find no basis for such a presumption because the fact of a construction industry bargaining relationship in existence prior to the enactment of Section 8(f) does not support an inference that the parties must have initiated their relationship under Section 9(a). As previously indicated here and in Deklewa's review of the legislative history, the facts overwhelmingly support a contrary presumption. In particular, Congress stated:

> In the building and construction industry it is customary for employers to enter into collective bargaining agreements for periods of time running into the future, perhaps 1 year or in many instances as much as 3 years. Since the vast majority of building projects are of relatively short duration, such labor agreements necessarily apply to jobs which have not been started and may not even be contemplated. The practice of signing such agreements for future employment is not entirely consistent with the Wagner Act rulings of the NLRB that exclusive bargaining contracts can lawfully be concluded only if the union makes its agreement after a representative number of employees have been hired . . . .[15] [Emphasis supplied.]

[12] In this regard, we note that R. J. Smith, supra, implicitly overruled the proposition, set forth in Bricklayers Local 3 (Eastern Washington Builders), 162 NLRB 476 (1966), enfd. 405 F.2d 469 (9th Cir. 1968), that Sec. 8(f) applies only to the situation where parties are entering into an initial contract, and not to succeeding contracts. Deklewa did not disturb that aspect of R. J. Smith and, in holding that successor construction industry bargaining agreements are presumed to be 8(f) contracts, we expressly overrule Bricklayers. We also overrule Williams Enterprises, 212 NLRB 880 (1974), enfd. mem. 519 F.2d 1401 (4th Cir. 1975), and Dallas Building Trades Council (Dallas County Construction Employers' Assn.), 164 NLRB 938 (1967), enfd. 396 F.2d 677 (D.C. Cir. 1968) on this point.

We also find no merit in the General Counsel's effort to use Section 10(b) to support an irrebuttable presumption of initial 9(a) status or otherwise bar a determination that any construction industry relationship predating Section 8(f) was a nonmajority prehire agreement at its inception. Relying on earlier precedent,[16] she asserts that the policies which the Supreme Court understood in Bryan Mfg. to underlie Section 10(b) as an affirmative defense could in this case preclude a defense based on evidence of unlawful minority union recognition predating the 6-month limitations period. Bryan, which was decided shortly after Section 8(f)'s enactment, involved the straightforward question of whether respondents employer and union could invoke Section 10(b) against alleged violations of Sections 8(a)(2) and 8(b)(1)(A) where the bargaining agreement was executed more than 6 months from the date of the charge. In holding that Section 10(b) was a viable bar to the complaint, the Court stated (362 U.S. at 419):

> Where, as here, a collective bargaining agreement and its enforcement are both perfectly lawful on the face of things, and an unfair labor practice cannot be made out except by reliance on the fact of the agreement's original unlawful execution, an event which, because of limitations, cannot itself be made the subject of an unfair labor practice complaint, we think that permitting resort to the principle that Sec. 10(b) is not a rule of evidence, in order to convert what is otherwise legal into something illegal, would vitiate the policies underlying that section. These policies are to bar litigation over past events, "after records have been destroyed, witnesses have gone elsewhere, and recollections of the events in question have become dim and confused," H.R. Rep. No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 40 [fn. omitted] and of course to stabilize existing bargaining relationships.

However, the logic of Bryan cannot be extended to support the General Counsel's argument here. In R. J. Smith, supra, the Board rejected this precise contention. In holding that the policies behind Section 10(b) did not support an irrebuttable presumption favorable to the General Counsel and did not foreclose inquiry into events that preceded the 6-month limitations period and that might have a bearing on the current status of the bargaining relationship, the Board contrasted construction prehire agreements with collective-bargaining agreements in other industries (191 NLRB at 694–695):

> We find, further, that there is no merit in the exception based on Local Lodge No. 1424 International Association of Machinists (Bryan Mfg. Co.) v. NLRB, 362 U.S. 411 (1960), that Respondent was precluded by Section 10(b) from asserting that the October 1968 contract was executed at a time when the Union did not enjoy majority support. It is true that, in the normal case, an employer-respondent in an 8(a)(5) case may not go behind the 10(b) period to show that a contract, apparently regular and continuing on its face, was executed at a time when the union was not the majority representative. The reason for this rule is that a contract, regular on its face, carries with it an irrebuttable presumption—absent, perhaps, unusual circumstances—of continuing majority status of the union. Thus, since the contract standing alone carries with it a continued requirement of union recognition, to go behind the 10(b) period to show that when the contract was executed the union failed to represent a majority runs directly counter to the teachings of Bryan.
> Such is not the case with an 8(f) agreement. As previously described, an 8(f) agreement, because of its prehire nature, need not be made with a majority union to be legal. For this reason, there is no basis, either in logic or in policy, to extend to the union which is party to such a contract an irrebuttable presumption of majority status. Indeed, we conclude that any such presumption would be irreconcilable with the final proviso to Section 8(f). It is, of course, necessary sometimes to go behind the 10(b) period to see what kind of contract is involved in a particular case—just as it might be necessary to take an employer's operations for an entire year, including 6 months behind the 10(b) period—to see whether it is engaged in commerce and within the Board's jurisdictional standards. However, once that is accomplished and it is determined the particular contract under scrutiny is validated by Section 8(f) rather than by Section 9(c)(e) [sic]—one to which no irrebuttable presumption of majority can be attached —that is the end of the pre-10(b) inquiry. No actual "defense" in such a situation is predicated on pre-10(b) events.

There is nothing in the foregoing analysis quoted from R. J. Smith which suggests that the analysis is any less applicable to bargaining relationships originating in prehire agreements which antedate the enactment of Section 8(f) than it is to 8(f) relationships inaugurated by postenactment agreements. The General Counsel nevertheless attempts to avoid R. J. Smith's rejection of Section 10(b)'s relevance by suggesting that Congress intended only to give Section 8(f) prospective application to contractual relationships inaugurated after its effective date. From this watershed date, parties initiating construction prehire bargaining relationships can invoke Section 8(f) to immunize themselves from attack without resort to Section 10(b). But conversely, in the General Counsel's view, pre-1959 prehire agreements would have remained vulnerable to attack under Sections 8(a)(2) and 8(b)(1)(A) through the present time were it not for Section 10(b). In essence, with respect to pre-1959 relationships, the argument seems to be grounded in parity: Given the bar erected defensively by Section 10(b) against 8(a)(2) and 8(b)(1)(A) charges, the Board should likewise invoke Section 10(b) offensively to give the General Counsel the benefit of a presumption that the relationship is based on the union's majority status.

[16] See, e.g., Barrington Plaza & Tragniew, 185 NLRB 962 (1970), enf. denied on other grounds 470 F.2d 669 (9th Cir. 1972).

We think that this argument is wholly unpersuasive for two reasons. First, we have been shown nothing in the legislative history to suggest that Congress intended to create a dichotomy between pre-1959 prehire agreements, which supposedly remain potentially vulnerable, and post-1959 agreements, which do not. Congress declared that the Board's invalidation of prehire agreements in the construction industry had "given rise to serious problems" and that Section 8(f) "endeavors to resolve certain most urgent problems . . . ."[17] It would be incongruous to conclude that notwithstanding the strong desire of Congress to promote labor relations stability by protecting widespread and established bargaining practices, Congress left a number of these practices open to challenge.

Secondly, to the extent that the then-existing law of Section 10(b) may have shaped the thinking of the 86th Congress, it would not support the major premise of the General Counsel's parity argument. Prior to the Supreme Court's 1960 decision in Bryan, the Board had embraced a "continuing violation" theory with regard to collective-bargaining agreements entered into with minority unions. Accordingly, at the time Section 8(f) was enacted, Section 10(b) was not available defensively to insulate the agreements from prosecution. In short, prehire agreements remained unlawful regardless of the limitations period.[18] Thus, as a matter of logic, without Section 10(b) to protect construction prehire agreements, there is no reason that the 86th Congress would have expected the Board to apply the policies underlying Section 10(b) so as to preclude an employer from proving that a union did not enjoy majority support when establishing a collective-bargaining relationship more than 6 months earlier.[19]

We conclude that Congress gave Section 8(a)(2) immunity to all nonmajority bargaining relationships in the construction industry, not just those established after or within 6 months of the enactment of Section 8(f). We further conclude that the rationale of R. J. Smith regarding Section 10(b) remains valid, notwithstanding our criticism and rejection of other aspects of that opinion in Deklewa. Nothing in Bryan precludes inquiry into the establishment of construction industry bargaining relationships outside the 10(b) period. Going back to the beginning of the parties' relationship here simply seeks to determine the majority or nonmajority based nature of the current relationship and does not involve a determination that any conduct was unlawful, either within or outside the 10(b) period.

Any reliance on Barrington Plaza & Tragniew, 185 NLRB 962 (1970), enf. denied on other grounds 470 F.2d 669 (9th Cir. 1972), and similar nonconstruction cases such as Forbidden City Restaurant, 265 NLRB 409 (1982), enf. denied 736 F.2d 1295 (9th Cir. 1984), and Jim Kelly's Tahoe Nugget, 227 NLRB 357 (1976), enfd. 584 F.2d 293 (9th Cir. 1978), cert. denied 442 U.S. 921 (1979), is therefore misplaced. In those decisions the Board held that an employer may not defend against a refusal-to-bargain charge by asserting that the initial recognition, occurring outside the 10(b) period, was unlawful. None of those cases involved a construction industry employer, and the legal principles set forth in them are inapplicable in a construction industry context because Section 8(f) is an exception to the 8(a)(2) ban on recognizing and reaching agreement with a nonmajority union.

[19] That the Supreme Court subsequently rejected the "continuing violation" theory in Bryan does not alter the significance which we assign to the pre-Bryan view of Sec. 10(b). As the Court has stated, in interpreting a statute in the legal context in which it was enacted, what counts sometimes is not what the correct state of the law (as in the case when the Supreme Court authoritatively construes it) may be, but what the Congress itself perceived the state of the law to be at the time of enactment. Brown v. GSA, 425 U.S. 820, 828 (1976); Cannon v. University of Chicago, 441 U.S. 677, 711 (1979); Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith v. Curran, 456 U.S. 353, 378 (1982). Although we acknowledge that the Court in Bryan relied upon the clear intent of the 80th Congress in 1947 for its interpretation of Sec. 10(b), this does not mean that the 86th Congress must have acted with the view of its predecessor, rather than with the then current Board view in mind.

Moreover, if Congress believed that Sec. 10(b) immunized all but those minority-based contracts executed in the 6 months preceding the enactment of Sec. 8(f), it presumably would have expressly provided retroactive immunity to those otherwise vulnerable contracts lest its enactment have failed to address the very problem Congress perceived. For instance, Congress did expressly legalize through Sec. 8(f) other specific construction industry contractual practices whose maintenance and enforcement would have been subject to an unfair labor practice charge even if the Bryan interpretation of the 10(b) limitations period had applied. E.g., Sec. 8(f)(2) legalized a shorter posthiring waiting period prior to the imposition of membership requirements under a union-security agreement in the construction industry.

Finally, we concede that the evidentiary problems in ascertaining how longstanding relationships began may occasionally be significant. Nevertheless such determinations clearly will not involve as many factual variables as were necessary to be litigated under the conversion doctrine. In any event, whatever evidentiary problems may exist do not persuade us, in light of the factors fully analyzed in Deklewa, that there is sufficient reason to substitute a presumption that bargaining relationships beginning before the enactment of Section 8(f) were based on the union's majority status, or that it is not proper to require the party asserting the 9(a) relationship to prove it by the means set forth in Deklewa and its progeny. In this regard, we note that here the Respondent indicates the availability of oral and documentary evidence which it asserts will demonstrate that the General Counsel cannot prove that the Union has 9(a) status.

In view of the above, we shall remand this case to the administrative law judge for further consideration in light of Deklewa, including, if necessary, reopening the record to obtain more evidence on the collective-bargaining representative status of the Union.

Accordingly, IT IS ORDERED that the motion to dismiss is denied and this proceeding is remanded to the administrative law judge for further action consistent with the above.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the administrative law judge shall prepare and serve on the parties a Supplemental Decision containing such resolutions, findings, conclusions, and recommendations as found necessary consistent with this remand. Following service of the Supplemental Decision on the parties, the provisions of Section 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations shall be applicable.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSON, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by the Union on July 21, 1987, the General Counsel for the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint on December 10, 1987, against the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The complaint alleges that on January 23, 1987, Supervisor Leonard Barber solicited an employee to circulate and obtain other employees' signatures on a petition to decertify the Union; that in mid-March 1987, Barber instructed an employee to provide false information in the event of an inquiry concerning the origins of the petition to decertify the Union; and that also in mid-March, Barber solicited an employee to refuse to cooperate with a Board agent during an investigation concerning the origins of a petition to decertify the Union. The complaint alleges that by these acts the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The complaint further alleges that on February 2, 1987, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by withdrawing recognition from the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of unit employees, based on a decertification petition that had been obtained through the unlawful assistance of the Respondent, and by refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union since that date.

On December 16, 1987, the Respondent filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint, and raising affirmative defenses. As an affirmative defense, the Respondent contends that the complaint is barred by prior litigation in consolidated Cases 11-CA-12071, 11-CA-12084, 11-CA-12117, and 11-CA-12288 (collectively Case 11-CA-12071 et al.) and that the complaint should be dismissed.[1]

On December 22, 1987, the Respondent filed a Motion for Summary Judgment and a brief in support thereof and in opposition to the General Counsel's motion to remand with exhibits attached, renewing its contention that the complaint was barred by the prior litigation of the issue of withdrawal of recognition in Case 11-CA-12071 et al. The Respondent also contends that in the prior litigation the General Counsel specifically disavowed the theory of withdrawal of recognition, which she now attempts to resurrect.

On January 6, 1988, the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The General Counsel filed a response, alleging that the facts in the instant case were unknown to the General Counsel and the Charging Party and could not have been readily discovered by either party prior to the May 18 and 19, 1987 trial of Case 11-CA-12071 et al.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

The undisputed facts show that a petition to decertify the Union was circulated among the Respondent's employees during December 1986 and January 1987. On February 17, 1987, the Union filed a charge in Case 11-CA-12288 alleging, inter alia, that the Respondent had unlawfully withdrawn recognition from the Union on February 2, 1987. On April 30, 1987, the General Counsel issued a consolidated complaint which consolidated Case 11-CA-12288 with Cases 11-CA-12071, 11-CA-12084, and 11-CA-12117 and which alleged, inter alia, that "[o]n or about February 2, 1987, [Respondent] unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union." On May 18, 1987, at the start of the hearing in Case 11-CA-12071 et al., the General Counsel stipulated that she did not "contend that the Respondent unlawfully assisted or encouraged the [decertification] petition with respect to this proceeding." The General Counsel further stipulated that "[t]he only issue concerning the withdrawal of recognition" allegation of the complaint "is whether Respondent was entitled to rely on the petition in light of the other unfair labor practices" alleged.

On July 21, 1987, the Union filed the charge in the instant proceeding (Case 11-CA-12446), alleging that the Respondent unlawfully assisted or encouraged employees in circulating the decertification petition. In a letter dated July 24, 1987, the Respondent requested dismissal of the charge, citing Jefferson Chemical Co., 200 NLRB 992 (1972).[2] On August 25, 1987, the Regional Director, citing Jefferson Chemical Co., refused to issue a complaint, asserting that the evidence presented, in whole or in part, was known or could have been known to the General Counsel at the time Case 11-CA-12071 et al. was being litigated. The Union appealed the Regional Director's refusal to issue a complaint, and the appeal was sustained. Thereafter, the Regional Director issued the complaint at issue here. As stated above, the instant complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by certain statements made to employees in January and March 1987 and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by withdrawing recognition from the Union on February 2, 1987.

In its Motion for Summary Judgment, the Respondent contends that Jefferson Chemical Co. bars the General Counsel from relitigating the issue of the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition from the Union. In her motion opposing summary judgment, the General Counsel asserts:

> During the course of the investigation in Case No. 11-CA-12446, evidence was presented which conclusively demonstrated that during the 10(b) period, admitted supervisor Leonard Barber had asked an employee to sign the decertification petition, directed her to get other employees to sign the petition and instructed the employee to deliberately falsify information if anyone from the Union or the Board asked about his involvement with such petition.

The General Counsel contends that during the investigation of Case 11-CA-12288 the Regional Director was only aware that an employee had signed the petition and had asked others to do the same; and that, while not compelled to do so, the Regional Director unsuccessfully attempted to contact the employee. Thus, the General Counsel argues that the evidence of "supervisory taint" was unknown to both the General Counsel and the Charging Party and could not have been readily discovered by either party prior to the May 18 and 19, 1987 trial of Case 11-CA-12071 et al. The General Counsel further argues that the evidence in the instant case, if credited, would establish that the Respondent urged an employee to mislead the Union and the Board if inquiries were made about the supervisor's involvement with the petition. The General Counsel contends that because the Respondent played an active part in suppressing the evidence, it can not equitably or legally argue for its exclusion.

Relying on Jefferson Chemical Co., supra, we conclude that the Respondent is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law. The uncontroverted facts establish that on February 17, 1987, the Union filed a charge in Case 11-CA-12288, alleging that the Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5); that the General Counsel investigated that charge and issued a complaint containing an unlawful withdrawal of recognition allegation; and that at the May 18, 1987 hearing the General Counsel specifically declined to pursue any contention that the Respondent unlawfully assisted or encouraged the decertification petition that formed the basis for the withdrawal of recognition. Nevertheless, the General Counsel now seeks in the instant complaint to relitigate the withdrawal-of-recognition issue relying on the theory she previously disavowed and on events occurring prior to the May 18, 1987 hearing. Under Jefferson Chemical, "such multiple litigation of issues which should have been presented in the initial proceeding" is not permitted.[3]

We therefore conclude that the instant complaint is based on events which took place prior to the May 18, 1987 hearing in Case 11-CA-12071 et al. and which were, or should have been, known to the General Counsel by virtue of her investigation of the charge in Case 11-CA-12288. Accordingly, the complaint must be dismissed on the authority of Jefferson Chemical Co.

ORDER

It is ordered that the Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment be granted and the complaint is dismissed.

plaint, which alleged that the Respondent had engaged in surface bargaining in violation of Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act. The judge found that the complaint was based on events that were, or should have been, known to the General Counsel through the investigation of a broad refusal-to-bargain allegation in a prior charge. The Board held that the General Counsel is dutybound to investigate all matters that are encompassed by the charge and to proceed appropriately thereafter. The Board stated that "multiple litigation of issues which should have been presented in the initial proceeding constitutes a waste of resources and an abuse of our processes . . . ." 200 NLRB at 992 fn. 3.

[3] We note that, as stated above, the Regional Director initially refused to issue a complaint on the basis of the instant charge specifically because the evidence presented was known or could have been known to the General Counsel at the time Case 11-CA-12071 et al. was litigated.

Member Cracraft additionally notes that the General Counsel has not shown by any admissible evidence that this case would fall outside the scope of Jefferson Chemical Co. As set forth in Rule 56(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the General Counsel must rely on more than the bare allegation that the evidence in the instant case was unknown to the General Counsel and was not readily discoverable prior to the hearing in Case 11-CA-12071 et al. Thus, in Member Cracraft's view, the General Counsel's failure to attach a supporting affidavit or exhibit to the motion opposing summary judgment precludes finding a genuine issue as to any material fact.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On September 18, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Lawrence W. Cullen issued the attached decision.[1] The General Counsel filed exceptions[2] and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[4]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Purolator Products, Inc. and its successor Purolator Products, Inc., Division of Facet Enterprises, Inc., Fayetteville, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] In his decision, the judge found, inter alia, that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(5) by its withdrawal of recognition from the Union in February 1987. The General Counsel has filed a motion to remand this proceeding to the judge, to reopen the record, to consolidate Case 11-CA-12446 with the instant cases, and to conduct a second hearing on the issue of whether the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act when it withdrew recognition from the Union in February 1987. The complaint in Case 11-CA-12446 alleges that the Respondent unlawfully assisted or encouraged employees in circulating a decertification petition in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union, based on the "tainted" decertification petition, in violation of Sec. 8(a)(5).

In Purolator Products, 289 NLRB 984 (1988), the Board has granted the Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment in Case 11-CA-12446 and dismissed the complaint on the authority of Jefferson Chemical Co., 200 NLRB 992 (1972), which prohibits the multiple litigation of issues that should have been presented in the initial proceeding.

As in Case 11-CA-12446, the General Counsel asserts here that evidence concerning the impropriety of the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition was revealed by the investigation of the charge in Case 11-CA-12446, which occurred after the close of the hearing in the instant cases. That investigation allegedly disclosed that the decertification petition may have been tainted by supervisory involvement and assistance. The investigation also allegedly disclosed evidence that the Respondent urged an employee to mislead the Union and the Board if inquiries were made about the supervisor's involvement with the petition. The General Counsel further asserts that the evidence in Case 11-CA-12446 was not known to the General Counsel nor could it have reasonably been expected to have been known by the General Counsel at the time of the litigation of the instant cases. Lastly, the General Counsel argues that, in view of the Respondent's conduct, it cannot legitimately argue unfair prejudice by any delay in the litigation of the "supervisory taint" issue. In light of our ruling on the Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment in Case 11-CA-12446, we deny the General Counsel's motion to remand this proceeding and to reopen the record.

[2] The General Counsel seeks, inter alia, a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such an order. See Cherokee Marine Terminal, 287 NLRB 1080 (1988).

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[4] Although the judge ordered that the Respondent rescind any disciplinary actions taken pursuant to the disciplinary policy regarding the wearing of identification badges found unlawful and that the Respondent remove from its files any reference to such disciplinary actions, the judge failed to include these provisions in the notice. We will therefore attach a new notice that includes these provisions.

the aforesaid unlawful discipline will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

LAWRENCE W. CULLEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me on 18 and 19 May 1987 at Fayetteville, North Carolina, pursuant to a consolidated complaint filed by the Regional Director for Region 11 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) on 30 April 1987. The complaint alleges the commission of violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by Respondent Purolator Products, Inc. and its successor Purolator Products, Inc., Division of Facet Enterprises, Inc. (the Respondent or the Employer) and is based on charges filed by the United Paperworkers International Union, AFL-CIO, CLC (the Union). Respondent, by its answer filed on 8 May 1987, has denied the commission of any violations of the Act.

After due consideration of the evidence and testimony presented at the hearing including the demeanor of the witnesses and the briefs filed by the General Counsel and counsel for the Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION—THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that about late January 1987, Facet Enterprises, Inc. purchased the business of Purolator Products, Inc., located at Fayetteville, North Carolina, and since that time has been engaged in the same business operations, at the same locations, manufacturing and selling the same products to substantially the same customers, and has as a majority of its employees individuals who were previously employees of Purolator Products and that it has continued the employing entity and is a successor of Purolator Products, Inc. Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, a Delaware corporation with a plant located at Fayetteville, North Carolina, where it is engaged in the manufacture and distribution of automotive air, gas, and oil filters. During the past 12 months, a representative period, Respondent received at its Fayetteville, North Carolina plant goods and raw materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of North Carolina, and Respondent is now, and has been at all times material, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION[1]

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that the Union is, and has been at all times material, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES[2]

The consolidated complaint sets out several alleged violations of the Act by Respondent as follows:

A. An alleged threat of plant closure in January 1986.[3]

B. The alleged unlawful discharge of employee Minnie Blount.

C. The alleged unlawful demotion of employee Willie Lowery.

D. An alleged refusal of representation requested by employee Dennis J. Roberts during an investigatory interview.

E. The alleged unlawful unilateral imposition of a policy of discipline by Respondent in connection with its cross-training program and with the wearing of employee identification badges.

F. The alleged unlawful withdrawal of recognition of the Union by Respondent in February 1987.

A. The Alleged Threat to Close the Plant

Former employee Dennis J. Roberts testified that at a monthly communication meeting held on 16 January 1986 conducted by his supervisor, Wayne Wilson, he (Roberts) was asked by Wilson what he knew about unions because Roberts was from the North. Roberts testified that he replied that a black employee named John Jones who had been discharged 2 or 3 days before for sleeping on the job would not have been discharged if there was a union. Roberts testified that Wilson then stated that Respondent could fire whomever it wanted. Roberts testified further on direct examination that Wilson, in response to an employee question, stated that the Union would cause the Fayetteville plant to close, and that two other Purolator plants in Rahway, New

[1] The Union was certified by the Board in May 1984 following an election held in March 1980. The Respondent refused to bargain with the Union and the Board issued a bargaining Order in November 1984 that was enforced by the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in November 1985. Purolator Products, 270 NLRB 694, 702 (1984), enfd. 121 LRRM 2120 (4th Cir. 1985). The following employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act:

> All production and maintenance employees employed at the Employer's Fayetteville, North Carolina plant, including warehouse distribution center employees, truck drivers, time keepers, roving inspectors and floor inspectors assigned to the quality control department, excluding all office clerical employees, materials planners, production schedulers, laboratory technicians, print clerks, layout and gauge inspectors, receiving clerks, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

[3] All dates are in 1986 unless otherwise specified.

Jersey, and in Pennsylvania had closed because of high union wages. On cross-examination after review of his earlier affidavit given to the General Counsel, Roberts testified that Wilson had said "they closed Rahway because the Union wages were high and [the] Fayetteville plant could do it cheaper" but that as a result of the Union coming into the Fayetteville plant, "the price—the filters would jump sky high and they wouldn't be—we wouldn't have the competition." In addition to Wilson, Roberts testified that a forklift driver named Emma and Chet Kinsey, an employee who had transferred from the Respondent's Rahway, New Jersey plant were also present.

Respondent called Supervisor Wayne Wilson who testified that Roberts had previously worked for him at a time when Wilson was a third-shift supervisor in components, but that he (Wilson) had transferred to the second shift in September 1985. Wilson testified he did not participate in any third-shift communication meetings after his September 1985 transfer and specifically denied having participated in a third-shift communications meeting in January 1986. Wilson acknowledged that he had conducted a communications meeting in August 1985 during which Roberts spoke about unions saying that there were good and bad points about unions and discussed a problem he had previously had with a union. Wilson's testimony concerning his transfer to the second shift was corroborated by Bobby Pate, a third-shift assistant supervisor (MSA), who testified that Wilson was his (Pate's) supervisor until Wilson transferred to the second shift in September and that Wison had not been in any third-shift meetings thereafter. Pate denied that he or Wilson had ever said that the Rahway, New Jersey plant had been closed as a result of the Union. Additionally, Wilson's employment records were introduced, which set out his transfer to the second shift in September 1985. Respondent also introduced the employment records of Chet Kinsey showing that he had transferred from the third to second shift in August 1985, and of Emma McLauren showing she had transferred from the third shift to first shift in August 1985 and had quit her employment in September 1985. Additionally, Respondent's employee relations manager, Jim Clark, testified that he had researched the employee records of several months around the January 1986 period, but could find no record of a termination of an employee for sleeping on the job.

In addition to the occurrence of the alleged January incident, the date became a matter of controversy at the hearing, and Respondent amended its answer to allege an affirmative 10(b) defense when Roberts placed the date of the meeting on 16 January 1986 in view of the filing of the charge on 16 July 1986. In an effort to bolster his testimony Roberts testifed that he had made notes of the alleged 16 January 1986 communications meeting on a calendar in his home. Roberts was asked to produce the calendar and did so with the month of January missing and testified that his child had torn up the page for the month of January. Respondent also introduced the formal outlines for its monthly communications meetings for the months of August 1985 to January 1986. Only the outline topic for the month of October 1985 concerned the growth of the Fayetteville facility and the closure of other Purolator plants.

Analysis

My review of the demeanor and the testimony of Roberts, who had been discharged by Respondent, convinces me that he was not a reliable witness. At the outset his testimony was riddled with rancor and accusations against the Company and members of its management characterized by unresponsive tirades after questions were posed to him. He characterized one supervisor as the "hitman" for another referring to discipline and on another occasion in reference to an inquiry concerning a date, he launched into a completely unresponsive tirade. Moreover, I found the testimony of Roberts filled with inconsistencies as shown by his placement of individual employees at the alleged meeting of 16 January, who were clearly on another shift and in one case had terminated employment several months before this date. Moreover, regarding the date of 16 January placed on this meeting, which would place the meeting exactly within the 6-month 10(b) period because the charge was filed on 16 July, I found his assertion that he relied on a calendar at home and his subsequent explanation for the missing month of January to be unconvincing.

I thus find that the Respondent has affirmatively shown that the alleged meeting did not occur within the 10(b) period and that this allegation should be accordingly dismissed. Assuming arguendo, that the charge was filed within the 10(b) period, I find that the General Counsel has failed to make a prima facie case, as I do not find Roberts' testimony to be credible as a result of his demeanor and inconsistencies. Assuming that a prima facie case was established, I find that Respondent has rebutted it by a preponderance of the evidence.

B. The Discharge of Minnie Blount

Minnie Blount was an 8-year employee who had previously been assigned as one of two routine inspectors on Respondent's oil filter line and had been rated as satisfactory on that line. As the oil filter line became more automated, only one routine inspector was required on the oil line. Blount was transferred to the air filter line and had been assigned as the routine inspector for that line for a period of 9 to 10 months before her termination.

On the air filter line the filters are manufactured and baked in an oven in a mold. After they have been pulled from the oven, they are broken out of the mold by an employee designated as a "mold puller" who removes the filters from the mold and places them on the conveyor belt where they pass by the routine inspector. There is only one inspector on the air filter line, in this case Minnie Blount, on line 5. The routine inspector's job is to check for defective filters and place them aside. There are several types of defects, some of which are correctible: specifically, "feathers" and "flashes" consist of extra plastisol attached to the filter, which are corrected by the inspector's by clearing them off with a metal wire. It is the job of the routine inspector to ensure that no defective filters go past her without being set aside and/or corrected or in the case of feathers and flashes because the next step in the process is the packing of the filters into boxes for shipment to customers. In the event that the feathers and flashes are too many for the routine inspector to clean while the line is moving, she is to set them aside for cleaning at a later time either by herself or by other employees who may assist her in this. She is also responsible for segregating the filters taken off the line by the type of defect and making an hourly count and total of the defects on a form utilized to keep management apprised whether there is a mechanical problem contributing to a number of defective filters. Additionally, the Respondent utilizes a floor inspector whose job it is to select samples of filters that have already been packed into boxes for shipment, and to inspect these packed filters to ensure the integrity of the overall process that the Respondent is not shipping defective filters to its customers. The routine inspector (Blount) was assigned to air filter line 5 and was a part of the quality control section, and reported to Supervisor Barry O'Quinn who had responsibilities throughout the entire plant. However, the line Blount worked on was under the immediate supervision of Line Supervisor James Bryant.

The General Counsel's case relies on a showing of general animus by Respondent against the Union and against its employees' support of the Union, as a result of unfair labor practices found to have been committed by Respondent in early 1980 before an election campaign and the Respondent's subsequent refusal to bargain, after the results of the election until the Board's Order in 1984 as enforced by the circuit court of appeals in 1985. Following the enforcement of the Board's Order in November 1985, the Union requested and received information from Respondent for purposes of bargaining and the first bargaining session was scheduled to begin on 30 January 1986.

On 27 January Blount received a routine 6-month review and received a rating of "unsatisfactory" for quality of work as a result of a warning and suspension she had received in November 1986, for not cleaning her workplace as directed by Assistant Supervisor Billy Autry. She had also received a warning in November 1985.

On 11 November 1985 she received a written warning signed by the supervisor, Barry O'Quinn, for poor job performance for failing to keep up with the standard line speed of 20 filters a minute causing filters to be stacked all over the mold pullers table and a consequent backup of filters on the line and off stacking filters that should have been cleaned of feathers and sent off for packing. On the warning, which was signed by Blount, O'Quinn stated, "Further incidents of this kind could result in more severe disciplinary action including termination." On 18 November 1985, Blount received another written warning and a 3-day suspension for failing to turn in a line scrap report for 2 hours. O'Quinn noted on this written warning and suspension document, which was also signed by Blount, that Blount was frequently turning in scrap reports without dates or the line number and that she had "been counseled concerning her paperwork on several occasions." In this document O'Quinn also recommended that Blount be demoted. Blount had previously received a written warning on 18 October 1985 for her failure on 17 October 1985 to follow the instructions of MSA Billy Autry to clean the pack section before going to another section of the operation. Blount had also received a written warning on 23 October 1985 for poor job performance for her failure on 22 October 1985 to keep up with the standard line speed of 20 filters a minute and for allowing an excessive amount of defective filters to pass her inspection and be packed out requiring that three pallets of filters be reworked.

As a result of being rated satisfactory in all other areas she received an overall rating of satisfactory on 27 January. Blount testified that at her evaluation interview on 27 January she was told by her supervisor, O'Quinn, that she was doing a good job and that she told him of the excessive line speed of the filters coming to her for inspection and of the excessive number of feathers and flashes, which were too numerous for her to handle, and told O'Quinn to tell the management to slow down the line. According to Blount, O'Quinn told her not to worry about it and that he (O'Quinn) had no control over the line. Blount testified further that O'Quinn remarked that she was not wearing her union button as the other inspectors were and that she told him she had lost her button but that she was supporting the Union and that O'Quinn's face became red and he then told her to go back to work. According to Blount when she reported to work on 29 January the line was running excessively fast, and there were an inordinate amount of filters causing her to stack filters all over the place as she was unable to remove the flashes and feathers. She attempted to have O'Quinn slow down the line but he did not do so, and as a result, her workplace was stacked with defective filters and others continued on down the line for packing. O'Quinn told her just to worry about the "real bad" filters. When Blount returned to work the next day she was told by O'Quinn to come to the office and was terminated for poor job performance on 30 January, which was also the day that the first bargaining session was set to begin.

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent's union animus is demonstrated by its past unfair labor practices, including threats of plant closure and discharges in 1980 and its refusal to bargain since 1984. The General Counsel further contends that Blount was rated as satisfactory overall on 27 January. It was not until Blount's support of the Union was disclosed by her to O'Quinn on 27 January that she was summarily discharged 3 days later by Respondent to make a point of the futility of union representation on the beginning day of negotiations after the elapse of 6 years following the election.

The Respondent presents a different picture of what occurred in this case. It produced several witnesses who testified concerning Blount's performance on her job. Mike Hargis, the mold puller who worked alongside Blount, testified that he complained to management on at least two occasions concerning Blount's inability to keep up with the filters coming down the line, which he attributed at least in part to her constant snacking on food, which she brought in a shopping bag, and her continual application of lip treatments. James Bryant, the line supervisor, testified that on numerous occasions Blount was unable to keep up with the line speed, which was 20 filters per minute, and he was required to shut down the line as much as an hour early in order for other employees to clean the filters and reinspect those that had been inspected by Blount. Bryant testified that he had received complaints from other employees including Hargis, the mold puller, who was required to stack filters all over his own work area as a result of Blount's inability to inspect the filters and from the packers who had initially pulled defective filters, but whose job was only to pack and not to inspect. The packers had complained to him that it was up to Blount to inspect the filters. Bryant had on several occasions been required to reinspect all the filters previously inspected by Blount. Elizabeth Carpenter, the floor inspector, also testified that Blount had an excessive amount of defective filters. Specifically, she testified that on 29 January she initially inspected one of the packed boxes of filters at the end of Blount's line and found several defective filters and told Blount about it. Blount asked Carpenter why she had brought it to her attention. Further inspection of other boxes by Carpenter at that time disclosed other defective filters. When Carpenter repeated this to Blount, Blount attempted to place the blame on Billy Autry, the assistant supervisor, who had cleared feathers and flashes from some of the filters placed aside by Blount. However, Carpenter noted in her memo of that evening that the defective filters she found did not bear wire scratches indicating that they had not been cleaned at all, as the wire used to clean the filters leaves scratch marks. John William (Billy) Autry also testified that he had been required on a number of occasions to reinspect whole pallets of filters inspected by Blount. Carpenter rejected several pallets of filters inspected by Blount on the evening of 29 January and Bryant and Autry reinspected them finding numerous defective filters. Pursuant to this Bryant wrote a lengthy memorandum concerning Blount's deficiencies as an inspector and summarizing that the Company had been very lucky to date in servicing its customers given her inadequacies as an inspector. It was thus determined by O'Quinn and other members of management to terminate Blount. Personnel Supervisors James Knox and Donna Ogg both testified that Blount had been offered a demotion to another job in the past in view of her problems as an inspector but declined to take a demotion. Blount denied that she had been offered a demotion but this was refuted by the notation of this recommendation on the written warning issued to her in November by O'Quinn as well as by the testimony of Knox and Ogg, which testimony I credit. At the time of the hearing O'Quinn was no longer employed by Respondent and was not called to testify.

I find that the General Counsel has failed to make a prima facie case of a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by Respondent's discharge of Blount. Initially, the unfair labor practices referred to by the General Counsel are remote in time, and the discrimination and threats occurred 6 years before Blount's termination. Moreover, Blount's participation in union activities by her own account by the wearing of a button at time when the Respondent had already begun to prepare to bargain with the Union, pursuant to the Board and court Order were slight and no different from other inspectors who also wore buttons. As Respondent points out in its brief, there is no indication in the record that Blount was aggressive in her support of the Union or regarded as a threat by Respondent. Burlington Industries, 257 NLRB 712, 727-728 (1981); New York Delicatessen, 275 NLRB 959, 966 (1985). I thus find that the General Counsel has proven no more than a suspicion of an unlawful termination, by reason of the timing of Blount's discharge shortly after her disclosure of support for the Union and on the eve of the commencement of bargaining, but has failed to prove that her union activities were a motivating factor in her discharge by Respondent.

Assuming arguendo that the General Counsel has made a prima facie case of an 8(a)(3) violation of the Act by the Respondent's discharge of Blount, I find that Respondent has fully rebutted it by the preponderance of the evidence, which I find overwhelmingly demonstrated that Blount's inadequate job performance was the reason for her discharge. I credit each of Respondent's witnesses as supported by documentation in this regard and find that Blount would have been discharged even in the absence of her engagement in concerted union activities. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1981), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982); Roure Bertrand Dupont, 271 NLRB 443 (1984); and *NLRB v. C. The Demotion of Willie Lowery

Lowery is a long-term employee who had been employed as a maintenance mechanic by Respondent for its manufacturing lines. In December 1976 Lowery's trousers became entangled in moving machinery, and he sustained severe damage to his knee. In the intervening years he has had seven knee operations and has been told his knee will steadily deteriorate and will eventually have to be rebuilt. During the years he has also sustained a number of other accidents entailing lost time. As a result of his various injuries he has been absent from work 27 percent of the time since his initial injury in 1976, and in 1986 had missed work 17 percent of the time from the beginning of the year until 30 March when he was demoted. Lowery was named as a member of the bargaining committee on behalf of the Union in December 1985 and has long been known as an active union supporter. In early 1986 Lowery's leg gave out on him and he reinjured himself.

The General Counsel contends that Lowery's demotion by Respondent was a result of his support for the Union contending that his absences were not occasioned by other than legitimate work injuries and that he had been highly rated as a mechanic in the past.

The Respondent called Roy Wilson Jr., Lowery's supervisor, who testified that he had repeatedly urged that Lowery be replaced by another mechanic because of his absences from the job making Wilson short handed for mechanics, given his limited budgeted number of mechanics and requiring other employees to cover Lowery's responsibilities necessitating overtime and leading to employee complaints. Additionally Human Resources Director Jim Clark testified that in response to the complaints made to him by Lowery's supervisor, Wilson, he reviewed all of Lowery's attendance records and determined that he had been absent 27 percent of the time since his original knee injury, 17 percent of the time in 1987 and, only recently, Lowery's knee had given out for no apparent reason, Clark determined that Lowery should be demoted in order to cover the mechanic's responsibilities adequately and to ensure for Lowery's safety that Lowery not engage in this type of work, which requires climbing scaffolds, working on moving line machinery, crawling in and around it, and bending and stooping. I credit the testimony of Wilson and Clark. Respondent presented evidence of prior instances where other employees were discharged or demoted as a result of physical conditions precluding their regular attendance and/or their ability to perform the full range of their duties.

I find the General Counsel has failed to make a prima facie case of a violation of the Act by Respondent's demotion of Lowery. I find no relationship between Lowery's concerted activity and his demotion has been established. Rather, I find that the evidence presented by the parties discloses only that Lowery was demoted for sound business reasons concerning his inability to be available for work as a mechanic, and Respondent's legitimate concern for his safety and that of others. I observed Lowery and he appeared to me to be rather frail and unsteady on his feet. I find that his demotion to a sitting job was not the result of discrimination but was consistent with Respondent's past practice of demoting or discharging employees who are unable to be available for work or to perform the full range of duties of their job. I note also that Lowery was told there are other jobs that he may bid on but has declined to do so. I thus find, assuming arguendo, that the General Counsel proved a prima facie case, that it has been rebutted by Respondent by a preponderance of the evidence. Wright Line; Roure Bertrand Dupont; and NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., supra.

D. The Alleged Denial of Representation to Dennis Roberts

Former employee Dennis Roberts testified that on 24 April 1986 he was working on his machine along with his coworker Marie Tyner and that his supervisor, Robert Tomek, failed to arrive at 5 a.m. to relieve Tyner and Roberts for their break. Roberts had a restroom emergency and left the machine telling Tyner that she could run the machine by herself. When he returned the machine was shut down and Tyner told him that he was "in trouble" and that Tomek wanted to see him at 7 a.m. (after the end of the shift). Roberts testified that before going to see Tomek, he stopped by and saw union bargaining committee head Lee Kirkland who told him to ask for union representation. Roberts testified that when he arrived at Tomek's office, two other supervisors, Tony Martin and Terry Alright, were also in the office and heard what transpired. Roberts told Tomek he wanted union representation and Tomek told him "you're not going to get it" and then asked him (Roberts) why he had shut the machine off. Roberts replied that Tyner had shut the machine off whereupon Tomek said, "We'll see about this," and, according to the testimony of Roberts, "stormed" out to see Tyner. Roberts watched Tomek talking to Tyner briefly and then left and went home. About 10 a.m. Roberts was awakened by his wife, who told him the Company (Personnel Administrator James Knox) wanted him to come to the office because he was being terminated. On his arrival Roberts was told he was being terminated for placing bad wire on the machine. Tomek testified that the restroom incident had occurred on 20 April, the night before the termination incident, and that when he (Tomek) had seen Tyner standing by the machine that had been shut off, Tomek inquired where Roberts was and why the machine had been turned off because he was not substantially late to relieve them. Tomek testified Tyner told him that Roberts had to go to the restroom and that he (Tomek) then did nothing more about it because he perceived this to be an essential reason for leaving which the employer must accept even if it means lost productivity. Tomek denied that he had any discussion of the restroom incident with Roberts or any meeting in his office where Roberts requested union representation or he (Tomek) made any inquiry of Roberts concerning the matter. Tomek's testimony was corroborated in part by Supervisor Tony Martin who denied that he was present at a meeting between Tomek and Roberts.

Tomek further testified that the following night he ordered Roberts to replace a damaged blade on his machine and that Roberts did not follow his previous instructions about how to replace the blade and that it was consequently shattered when the machine was started. Tomek testified that this had happened previously and he therefore said nothing to Roberts but went up to his office and prepared a suspension recommendation for Roberts based on his job performance. At shift change Tomek presented the recommendation to Supervisor George Hyde who told Tomek that this was the second incident for Roberts who had been suspended previously for poor performance and that this would accordingly mean Roberts should be terminated. Tomek and Hyde then reviewed this with Personnel Administrator Knox because all terminations must be reviewed by personnel before implementation, and it was agreed that Roberts should be terminated, whereupon Knox placed the call to Roberts' home because Roberts had left at 7 a.m.

Knox and Tomek testified that when Roberts arrived he requested union representation but was told by Knox that he was not entitled to it because Respondent was informing him of a decision, which had already been made, to discharge him. Hyde testified that the restroom incident was considered in making the termination decision, although no mention of it appears in the termination notice.

The General Counsel contends that a violation should be found in the restroom incident, by the crediting of Roberts' testimony and also in the termination interview because there was some discussion of the reasons for termination. Respondent contends that Roberts' testimony should not be credited and that the termination incident was not an investigatory meeting.

It is well settled that in a union setting, employees who are called to participate in an investigatory interview where they have reasonable cause to believe they may be subject to discipline are entitled to union representation on their request. See NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975). However, no such representation is afforded employees if they are merely being informed of a decision that has already been made Lucky Stores, 275 NLRB 1438, 1441 (1985).

I credit the testimony of Roberts concerning his request for representation made of Tomek on his entering the office and that Tomek refused this request. Although I have previously discredited Roberts as an unreliable witness, I find his testimony in this instance to be specific and credible, particularly in view of Supervisor Hyde's testimony that the restroom incident was considered in making the decision to terminate Roberts. I find it likely that Roberts shouted to Tomek (as he did on the stand) that he wanted union representation and that Tomek in a kneejerk reaction denied him representation and then asked Roberts why he had shut down the machine. I thus find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by the refusal of Assistant Supervisor Tomek to honor Roberts' request for union representation during an investigatory interview, which Roberts had reasonable cause to believe could lead to disciplinary action against him.

Regarding the termination incident, I note as pointed out by Respondent that this was not originally alleged as a violation in the complaint. I also find that this was not an investigatory interview that would entitle Roberts to union representation and thus, Respondent's refusal to grant such representation was not violative of the Act.

E. The Alleged Unilateral Imposition of Discipline in August 1986 by Respondent in Connection with Cross-Training and the Wearing of Identification Badges

It is undisputed that Respondent has long had a cross-training program requiring employees to train on other jobs and that it has required the wearing of identification badges. However, the General Counsel contends that in August 1986 it initiated a program of discipline in connection with each of these two matters, and did so unilaterally without first bargaining these changes with the Union. The record, however, contains no testimony or evidence that the Respondent initiated a disciplinary program in connection with cross-training in August 1986, except for the testimony of employee Margie Owens who stated that she willingly engaged in cross-training and worked in other areas and that employees just did it.

Owens testified further that she had been wearing her ID badge, "[m]aybe, not quite a year. I don't know," and she had been told by her supervisor that if she did not have her badge she would "be wrote up" or "[w]e would get points," but that "it wouldn't go in your files," and that "[h]e just explained that it's best, you know, safer that we wore them." Additionally the General Counsel called Jim Clark, Respondent's director of human resources, who testified that there was a series of communications concerning the wearing of identification badges, that some written material was distributed to the supervisors concerning a procedure initiated by the loss prevention council, a safety-related committee, to offer better security within the facility but that he did not believe it was announced verbally. Clark testified that he believed that the standard disciplinary procedure program of counseling, written warning, suspension, and discharge referring to Respondent's rules for failure to wear safety equipment was utilized in wearing ID badges. Clark testified further that there was no announcement in August concerning discipline in connection with the cross-training program and that employees who fail to perform have always been subject to discipline and that the announcement of discipline for failure to engage in cross-training had been made to employees before August and before his own employment with Respondent, which dates back to December 1985. In September 1987 the Local leadership of the Union filed a charge with the NLRB based on these alleged unilateral changes. At a negotiating meeting in October and on four subsequent occasions, Respondent offered to bargain concerning these matters and to delete them if necessary, but the Union refused to discuss them, instead relying on its unfair labor practice charge to resolve them.

I find that the evidence submitted by the General Counsel is insufficient to prove that the Respondent initiated a change in August 1987, by the imposition of discipline in accordance with cross-training. There was no direct testimony about how such a change was implemented or by whom it was implemented, nor was there any indirect evidence of such change. The testimony of Clark supports a finding that a disciplinary program was instituted in the August timeframe in connection with the wearing of identification badges. Additionally, the testimony of Owens shows that the employees were informed of some form of discipline in this program. I find that the General Counsel has thus established a prima facie case of a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by the unilateral implementation of a disciplinary procedure in wearing identification badges. I find that the Respondent has failed to rebut this prima facie case by the preponderance of the evidence because it is clear that such discipline was not covered by its safety regulations about wearing protective clothing and equipment. I also do not find that the violation is a mere technical violation as argued by Respondent. Nor do I find that the violation was remedied by the Respondent's offer to withdraw the disciplinary procedure in the wearing of identification badges.

F. The Withdrawal of Recognition

It is undisputed that in December 1986 the employees circulated a petition signed by 434 out of a bargaining unit of 761 employees declaring that the employees no longer wished to be represented by the Union and that the Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union in February 1987, assertedly on the basis of a good-faith doubt based on objective considerations. There is no allegation that the Respondent engaged in surface bargaining nor was there any evidence of supervisory taint of the petition. The General Counsel, however, alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its withdrawal of recognition because the petition was not circulated in an atmosphere free of unfair labor practices, relying on all the allegations discussed above. I find, however, that in view of my finding of only the two violations of the Act by Respondent, as set forth above, this allegation of the complaint should also be dismissed because I find that these violations were not sufficient to significantly contribute to the loss of majority. One violation occurred in April, another in August, 8 and 4 months, respectively, before the circulation of the petition in December and was remote in time. Moreover, in the overall context of the relationship of the parties, I do not deem these violations to have been significant enough to have caused the loss of majority particularly in view of Respondent's five offers to the Union to bargain concerning the unilateral change, all of which were rejected by the Union and the denial of union representation to a single employee by a low-level supervisor. I find that the recent case of Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 282 NLRB 182, 183 (1986), is controlling because in that case the Board found that the employer had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally changing its layoff policy and unlawfully laying off three employees for 12 weeks. In that case the Board stated:

> [W]e do not view that Respondent's July violation as having been of such a character so as to preclude the Respondent from asserting a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status some 8 months later in March 1983. As we do not view lightly the Respondent's unlawful unilateral change in July, we do note that this conduct directly affected only three employees who may otherwise have remained working during the layoff absent the Respondent's unlawful unilateral action. Furthermore, the Respondent advanced a reasonable business justification for wishing to retain the junior maintenance employees during the period of the layoff. Moreover, the Respondent continued to meet and bargain with the Union for almost 8 months thereafter. In these circumstances, we cannot conclude that the Respondent's unlawful conduct in July caused the massive disaffection from the Union evident in the employee petition or that it had such a lingering effect so as to taint the Respondent's reliance on that petition as the basis for a good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status.

I thus find that the Respondent did not violate the Act by its withdrawal of recognition from the Union in February 1986.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent, Purolator Products, Inc. and its successor Purolator Products, Inc., Division of Facet Enterprises, Inc., is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. United Paperworkers International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent did not violate the Act by reason of its termination of Minnie Blount or its demotion of Willie Lowery.

4. The Respondent did not violate the Act by its alleged threat of plant closure.

5. The Respondent violated the Act by denying Dennis Roberts union represenation during an investigatory interview concerning his shutdown of a machine but no violation occurred concerning the discharge meeting.

6. The Respondent violated the Act by its unilateral imposition of a disciplinary procedure concerning the wearing of employee identification badges, but did not violate the Act concerning disciplinary procedure regarding its cross-training.

7. The Respondent did not violate the Act by its withdrawal of recognition from the Union in February 1987, based on objective considerations of a lack of majority of employees' support.

8. The above unfair labor practice affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

The Respondent shall be ordered to cease and desist from engaging in any violation of the Act and to remedy its unfair labor practice by withdrawing the disciplinary procedure in connection with the wearing of identification badges with the employees and to rescind any discipline it may have subsequently imposed on its employees pursuant to the policy and make them whole for any losses incurred as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1980), with interest as calculated in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1173 (1987). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 134 NLRB 716 (1962), and to post the appropriate notice. In view of my finding that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its withdrawal of recognition from the Union, I am not including a bargaining order in the recommended remedy. I also do not find that the General Counsel has demonstrated the necessity for a visitatorial clause.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The Respondent, Purolator Products, Inc. and its successor Purolator Products, Inc., Division of Facet Enterprises, Inc., Fayetteville, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Denying employees union representation on their request during investigatory interviews.

(b) Unilaterally imposing a disciplinary procedure on its employees concerning the wearing of employee identification badges without first having bargained and reached agreement with the employees collective-bargaining representative.

---

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Rescind any disciplinary actions taken pursuant to the unlawful unilaterally instituted disciplinary policy in connection with the wearing of identification badges and make whole any employee disciplined under such policy for any loss of pay or benefits, with interest in the manner set out in the remedy section of this decision for any loss they may have incurred as a result thereof.

(b) Remove from their files, and ask the Employer to remove from the Employer's files, any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that it has done so and that it will not use the discharges against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Fayetteville, North Carolina facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges unfair labor practices not specifically found.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

July 21, 1988

DECISION AND ORDER

By Chairman Stephens and Members Johansen and Babson

On April 13, 1987, Administrative Law Judge Nancy M. Sherman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions, as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order[2] as modified and set out in full below.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by giving its employees the impression of surveillance. We further agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by demoting and discharging employee Arthur Vasquez and by discharging employee Avdo Hukic.

The Respondent excepts to the judge's conclusion that it unlawfully refused to hire four employees of Chemco Corporation (Chemco) when it replaced Chemco as the maintenance contractor at the United Parcel Service (UPS) Northbrook, Illinois facility on May 24, 1985. The Respondent had retained all former Chemco employees when it took over maintenance operations at four other UPS facilities a month earlier. For the reasons set forth below, we find merit in the Respondent's exceptions.

The judge's conclusion of unlawful retaliatory motivation turns on her finding that the General Counsel made a "prima facie showing that Respondent refused to hire the Northbrook employees at least partly because Respondent feared that they would participate in the Union's pressures, including a threatened strike, in an effort to obtain a higher contractual wage rate than Respondent wanted to pay." Earlier in her opinion the judge characterized these union-related considerations as "about the same" as those that had led to the aforementioned unlawful conduct against employees Vasquez and Hukic. We disagree.

The union-related considerations were not "about the same" for the Northbrook employees as for Vasquez and Hukic. Those two discriminatees had been outspoken complainants about the Respondent's wage reduction plans and proponents of strike action, especially during union meetings of May 13 and 20, 1985. On the other hand, one of four Northbrook employees was not a union member, and there is no evidence that any of the three members held union office or that these four employees engaged in any union activity other than attending the May 13 union meeting, at which the new collective-bargaining agreement between Chemco and the Union was announced. In particular, there is no evidence that any Northbrook employee attended the May 20 union meeting at which former Chemco employees already in the Respondent's employ discussed strike action. Since, as found and emphasized by the judge, the Respondent's officials knew what transpired at these meetings, they knew that the Northbrook employees were not engaging in the same union activities as Vasquez and Hukic and had not yet indicated any predilection to strike in an effort to resist wage reductions by the Respondent. Even in the May 21-24 communications with the Respondent about the Northbrook employees' hiring prospects, there is no evidence of any wage or other contract demands by those employees. Consistent with this absence of significant union activity by Northbrook employees, there is no evidence that Vice President and Sales Manager Jack Sullivan or any other agent of the Respondent expressed any union animus in dealing with the Northbrook employees.

Furthermore, there is uncontroverted evidence supporting the Respondent's assertion that it did not hire the Northbrook Chemco employees because of difficulties it had experienced with former Chemco employees at the four UPS facilities it had begun servicing in the beginning of May. Although the Respondent unlawfully discharged Vasquez and Hukic, it also took the following actions, none of which have been alleged to be unlawful: termi-

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In accordance with our decision in New Horizons for the Retarded, 283 NLRB 1178 (1987), interest on and after January 1, 1987, shall be computed at the "short-term Federal rate" for the underpayment of taxes as set out in the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621. Interest on amounts accrued prior to January 1, 1987 (the effective date of the 1986 amendment to 26 U.S.C. § 6621), shall be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

[2] The judge's recommended Order includes a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States Court of Appeals enforcing the Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause in the Order.

nated two former Chemco employees at the Addison facility for leaving work early and punching another employee's timecard; issued warning notices for poor work performance and subsequently terminated three former Chemco employees at the Bedford Park facility; and expressed dissatisfaction with the quality of work performed at its other UPS locations. Furthermore, it had received reports of deficiencies in its service from UPS.

Based on the foregoing, we find that the evidence is insufficient to establish that the Respondent unlawfully refused to hire the four Northbrook employees. Accordingly, we will dismiss the complaint allegation regarding this action.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Contract Cleaning Maintenance, Inc., Chicago, Illinois, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Giving its employees the impression of surveillance over their union activity.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

NANCY M. SHERMAN, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard before me in Chicago, Illinois, on 17 through 20 November 1986. The charge in Case 12-CA-25063 was filed on 15 May 1985, and the original complaint in that case was issued on 24 June 1985. The charge in Case 13-CA-25145 (as corrected at hearing) was filed on 19 June 1985. A consolidated complaint in both cases was filed on 18 June and amended on 27 June and 18 November 1986.[1] The complaint in its final form alleges that Respondent Contract Cleaning Maintenance, Inc. (counsel were assisted by two senior law students, Elizabeth Grapentine and Christing Naylor) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by creating an impression among employees that their union activities were under surveillance and by threatening an employee with discharge because of his union activities. The complaint further alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by demoting and then discharging employee Arthur Vasquez; by discharging employee Avdo Hukic; and by refusing to hire employees Radmila Marsenic, Johnnie King, Francisco Flores, and Josef Skocz; all in order to discourage membership in General Service Employees Union, Local No. 73, Service Employees International Union (the Union).

On the entire record,[2] including the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is an Illinois corporation, with an office and place of business in Chicago, Illinois. Respondent has at all times material been engaged in the operation of a janitorial service facility. During the calendar year 1985, a representative year, Respondent, in the course and conduct of such business operations, provided services within Illinois valued in excess of $50,000 for United Parcel Service (UPS). UPS is a business enterprise directly engaged in interstate commerce. The Board has repeatedly exercised jurisdiction over UPS's operations for reasons other than its indirect outflow or indirect inflow.[3] I find that, as Respondent admits, it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act. I further find that assertion of jurisdiction over Respondent's operations will effectuate the policies of the Act. Siemons Mailing Service, 122 NLRB 81, 85 (1958).

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

[1] Over Respondent's objection, a motion for leave to amend the complaint in additional respects was granted on 20 November 1986. The February 1987 posthearing brief of counsel for the General Counsel states that he "withdraws" this amendment, and that in December 1986 Respondent's counsel was notified of the General Counsel's intention in his brief to "withdraw" this amendment. No objection to such "withdrawal" has been advanced in Respondent's posthearing brief, which does not discuss the "withdrawn" allegations. I take the foregoing statements by the General Counsel as constituting a motion for leave to amend the complaint by withdrawing the allegations added by the 20 November 1986 amendment. The motion is granted. See Sec. 102.17 of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

[2] Although all of G.C. Exhs. 10 and 10a are physically in the exhibit folder, only part of them were offered and received into evidence. Although the brief of the General Counsel relies on certain portions that were not received, I have disregarded them in making my findings and conclusions.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

1. Respondent's labor relations history

Respondent's president, Howard Boltz, founded Respondent's business 34 years ago at the suggestion of a business agent of the Union. Respondent had a bargaining agreement with the Union (the first labor organization with which Respondent ever had a bargaining agreement) for 25 years. Respondent had a bargaining agreement with a temporary "off-shoot" of the Union, and has had bargaining agreements covering all its Government jobs in Chicago, Illinois, and in Washington, D.C. When Respondent first acquired a contract to clean UPS's Franklin Park operation (one of those involved here) about 1978, Respondent applied to its employees at that location Respondent's existing bargaining agreement with the Union; this was the first time that any unionized cleaning firm had performed cleaning work for UPS. Respondent has been a party to at least 30 union bargaining agreements. Apart from the charges in the instant case, no unfair labor practice charges have ever been filed against Respondent.

2. Respondent's takeover of certain UPS operations other than Northbrook

Between 1977 (at the latest) and May 1984, a company called Admiral Maintenance performed the cleaning work at five UPS locations in the metropolitan Chicago area—namely, Franklin Park, Bedford Park, Addison, Jefferson, and Northbrook. Between 1 May 1984 and late April 1985, such cleaning work was performed by Chemco Corporation.[4] The Chemco employees who worked at these locations were covered by a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, effective by its terms between April 1984 and 30 April 1985.

About the spring of 1985,[5] Respondent submitted bids for all five of these locations. On 19 April, UPS advised Chemco that its cleaning contract was being terminated for all of these locations except Northbrook. About 20 April, UPS advised Respondent that Chemco was being terminated because UPS was dissatisfied with the quality of Chemco's cleaning, and that Respondent was being awarded the cleaning contracts at these four locations. Like Chemco's cleaning contracts covering the UPS facilities, Respondent's cleaning contracts covering such facilities permitted UPS to cancel the contract on 7 days' notice. Respondent took over the cleaning work for the Jefferson location on 28 April; for the Bedford Park location on 29 April; and for the Franklin Park and Addison locations on 1 May.

UPS is a "union company," which regards it as necessary or advisable for its cleaning contractor to enter into a union contract regarding employees who work at UPS locations, and to work in harmony with the existing work force. Before signing these cleaning contracts, UPS had told Respondent that it had to work in harmony with the Union. When Respondent learned that it was taking over these four locations, it so notified the Union by telephone, and further told the Union that Respondent was going to keep the same standards that the Union had in its bargaining agreement with Chemco, except that there would be no more lead persons. Respondent hired all the former Chemco employees who had been working at these four facilities. Further, except that Respondent did not pay a premium for a lead person, Respondent maintained the standards that had been observed under Chemco, including seniority, sick days, and (initially) a pay rate of $12.46 an hour. Respondent never received from UPS any evaluation of any individual's work under Chemco or under Respondent.

B. Events Before 13 May 1985

1. Vasquez

A few days before Respondent took over the Franklin Park facility, it was inspected by Frank Corona (Respondent's operations manager), Jack Sullivan (Respondent's vice president and sales manager), and Raymond Palmowski (Respondent's project manager), all of them admittedly supervisors within the meaning of the Act.[6] UPS' maintenance supervisor at that site, between early 1985 and June 1986, was Michael Forti, who had also been UPS' maintenance supervisor at Northbrook for a few months when alleged discriminatee Arthur Vasquez was working there. Chemco's then cleaning crew at the Franklin Park facility consisted of Vasquez, Eddie Steele, Ursula Malinowski, and a nonunit employee whom the record identifies as "Christina." Toward the end of the cleaning employees' shift, about 6:30 a.m., Forti introduced Corona, Sullivan, and Palmowski to cleaning employees Vasquez and Steele. Palmowski said, "If you do good work, we'll keep you. If not, we fire you." Forti said that Vasquez and Steele were "probably two of our better workers," that there had never been any problems with them, and that every time Forti went to either of them with a complaint or a question, they were cooperative and attentive to the problem. Then Forti, Respondent's management representatives, Vasquez, and Steele discussed what supplies were need, where they were kept, and what was to be done to solve consistent problems that had cropped up. Later that evening, Palmowski asked Steele what the employees' current wages were and appeared surprised at the answer. Palmowski said that if the Chemco employees at Franklin Park wanted to work for Respondent, they would have to come down that afternoon and fill out an application. They did so. All three unit employees were taken over by Respondent.

[4] This is the spelling used in the transcript of testimony and in the briefs. One of the exhibits suggests that the correct spelling is "KIMCO."

[5] All dates hereafter are 1985 unless otherwise stated.

[6] About August 1985, Palmowski was discharged by Respondent, at least allegedly for poor work. During his discharge interview, he became "very mad." Corona testified that he believed Palmowski is the type of person who would be generally truthful if called to testify under oath, but that Corona would be concerned about Palmowski's veracity if called to testify in the instant proceeding, because Palmowski was very upset when Respondent terminated him. I reject the General Counsel's contention that Palmowski's failure to testify calls for an adverse inference against Respondent.

My findings regarding Forti's remarks are based on a composite of credible parts of the testimony of Vasquez, who is the charging party and was called by the General Counsel, and Forti, who was called by Respondent. Sullivan (admittedly a supervisor) and Steele were also called by Respondent, but were not asked about this conversation. Corona, an admitted supervisor called by Respondent, denied being present in the Franklin Park facility on 27 April 1985 (the date that Vasquez attached to this conversation). Corona, however, testified that he and Palmowski visited the Franklin Park facility on 30 April, before Respondent took it over, and that Corona then talked to Vasquez and Steele; nor did Corona deny that Forti made the remarks that Vasquez attributed to him. Forti testified that his remarks about Vasquez and Steele were based on the fact that they came to work and were cooperative, and that Forti had no way of knowing how well Vasquez performed his particular function. Moreover, Forti testified that overall, he had been dissatisfied with Chemco's work. There is no evidence, however, that Forti drew these limitations to Respondent's attention.

2. Hukic

One of the Chemco employees whom Respondent took over at the Jefferson facility was Avdo Hukic, who had been performing cleaning work at the UPS facilities since 1977. During most of this period, he had been a group leader. Hukic had been a member of the Union since 1977, but had never been president, vice president, or member of the grievance committee, or anything else except a member.

On 24 April 1985, while Chemco was still performing the cleaning work, Corona and Raymond Palmowski conducted a "walk-through" inspection at Jefferson. Corona testified that during this inspection he concluded that the floors (which at that time were being cleaned by Hukic) were scuffed and dingy and had a lot of black marks on them, and that "Right offhand" Corona could not recall noticing any other deficiencies.[7] At the conclusion of this "walk-through," Corona and Palmowski advised all the Chemco employees at that location that under Respondent everything would be basically the same, except that Respondent was going to select its own lead person. In Palmowski's presence, Corona told Hukic to fill out an application for employment with Respondent. Hukic did so on the following day, 25 April.

That evening, Palmowski walked into the Jefferson facility, noticed that employee Frank Sloan was not working that night, and asked Hukic why. Hukic said that Sloan was taking a "personal day." Palmowski said, "How come?" Hukic said that "the contract" gave everyone one "personal day" a year. Palmowski, who was "mad," said that Respondent was going to change "everything," and that Respondent "has got its own people who they are going to pay $3 or $4 an hour. Hukic said that the employees had a union contract. Palmowski said that Respondent was going to change unions, too. He told Hukic to come to the office the next day, 26 April. Hukic did come to the office on the next day and asked Palmowski what he wanted. Palmowski said that after Respondent took over the cleaning contract Hukic would no longer be a lead man, that he would have to clean furniture, and that Sloan would be cleaning floors. Hukic, who had been cleaning floors, said that because he had more seniority than Sloan, the contract prohibited Palmowski from thus compelling Hukic to switch jobs with Sloan. Palmowski said that he did not care about "your contract." Then, Hukic turned to Corona and said that Hukic had been cleaning floors for 8 years, that he had more seniority than Sloan, that Palmowski was requiring them to switch jobs, and that cleaning furniture gave Hukic a headache.[8] Corona said, "We can't have an employee like you are. You should quit. You made too much money by Chemco."

After Respondent took over the Jefferson contract on 28 April, Hukic was required to clean furniture and to wash walls; he testified that Respondent required him to perform more work than Chemco had required. He credibly testified that on the nights of 6–7 and 7–8 May, he did the dusting, the spray wiping, and the glass cleaning as well as he had on previous occasions. About midnight between 8 and 9 May, and not long after Palmowski had entered the Jefferson facility, he gave Hukic an envelope. Hukic asked what it was. Palmowski said, "Open the envelope and read it. Tomorrow you get another one." Hukic asked him how he knew what was going to happen tomorrow. Palmowski said, "I know," and left. The envelope contained "Warning Notice #1," dated 8 May 1985 and signed by Palmowski. The notice stated as the reason:

> POOR PERFORMANCE OF WORK.
> 1. As per walk thru with UPS manager, Russell Strickland on this date (AM), the following chores were not done acceptably: dusting, spray wiping and glass cleaning.[9]

My findings regarding this Hukic-Palmowski conversation are based on Hukic's uncontradicted testimony. Palmowski did not testify (see above fn. 6). Respondent contends that Hukic is unworthy of belief because the warning notice is allegedly corroborated by Strickland's testimony that after a walk-through at Jefferson, he told Palmowski that the quality of work was not acceptable, that Respondent had a problem, and that Palmowski was "to take care of it." Strickland, however, testified that during his May 1985 "walk-through" he checked not only the desks, telephones, and wastepaper baskets (all of which Hukic was supposed to clean), but also the floors (which Sloan was supposed to clean); and that Strickland did not name any individuals whose work was unacceptable; nor is there any evidence that he specified to Palmowski which tasks were being unacceptably performed. Nevertheless, Sloan received no warnings before Hukic's discharge, on 20 May, and Corona testified that Sloan's work was satisfactory during the first 2 weeks of May 1985. Moreover, although Corona testified that before he approved the 8 May warning notice, Palmowski said that he wanted to give Hukic a warning notice because Palmowski had had a walk-through with Strickland, Strickland was not sure whether this walk-through preceded or followed 8 May. Hukic impressed me as an honest witness, and I accept his testimony about this 9 May conversation.

[7] Russell Strickland, who in 1985 was UPS maintenance supervisor at Jefferson, credibly testified that in March 1985 he concluded that the floors had not been buffed nor swept and damp-mopped after buffing. On 1 March 1985 he sent a memorandum so stating to UPS District Manager Edward Strempek. There is no evidence, however, or claim that Strickland ever so advised Respondent, or that Respondent saw this memorandum at any material time.

[8] Hukic testified that he developed headaches from the constant bending, and then standing, which were required by cleaning furniture. There is no evidence, however, that he gave this explanation to Palmowski.

[9] The warning contains no rhetorical par. 2.

Shortly before Hukic was scheduled to begin work on 9 May, Palmowski approached him and gave him "Warning Notice #2." This notice, dated 9 May, gives as the reason, "NOT COMPLETING WORK AS DIRECTED: Rooms 101, 102, 103, 104 downstairs not cleaned at all."[10] Palmowski said, "A lot of people cry on my name. You are going to cry, too." Hukic replied that he never cried, and would get some help from somebody. Then, and still before the scheduled start of his shift, he went to the office of UPS feeder manager Chuck Dwyer, who worked the same hours as Hukic and whose area of responsibility included all the rooms downstairs. Hukic asked Dwyer whether he had seen Hukic clean the downstairs rooms every day. Dwyer said yes, and asked what had happened. Showing him the warning letter, Hukic said that Supervisor Palmowski had given it to Hukic and had said that he did not clean rooms 101–104, all of which are in the downstairs area. Dwyer said that this was not true, and that Hukic had in fact cleaned them. Hukic asked whether Dwyer would be Hukic's witness, if needed. Dwyer said, "Any time." Dwyer credibly testified that Hukic had cleaned the rooms in question, to Dwyer's satisfaction, on 7 and 8 May and every other night. Dwyer, however, has never had any building maintenance responsibility and never made any comments to Respondent about Hukic's work on the shift in question. Moreover, although on 19 April UPS District Maintenance Manager Strempek had terminated Chemco's contract because Chemco's cleaning service failed to meet UPS standards, Dwyer testified that he would have been surprised if he had been advised in April 1985 that Chemco's housekeeping work was so inadequate that UPS decided to change contractors.

Corona testified that before Palmowski issued the warning notice dated 9 May and received by Hukic that same day, Corona approved the notice. He further testified that Palmowski said that UPS had had an audit that stated that "this work was not done. It was deficient . . . Hukic was supposed to correct the problem but, then when [Palmowski] went back to see if the problem was corrected, it wasn't."[11] Further, Corona testified that to assist him in approving the warning, he used a document received in evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 1. Corona initially testified that he received this document from Palmowski on the morning of 8 May; he later testified that "if I would have seen [the document] it would have had to be around May 9th; I don't recall . . . I couldn't really say when I had seen it"; thereafter he testified that he "had a memory of" receiving it on 8 May; then testified that he received it on 9 or 8 May; and eventually testified (while having before him both R. Exh. 1 dated 8 May and the writeup dated 9 May) to having received Respondent's Exhibit 1 on the morning of 9 May. This exhibit consists of a printed form of the kind ordinarily used by UPS to memorialize an audit of cleaning work, with certain handwritten entries, including the date of 8 May. Corona was not asked to explain how he interpreted the entries on this exhibit; and as to the period covered by the exhibit, I can conceive of no interpretation that would support the statement, on the 9 May warning slip, that these four rooms were not cleaned at all.[12] For these and demeanor reasons, I do not credit Corona's testimony that in approving the 9 May warning he used Respondent's Exhibit 1. Also, because of the discrepancies between that document and the assertions on the 9 May warning to Hukic, I find that Palmowski did not in good faith base that warning on that exhibit. Accordingly, I find it unnecessary to determine whether Respondent's Exhibit 1 is authentic.[13] [10] Unlike "Warning Notice No. 1," this second warning notice did not mention Strickland, who credibly testified that during the first 2 weeks of May, he made only one "walk-through" the exact date of which he could not recall. Moreover, he testified that he could not recall whether, during this "walk-through," he had specifically mentioned these particular rooms.

[11] As discussed below, a purported audit of the Jefferson facility was received in evidence as R. Exh. 1. Hukic credibly testified that he had never seen it before. This testimony aside, he was not asked whether Palmowski's alleged representations to Corona were true.

[12] Corona and two UPS supervisors testified that a check mark indicates that an inspected operation was acceptable and an "X" indicates that it was not. If interpreted in accordance with this system, R. Exh. 1 would show that a total of about five cleaning operations in rooms 101 and 103 were acceptably performed; three of these were operations for which Hukic was responsible. Some items under each of the four rooms are marked with an "X," which means either that the service in question was not performed at all or that it was not performed acceptably.

[13] UPS routinely provides the cleaning contractor with copies of all audits. In accordance with UPS' normal business practice, it discarded in January 1986 its file copies of all audits made in 1985; there is no evidence that Respondent, which received in June 1985 the original Board complaint regarding Hukic, ever asked UPS for any file copy of R. Exh. 1.

During the investigation of the instant charges, which regarding employee Peter Lysiak were dismissed by the Regional Office, Respondent provided the Regional Office with a UPS audit that was referred to in a warning notice specifying Respondent's claimed reason for his termination. Corona testified that during the Regional Office's investigation of the charges, he never specified that Hukic was fired because of a bad audit, and never told the General Counsel that Corona had had R. Exh. 1 in his possession between May 1985 and early July 1985, when he gave it to Respondent's counsel. Corona testified, in effect, that Respondent failed to provide R. Exh. 1 during the investigation because it was not mentioned in Hukic's warnings (although, as previously noted, Corona testified that he used the exhibit to assist him in approving the 9 May warning). UPS' investigation showed that R. Exh. 1 was not written by any of the UPS personnel whose jobs during this period included the preparation of audits. Moreover, a first-page entry apparently purporting to show on the exhibit a performance rating of 25 percent regarding the material covered by the exhibit could not have been prepared in accordance with UPS' practice in ascertaining such a percentage; UPS' system shows a performance rating of about 45 percent. This "performance-rating" notation is made in colored ink, although the "X's" and check-marks were on the document when it was photocopied and Forti testified that Respondent's management usually waited a few minutes while UPS made copies of an audit.

C. Alleged Interference, Restraint, and Coercion; the Alleged Unlawful Demotion of Vasquez

When Respondent took over the janitorial work at the UPS Franklin Park facility on 1 May, the janitorial employees, all of whom had worked there for Chemco, consisted of Vasquez, Steele, Malinowski, and Jose Fuentes. In addition to performing janitorial work, until 13 May Vasquez acted as group leader, a position he had also held under Chemco. His duties as such consisted of ordering and keeping up stock and what he described as "supervising" the rest of the employees; Respondent concedes that at no material time was he a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Chemco had paid him a group-leader premium of 25 cents an hour; Respondent paid him and other group leaders the same as other unit employees.[14]

Steele testified that in his opinion, Vasquez' buffing was unacceptable because it missed spots. Steele further testified that on an unspecified date before 13 May, he told Palmowski that Steele and Malinowski were doing all the work, that Vasquez was not helping them, and that the workload was almost too much for Steele and Malinowski. Steele was not asked whether Palmowski replied; Palmowski and Malinowski did not testify (see above fn. 6). I do not credit the testimony of Steele summarized in this paragraph. Such testimony is difficult to reconcile with his further testimony that he did not complain about Vasquez to Chemco, regarded it as "fair" that Vasquez was a group leader (at a premium rate) under Chemco, and had no resentment at all against him, even though Vasquez was allegedly not doing any work, allegedly performed poor-quality work, and was junior to (and much younger than) Steele. Moreover, Steele at other points in his testimony admitted that Vasquez cleaned the dispatch building and the Fullerton building, and buffed in the Rose building (where Steele spent all of his working day). Furthermore, it is uncontradicted that when changing the work schedule of other members of the Franklin Park cleaning crew on 13 May (see above), Palmowski gave Steele the additional duties of group leader without changing his janitorial duties at all.

About 13 May 1985 Howard Boltz, Respondent's president, received from the Union a telegram requesting a meeting on 15 May to negotiate a contract for Respondent's cleaning employees at UPS. The telegram stated, inter alia, "We are determined to protect [our members'] wages, working conditions and fringe benefits." As previously noted, Respondent was then paying such employees the $12.46 hourly rate set forth in the Union's expired contract with Chemco. Boltz testified to the belief that the prevailing rate for such work in the area was $8.20. Respondent's contract with UPS called for a specified fixed monthly payment from UPS to Respondent.

On 13 May, alleged discriminatee Arthur Vasquez telephoned the group leaders at the various UPS buildings and told them that Respondent's UPS employees were to meet at 8:30 or 9 a.m. that day at the union hall to discuss their contract situation with their union representative. This meeting was attended by 18 or 20 employees, including all 4 of the employees who were then working for Chemco at Northbrook, and whom (the complaint alleges) Respondent discriminatorily refused on 24 May to hire for the Northbrook location, taken over by Respondent on 27 May (see below). During this meeting, Union Representative Edward Radik announced that Chemco had signed a 2-year contract calling for a wage increase of 68 cents an hour. Vasquez said that Respondent's employees "couldn't hesitate too much longer, working without a contract," and that the employees needed to have a contract signed "soon." Also at this meeting, alleged discriminatee Avdo Hukic expressed concern at the fact that Respondent's employees were working without a contract, and further complained about the two warning letters that he had received. Further, employees Jan Guzik and Franciszka Guzik complained about warnings that Respondent had given them on 1 May. Among those who attended this meeting was employee Steele, who testimonially denied telling anyone in management what happened there.

Operations Manager Corona testified that he did not recall any persons telling him about this meeting, and that he found out about it when Respondent received the Union's 13 May mailgram seeking a bargaining meeting. Corona further testified to having read and then signed a document that he described as an "affidavit," and that concludes with the language, "I have read the statement . . . I fully understand its contents, and I certify that it is true and correct to the best of my knowledge . . . . Subscribed and sworn to before me . . . this 30th day of May, 1985. Robert Bell, Board agent, National Labor Relations Board," with the signature of Bell, admittedly the Board agent who investigated this case. This document states, inter alia:

> From about May 13 employees told us that they were having a union meeting. We had written several employees up, Avdo and the Guziks. Employees wanted to know whether there would have been a contract, whether the union would have a contract with us.

Over Respondent's timely objection, this material was received into the record to establish the truth of the contents.[15]

After, but on the same day as the 13 May meeting, Vasquez reported to work at 10 p.m., his usual hour. About 11:30 p.m., while Vasquez was performing his work, employee Steele came up to him and told him that Palmowski wanted to see him in the office. Then, Steele led him to the office, where Palmowski was waiting. Palmowski told Steele to fetch the rest of the cleaning crew. After Steele had left the room, Palmowski remarked to Vasquez, "You like to play dumb games . . . I tried calling you last night and let the phone ring for a half hour and you didn't answer.[16] How is your Communist party doing? I hear you're a Communist leader." Vasquez, who has never been a member of a Communist party and had never discussed politics with Palmowski, said that Vasquez did not know what Palmowski was talking about. Palmowski said, "Well, I hear everything that goes down in the Union . . . . How did the Guziks and Avdo like their reprimands?"

At this point, the rest of the cleaning crew, including Steele, came into the office. Then, Palmowski alleged to Vasquez that the floors had not been buffed in over a week. Vasquez said that he was following a written schedule calling for him to buff the offices twice a week.[17] Palmowski went on to say that Vasquez was no longer the crew's group leader, that Steele would be the group leader from now on, and that the crew should go to Steele with any problems. Further, Palmowski transferred to Malinowski some of the duties that had previously been performed by Fuentes, and transferred to Vasquez some of the duties that had previously been performed by Malinowski. In addition, Palmowski instructed Vasquez to do the buffing of the offices on a nightly basis. Also, Palmowski instructed Fuentes to buff the upstairs floors on a nightly basis.[18] No changes were made in Steele's janitorial duties.

My findings regarding Palmowski's remarks to Vasquez, although they were alone in the office, are based on Vasquez' uncontradicted testimony. Palmowski did not testify (see above at fn. 6). Corona corroborated Vasquez' testimony that on the following day, 14 May, he told Corona that Palmowski had called Vasquez a Communist because he had attended a union meeting on 13 May, and that if Palmowski could not address him in a "business manner," he would prefer that Palmowski not talk to him at all. Moreover, Corona testified that he told Palmowski about Vasquez' telephone call. Further, Steele testified that after he became leadman, but before Vasquez' discharge on 21 May, Palmowski remarked to Steele that Palmowski had heard that Vasquez had told Corona that Palmowski had called Vasquez a Communist. Because of Steele's and Corona's testimony in this respect, and demeanor considerations, I credit Vasquez' testimony about what Palmowski told him privately, notwithstanding Respondent's contention that such testimony should be discredited because Steele testified that the group-leader change was announced to the employees while they were in the lunchroom.

D. The Allegedly Unlawful Discharge of Hukic

During a bargaining session on 15 May, the Union asked Respondent to sign an agreement that increased direct wages by $1 an hour, to $13.46, and was otherwise identical to the Union's expired contract with Chemco. As previously noted, Company President Boltz believed that the prevailing wage in the area for such work was $8.20 an hour. He told Union Representative Radik that Respondent was not willing to pay any more than that. Corona credibly testified at one point that during this 15 May bargaining session, Radik stated that during the 13 May union meeting Hukic, among others, had protested some writeups he had received. Corona, however, elsewhere testified that Radik did not name the employees who attended the meeting or who there complained about their writeups, and that Corona did not know whether Hukic had spoken out at the union meeting. On the following day, 16 May, Corona telephoned Radik that the wages in the Union's proposed contract were too high. Radik said that he had to have an answer by the next day, 17 May. Corona said that on that day Respondent would notify Radik whether it would go along with the Union's proposal.

Corona testified that the decision to discharge Hukic was made by himself and Palmowski, and was made on Thursday, 16 May, or Friday, 17 May. Corona further testified that he based his decision on a report from Palmowski that Hukic's "work hasn't improved since the job class—since he was changed and the work wasn't getting done properly." There is no evidence that Hukic had been criticized for his work since receiving the warning notice, dated 9 May, which was allegedly, but not in fact, based on Respondent's Exhibit 1.

By telegram dated 17 May, Boltz advised the Union that its proposed contract was "unacceptable." He testified that by that time he was fearful of a strike. By mailgram sent that same day to all the unit employees, Corona stated that Respondent "does not recognize the Union . . . at your job location. If you choose to continue employment with us you must be appraised [sic] of our company's wages and working conditions that become effective Sunday May 19, 1985. Contact our office Saturday by phoning . . . for this information."[19] Among the employees to whom Corona sent this 17 May mailgram was Hukic, whom Corona and Palmowski allegedly decided on 16 or 17 May to discharge. Corona testified that on 17 May, he and Palmowski asked employee Maria Zawartka, who at that time was working for Respondent at another location, whether she "wanted that job" and that she said, "Yes." Zawartka, who at the time of the hearing still worked for Respondent, did not testify. Corona testified that Zawartka had Park employee whom Palmowski wanted to work at the Addison location.

[17] As previously noted, this conference took place on 13 May, a Monday. Under Vasquez' buffing schedule, the upstairs offices would not have been buffed since Thursday, 9 May, and the downstairs offices would not have been buffed since Wednesday, 8 May.

[18] My findings in these two sentences are based on Vasquez' undenied testimony. Vasquez described the building where he and Fuentes performed these duties as the "main building." Vasquez' other testimony indicates that he habitually refers to the Fullerton building as the "main building." Steele's testimony refers to the Rose building as the "main building." Both men testified that the building they respectively described as the "main building" was not the building equipped with an alarm system.

[19] Corona testified that Respondent did not consult with an attorney before drafting and sending this letter, and that Respondent thereafter continued to bargain with the Union. Neither the charges nor the complaint contains an 8(a)(5) allegation. For this reason, and because the propriety of Respondent's bargaining with the Union was not litigated before me, I reject the General Counsel's contention (Br. at 11) that union animus and a discriminatory motive are shown by "Respondent's withdrawal of recognition," and the fact that the employees' wage cut was effected unilaterally.

to be trained for Hukic's job, and that 19-20 May was the earliest shift during which she could be trained.

On 18 May, Hukic received his copy of the 17 May mailgram to employees. Thereafter, on 18 or 19 May, he telephoned Respondent's office and spoke to President Boltz. After identifying himself, Hukic asked what the telegram meant. Boltz said that from then on, Respondent was going to pay Hukic $8.20 an hour, rather than the $12.46 he had been receiving. Hukic said, "We've got a contract with union. You can't destroy union." Boltz said, "Yes, I can"; and asked whether Hukic was still coming to work. Hukic said that he thought so. Boltz said that the conversation was being tape recorded. Hukic said that he did not care. He went on to say that on the following Monday, 20 May, he was going to talk to the Union, and, if necessary, to the Labor Department and "Washington, D.C." Boltz said that this was a good idea.[20]

On Sunday evening, 19 May, Palmowski drove Zawartka to the Jefferson Avenue facility. That evening, both Sloan and Hukic were working there. Palmowski told Hukic, "As of tonight, [Zawartka] is going to work with you. You have to teach her tonight, show her how and what she has to do." Further, Palmowski made certain representations to Hukic about how much Boltz allegedly had paid for recording on Saturday the telephone calls made in response to the mailgrams.[21] In accordance with Palmowski's instructions, Hukic showed her the work. Although teaching new employees had been among Hukic's duties as group leader, he was no longer a group leader. Zawartka is Polish-speaking. Palmowski speaks Polish and knew that Hukic, although ethnically Yugoslavian, is able to speak Polish. The record fails to show whether Sloan can speak Polish.

The shift worked by Hukic, Sloan, and Zawartka ended at 6:30 a.m. on 20 May. About 8:30 or 9 that same morning, about 15 people, including Hukic and Vasquez, attended another union meeting. The employees showed to the union representatives the 17 May mailgrams that the employees had received. The union representatives expressed surprise at the mailgrams, of which these representatives had not been informed. The employees also told the Union about the 30-percent cut in their wages. Radik said that the employees could strike if they wanted to, but that they should wait until the Union sent out strike notices to Respondent, the UPS, and the Teamsters Union. Meanwhile, Radik said, the employees should go to work. Vasquez expressed the view that a strike would be the employees' only choice in the matter. Steele, who attended this meeting, testified that he never told anyone in management what happened there. The record fails to show whether Zawartka attended.

Corona testified that between 10 and 11 a.m. on 20 May, Steele, Hukic, and several other employees telephoned Corona's secretary (who noted these calls on a memo pad) that they were going to come to work and that the Union had told them to come to work if they wanted to keep their jobs. On 20 or (more likely) 21 May, Respondent received from the Union a mailgram, dated 20 May and bearing the hour of 2:14 p.m. eastern standard time (that is, 1:14 p.m. central standard time and 2:14 p.m. central daylight time), which stated, "Since you refuse to recognize the existing contract . . . we are hereby notifying you of impending strike action."[22] Corona testified that on 20 May, at an hour that he was not asked to give, he asked Zawartka what she thought of the job, and again asked her whether she wanted it; and that she again said yes. Corona further testified that, thereafter, on a date and at an hour he was not asked to give, he told Palmowski to terminate Hukic. Shortly after 4 p.m. on 20 May, Palmowski telephoned Hukic and, without giving him a reason, told him that he was fired. Thereafter, Zawartka performed Hukic's job at an initial rate of $5 an hour.

Corona testified that he visited the Jefferson facility on at least two occasions after Respondent took it over on 28 April 1985, and that he observed deficiencies in the cleaning of both the floors and the furniture, which were the respective responsibilities of Sloan and Hukic before Hukic's discharge. The record fails to show whether these visits were made before or after Hukic's discharge.

E. The Allegedly Unlawful Discharge of Vasquez

1. Sequence of events

About 2 a.m. on Friday, 17 May, Palmowski handed Vasquez an envelope and said, "Welcome to the Company." The envelope contained a "Warning Notice #1 dated 15 May, signed by Palmowski and stating that a copy had been sent to Corona. The warning stated, in part, "Poor peformance of work, especially buffing. You have five days to bring your work up to the degree of cleanliness expected by UPS . . . . You spend too much time driving electric cart." On an undisclosed date before 13 May, UPS Maintenance Manager Forti had complained to Palmowski that Vasquez was using an electric cart that was needed by UPS personnel to do their own work. On 1 May, however, Corona had seen Vasquez use an electric cart to move supplies for Respondent. Moreover, on undisclosed dates before 17 May, Vasquez had used the electric cart to drive Palmowski to his car in the parking lot. Nonetheless, before Palmowski gave Vasquez this document, nobody from Respondent, UPS, or Chemco had ever told him not to use the electric cart, which he had been using to shuttle supplies between the buildings and to haul garbage.[23]

[20] My findings in this paragraph are based on a composite of credible parts of the testimony of Hukic and Boltz. Boltz testified that this telephone conversation was initiated by him. He further testified that apart from initially stating (in response to Boltz' alleged inquiry) that Hukic had not received the mailgram, Hukic said nothing at all; Boltz specifically denied that Hukic said he would check with the Union. Because the telegram did not specify the employees' future wage rate, and because Hukic has a limited command of English (which is not his native language), I regard his version of the conversation as more probable than Boltz' version. Further, because Boltz admittedly never advised Hukic that the tapes of this conversation had been erased by reuse, Hukic had every reason to believe, when he testified, that the tape would impeach any misstatements by him regarding the conversation. Moreover, Hukic's demeanor impressed me more favorably than did Boltz'. Accordingly, I credit Hukic.

[21] It is unclear whether the $100 figure given by Palmowski referred to $100 per call, $100 for the calls made to or by Boltz (about 3), or $100 for all the calls made by any management personnel (14 at most).

[22] My finding that Respondent likely did not receive this mailgram until 21 May is based on Boltz' testimony that it was on this date that he began calling the Union to ask, "What does it mean, what do you want to do, we are always ready to sit down and talk." Moreover, Corona at one point testified that this mailgram arrived in the morning mail on 21 May (see below, part II,E,2,c).

About 5:30 or 6 a.m., Forti came into his office. Vasquez asked him if there was a problem in the building. Forti said that there had been a few problems, but nothing particularly serious.[24] Vasquez showed him the written warning and asked whether Forti thought Vasquez was doing a good job. Forti said that although he himself had no problems with Vasquez' work performance, Forti did not really know whether Vasquez was doing a good job individually, because UPS audits covered the entire building or a sampling of the entire building, and covered the service and not the individual. Forti went on to say that Vasquez was obviously having a serious problem if his employer had gone to the extent of writing him a warning letter; and that when Forti got to that point with one of his own employees, that employee was in a serious situation and should at least try to work it out with his supervisor. Forti further said that he had heard (from a source he did not give, so far as the record shows) that Respondent was trying to build a case against Vasquez to terminate him; and expressed the opinion that the warning notice was "their start of building their case."[25] Regarding the electric cart matter, Forti said that UPS had been advised, for insurance reasons, not to permit outside "vendors" to use equipment such as electric carts, and that the electric cart had to be kept on a battery charger when UPS personnel were not using it so that the cart would be usable when they needed it again. Forti suggested that Vasquez use one of the UPS' pushcarts instead.

Vasquez worked two more shifts for Respondent (17-18 and 20-21 May), during which Corona visited the Franklin Park facility at least once. He testified that during the visits, he noticed that "basically, [Vasquez'] buffing was down." During the visits, Vasquez ignored Corona's "hello" and walked on. On previous occasions, Vasquez had been "real friendly" or, at least, had said hello. Corona testified that to him, Vasquez' conduct in this respect showed "a definite attitude change." When asked whether Corona had a conversation with Palmowski after 15 May about Vasquez' work, Corona testified, "I know we were discussing it. I can't remember anything specific, what he was saying, but I knew he was talking about an attitude change and that the work wasn't really up to par, you know, for the job itself."

Early in the morning of Saturday, 18 May, Vasquez received a telephone call from Company President Boltz, who asked him whether he had received a copy of the 17 May mailgram. When Vasquez said no, Boltz told him that the conversation was being recorded, and then read him the mailgram, which (as previously noted) states that Respondent "does not recognize the Union" and, in effect, that Respondent was changing the employees' wages. Then, Boltz said that if Vasquez wanted to work for Respondent, he would have to work under Respondent's conditions. Boltz asked him whether he was scheduled to start his workweek on Sunday or Monday night. Vasquez said that he was scheduled to start on Monday, 20 May. Boltz said that Vasquez had as late as Monday afternoon to contact Respondent and let it know whether he was coming to work under these conditions. Vasquez said that he had no remarks to make until he spoke to his union business representative. Boltz testified that during this conversation, Vasquez was somewhat surly and gruff.[26]

As previously noted, at a union meeting attended by Vasquez and Steele on the morning of 20 May, Vasquez advocated a strike for a new contract, and union representative Radik said that strike notices would be sent out. Also on 20 May, Respondent received Vasquez' initial charge, alleging discrimination against him since about 13 May.[27] Boltz testified that receipt of this charge was quite a shock to him. On the evening of 20 May, a Monday, Vasquez reported to work at his usual hour of 10 p.m. This was Vasquez' first scheduled shift after his conversation with Boltz. Vasquez testified that an hour or two after the shift began, Palmowski told him to return to his regular buffing schedule, which was buffing the upstairs offices on Tuesdays and Thursdays and the downstairs offices on Mondays and Wednesdays.[28] After Vasquez had acknowledged these instructions, Palmowski walked out the door.[29]

About 2 or 2:30 a.m., while Vasquez was working upstairs in the dispatch building, Steele entered that building and called him. Vasquez came down the stairs and sat down. Steele asked him to cut some corners on his regular work and buff the floors upstairs. Vasquez said that he was already cutting as many corners as he could to perform all of his regular work assignment. He said that if Steele wanted him to, he would stop performing his regular work and buff the upstairs floors for Steele. Steele said that he would get these floors buffed by employee Fuentes, whose regular job consisted of the buffing in question[30] and whatever else Steele wanted him to do. It is undisputed that Steele did in fact have Fuentes perform the work that Steele had asked Vasquez to do.

[23] Steele testified that "every time I would look up . . . I would see" Vasquez riding the electric cart. Steele further testified that concerning his alleged complaint to Palmowski before 13 May about a heavy workload, Steele told Palmowski that Vasquez "was just riding around, he was doing more talking and riding and we were doing the work." I do not accept this testimony, for the reasons set forth concerning Steele's general testimony about his alleged complaints regarding Vasquez (see above, part II,C).

[24] This finding is based on Forti's testimony that he had "probably" received "a few" complaints and that he relayed them to Palmowski, and on Vasquez' testimony that Forti did not say that the Franklin Park audits showed the work there was bad and needed improvement.

[25] My finding in this sentence is based on Vasquez' testimony. When asked whether Forti had told him that Forti thought Respondent was doing something wrong in writing Vasquez up, Forti replied, "Not that I can remember." This testimony aside, Forti was not asked about the remarks referred to in the sentence to which this footnote is attached.

[26] My findings regarding the Vasquez-Boltz conversation are based on a composite of credible parts of their testimony. Boltz testified at one point that as of 21 May, he did not know that Vasquez had threatened to go to the Union about the cut in his wages. Boltz, however, elsewhere testified that during this 18 May conversation, "I believe" or "I think" that Vasquez said he would check with the Union and see what it advised him to do. Moreover, a portion of Boltz' prehearing statement (received without objection for purposes of impeachment or corroboration) states that Vasquez "said he would check with his union. 'I don't know what I'm going to do until I talk with the Union.'" Furthermore, because Boltz admittedly never told Vasquez that the tapes of this conversation had been erased through reuse, Vasquez, when he testified as the first witness, had every reason to believe that these tapes would impeach any misstatements by him about this conversation, including his testimony that he said he would speak to the Union.

[27] The receipt was signed by Corona's wife, who works as a secretary in the same suite of offices as her husband and Boltz.

[28] Vasquez testified that this assignment was in the "main building" (see above, fn. 18).

[29] My findings regarding the Palmowski-Vasquez conversation are based on Vasquez' uncontradicted testimony, which I credit for the reasons stated below part II,E,2,a. Palmowski did not testify (see above, fn. 6).

My findings in the foregoing paragraph are based on a composite of credible parts of Vasquez' and Steele's testimony. Steele testified that he told Vasquez to buff only in front of the "bosses' office," an 8-minute job, to which Vasquez replied that he would do it if he had time; and that Steele did not say he would have Fuentes do the job. For demeanor and other reasons discussed below, part II,E,2, I do not credit the foregoing testimony by Steele. I do not accept the contention in Respondent's brief that Steele's version of this conversation should be accepted because Vasquez initially testified (although he withdrew this testimony on cross-examination) that the conversation took place in the Rose building. I am unable to perceive why he should believe that this latter testimony (and not his corrected testimony) would add credence to his testimony that at that time he had 2-1/2 or 3 hours' work to do in the Rose building, as well as 1-1/2 hours of work to do in the dispatch building.[31]

As previously noted, on 20 May or in the morning of 21 May, Respondent received a telegram from the Union "notifying you of impending strike action." Corona testified that Respondent thereupon advised UPS of the "impending strike" and that UPS directed Respondent, if there was a strike, to use a particular door. He went on to testify that on 21 May he or Sullivan called all the employees to ascertain whether they were coming to work that night or were going to strike, and that all employees reached by management said they were coming in. About 3:30 p.m. on 21 May, Corona telephoned Vasquez, said that Corona had heard that "you" were supposed to go on strike today, and asked whether Vasquez was going to work. Vasquez said that he had not heard anything about it, and planned to be at work as scheduled. Corona asked him to use the side entrance if it were still open when he arrived.[32]

About 15 or 20 minutes later, Vasquez received a telephone call from Boltz. Boltz said that he had received some complaints that the floor had not been buffed. Vasquez said that Palmowski had told him to follow the schedule of buffing the upstairs on Tuesdays and Thursdays and the downstairs on Mondays and Wednesdays. Boltz said that this was "aside from the point," and that he was "still going to have to terminate your employment."[33] Boltz testified that after receiving the Union's "impending strike action" telegram, he tried three times on 21 and 22 May to call the Union about "what does it mean, what do you want to do, we are always ready to sit down and talk"; but that he received no response.

Vasquez had started to work under Admiral as a janitor at a UPS facility, and was taken over by Chemco when it took over the UPS cleaning. While employed by these two firms, he had never received any disciplinary actions, such as warnings or suspensions. On 14 April 1986, almost a year after Respondent discharged him, he was reemployed by Admiral at $5 an hour (that is, $10,400 a year for 52 weeks of 40 hours each). By the time of the hearing in November 1986 he was receiving $23,000 a year as a field supervisor.

2. Reasons for credibility findings; Respondent's evidence regarding the events on the day of Vasquez' discharge

a. As previously noted, Vasquez testified that at 10 or 11 p.m. on Monday, 20 May, Palmowski told him to return to his former schedule of buffing the upstairs offices on Tuesdays and Thursdays and the downstairs offices on Mondays and Wednesdays. Steele testified without objection or limitation that about 10:30 or 11 that same evening, Palmowski told Steele that Palmowski had told Vasquez that he had to buff upstairs, and told Steele to "make sure that he does it" (cf. cases cited below at fn. 39). Palmowski did not testify (above at fn. 6).

Steele went on to testify that later during that shift, he told Vasquez that "the upstairs hallway near the bosses' office, had to be buffed," a job that (according to Steele) would take 5 to 8 minutes and that Fuentes in fact performed before the shift ended. Moreover, Steele went on to testify that Palmowski telephoned Steele at home on the morning of 21 May to find out whether Vasquez "buff[ed], like I told him," and "got mad" when Steele said that the job had been done by Fuentes. I think it unlikely that Palmowski would have been so concerned at having a 5- to 8-minute job performed by Vasquez (or any other particular employee), that Palmowski would have told Vasquez to perform it, then told his leadman to see that Vasquez did it, then telephoned the leadman at home to find out whether Vasquez did it, and got "mad" when advised that someone else had done it. Moreover, there is no evidence that when asking Vasquez to perform the buffing job on 21 May, Steele made any claim that he was relaying instructions from Palmowski. Accordingly, and for demeanor reasons, I credit Vasquez' testimony that the job Steele asked him to perform on 20 May was buffing the upstairs floors, and discredit Steele's testimony that the job consisted merely of buffing in front of the "bosses' office." For similar reasons, I do not credit Steele's testimony that on 20 May, Palmowski told Steele to make sure that Vasquez obeyed

[30] Regarding which building was involved, see above, fns. 18 and 28.

[31] My ultimate determination in this case is in no way affected by whether Vasquez was in fact too busy, or sincerely believed he was too busy, to perform the task Steele asked him to do.

[32] Regarding the date and substance of this conversation, my findings in this paragraph are based on Vasquez' and Corona's mutually corroborative testimony. As to its hour, my finding is based on Vasquez' testimony. I do not accept Corona's testimony that the conversation occurred about 10 or 11 a.m. As discussed below, part II,E,2,c, Corona's recollection of the sequence of events on that day was confused in the extreme.

[33] My findings regarding to the substance of this conversation are based on Vasquez' testimony. For reasons discussed below, part II,E,2,d, I do not accept Boltz' somewhat different version.

Palmowski's instructions that "he had to buff upstairs," and that on the morning of 21 May, Palmowski reproached Steele by telephone because he had not seen to it that Vasquez buffed in front of the manager's office. Further, because of my finding regarding what Steele asked Vasquez to do, and for demeanor reasons, I credit Vasquez' testimony about what Palmowski told him on 20 May.

Finally, because of my finding that Vasquez otherwise gave an accurate account of his conversation with Steele on 20 May, because Steele admitted that Fuentes in fact performed the work Steele asked Vasquez to do, and for demeanor reasons, I credit Vasquez over Steele regarding their 21 May conversation (to the extent that their testimony differs), including Vasquez' testimony that Steele said he would have Fuentes perform such work. I do not agree with Respondent that Vasquez' testimony in this respect is impeached by his failure to tell this to Boltz when he told Vasquez, during the discharge conversation, that the floor had not been buffed. Vasquez obviously thought that Boltz was referring to Vasquez' failure to buff the offices, which Palmowski had removed from his work schedule for the preceding shift, rather than Vasquez' failure to perform the buffing job that Steele told him Fuentes would perform, which Fuentes did perform, and which was on Fuentes' regular work schedule.

b. On 21 May, Steele left the Franklin Park facility at 6:30 a.m. and drove home, where he arrived at 7 or 7:15 a.m. He testified that later that morning, on his home telephone, he had a conversation with Palmowski that Steele initially timed about 8 a.m. and later timed as occurring at an hour that enabled him to reach Respondent's office, a 10-minute drive from his home, by 8:30 or 9 a.m. Steele testified that during this conversation, Palmowski asked him whether Vasquez had performed the work that Steele had told him to perform, Steele said no, and Palmowski told him to come down to the office to write Vasquez up. Although at certain points Steele expressed some uncertainty about who initiated this call, he mostly testified that Palmowski called him, testimony that leaves unexplained how Palmowski acquired the alleged suspicion that the work in question had been performed by an employee other than Vasquez.[34] On direct examination, Steele testified that he remained at home between his arrival at 7 or 7:15 a.m. and his conversation with Palmowski on Steele's home telephone. On cross-examination, however, he testified that between about 7:45 a.m. and this telephone conversation, which at certain points in his testimony he timed as about 8 a.m., he drove his wife to her job in the Loop (Chicago's central business district), a round trip of 8 or 9 miles on an expressway in rush-hour traffic.

Steele testified that in Respondent's office on 21 May, and sometime between 8:30 and 9:45 a.m., he related to Palmowski the incident (earlier that morning) when Steele had asked Vasquez to perform an additional buffing operation; and drafted, signed, and gave to Palmowski the following "Warning Notice #2" to Vasquez, dated 21 May and stating, "You were advised that the buffing must be done in front of managers [sic] office (long corridor) and you did not do this work." Steele testified that during this conversation in Respondent's office, he told Palmowski that Vasquez "refused" to perform the work; and that during Steele's telephone conversation earlier that morning, he told Palmowski that Vasquez "wouldn't do it." I do not credit Steele's testimony in these respects because no such averment is included either in the "Warning Notice #2" or in Steele's testimonial account of his conversation with Vasquez.

c. Corona testified that on the morning of 21 May, he was told (1) that about 10:30 or 11 p.m. on 20 May, Palmowski had told Vasquez to do "some buffing of the second floor of the UPS area";[35] (2) that about 3 hours later, Steele had "also" told Vasquez about "buffing this area upstairs on the second floor landing;" and (3) either that "he didn't do it" or that he "refused to do it."[36] When asked who told Corona this, he testified, "I either learned it from Eddie Steele when he came in for the writeup or I learned it from [Palmowski] when he came in earlier" (emphasis supplied). Steele did not testify to conversing at the office that morning with anyone but Palmowski. Steele testified that before leaving the office that morning, he gave the signed writeup to Palmowski; that when Steele left the office, "I suppose [the writeup was on somebody's desk or in the hands of Mr. Palmowski;" that Steele did not know, when he left the office, whether Corona was there; and that Steele probably left about 9:30 or 9:45 a.m. Corona testified that he did not reach the office until about 10 a.m. on 21 May, and that he found warning notice 2 on his desk when he arrived.[37] He did not testify that he conversed with Palmowski before reaching the office that morning. Moreover, Corona initially testified that he and Boltz were in Boltz' office when Corona first learned of the Vasquez incident, and further testified that Boltz did not come into the office that day until after Corona's arrival about 10 a.m. On direct examination, Corona initially testified that on his initially receiving a report in Boltz' presence about the Vasquez incident, he relayed the report to Boltz, who said that Vasquez "can't really do this" and immediately tried to telephone him. On the following day, but still on direct examination, Corona testified that he saw the warning notice 2 about 10 a.m. on 21 May; [34] Steele testified that during this telephone conversation, Palmowski said "to meet him down to the office, that he would be down there about 8:30 or 9 o'clock." Although such testimony strongly implies that Palmowski was not telephoning from Respondent's Chicago office, and although Palmowski's job required him to visit the various locations where Respondent performed cleaning work, Steele was not asked to explain how, if he initiated the call, he knew where to reach Palmowski by telephone. Respondent's office doors are not unlocked until 8:30 a.m. at the earliest.

[35] The only direct evidence regarding what Palmowski told Vasquez that day is Vasquez' credible testimony that Palmowksi told him to return to his former schedule, which required less buffing. According to Steele's discredited testimony, Palmowski told him that Palmowski had told Vasquez "that he had to buff upstairs."

[36] As previously noted, the warning notice #2 refers to "buffing in front of managers office (long corridor)," and states that Vasquez "did not do this work." See also below at fn. 38.

[37] In contending that Corona varied in his testimony about the hour of the day when he first saw this document, the General Counsel misreads the portions of the testimony on which he relies.

that he then proceeded to do his normal work; that "sometime that morning, I went into [Boltz'] office and discussed" that warning notice; that "Through our discussion of this writeup and what happened, he decided to fire Vasquez"; and that Boltz thereupon tried to telephone him. On cross-examination, Corona initially reiterated that he and Boltz discussed the writeup. He testified, however, "I told him [Vasquez] refused to work; whether or not I mentioned to [Boltz] that Vasquez was written up, that I don't know";[38] and that Corona did not recall whether Boltz said he was going to fire Vasquez. Although Corona testified that Boltz knew about the strike notice before trying to telephone Vasquez, and testified at one point that Corona's alleged discussion with Boltz about Vasquez began before Respondent at least allegedly received the Union's strike notice in the mail on 21 May after 10 a.m., other portions of Corona's testimony about this alleged discussion make no reference to any break during which Boltz learned of the strike notice, and Corona allegedly called Vasquez to ascertain if he was nonetheless coming to work that day (see above at fn. 32). Corona further testified that after Boltz' alleged unsuccessful effort (in Corona's presence) to telephone Vasquez, Boltz wrote Palmowski a note telling him to fire Vasquez that night if Boltz had not yet reached him. Corona testified that his alleged conversation or conversations with Boltz about Vasquez on 21 May occurred in the morning of that day.

Respondent's counsel did not ask Boltz to testify about the decision to discharge Vasquez, and the record contains very little testimony from Boltz about this matter. No evidence contradicts Vasquez' testimony that Boltz discharged him by telephone shortly after 3:30 p.m. on 21 May, more than 3 hours after the alleged Corona-Boltz conversation testified to by Corona.[39] A prehearing statement by Boltz about Vasquez' discharge (see below part II,E,2d) avers that 5 minutes elapsed between certain representations to Boltz by Palmowski, which allegedly triggered Boltz' discharge decision, and the telephone call when Boltz discharged Vasquez. Neither Boltz' very skimpy testimony about Vasquez' discharge, nor the portions of Boltz' statement received into evidence, aver that before discharging Vasquez, Boltz consulted Corona, saw the alleged writeup about Vasquez allegedly prepared on 21 May,[40] unsuccessfully tried to telephone him, or wrote a note to Palmowski (who according to Boltz' statement had talked with Boltz only 5 minutes before Boltz reached Vasquez) telling Palmowski to discharge Vasquez; nor does Respondent contend that the unreceived portions of that statement contain any such averments.

d. Regarding Vasquez' 21 May 1985 discharge, a portion of Boltz' statement to Board investigator Bell on 30 May 1985, which portion was received in evidence without objection or limitation, states:

> On May 21, I got a call from a woman who runs Franklin Park for UPS. She complained that the buffing had not been done two nights in a row. Our contract calls for daily buffing. Around that time, Raymond [Palmowski] came into the office. He told me that he had told Steele to tell Vasquez that he had to buff Monday night. I thought to myself, Vasquez thinks the Union can protect him, and he's going to ruin me with UPS. I thought he's not doing the work because he wanted Admiral to get the contract again [see supra Part II E 1]. Five minutes after talking to Raymond I called Vasquez and fired him. I told him he had to do the work. He said Raymond told me to go back to the old work schedule. I said, "What old schedule?" I took it as an excuse and fired him.

Regarding the "call from a woman who runs Franklin Park for UPS," Boltz testified that the call was from a woman whose voice he did not recognize and who did not say she was calling about Franklin Park. Boltz went on to testify that he received this call in the morning, and that "later in the day," when he learned where the buffing had not been done, he "took it for granted" she had called from Franklin Park. At that time, UPS' only female maintenance supervisor worked in UPS' Addison facility. Boltz testified that he "asked around and nobody knew" who this woman was; and that between the June 1985 issuance of the complaint regarding Vasquez (about 6 weeks after he filed his initial charge) and Palmowski's discharge about August 1985, Boltz "never did get to ask [him] if he had left a message for someone to call. I never got to that." Regarding the Tuesday complaint from Boltz' caller that buffing had been omitted for 2 days in a row (that is, Sunday night and Monday night), I note Vasquez' uncontradicted testimony that on the preceding Saturday, 18 May, he told Boltz that Vasquez was not scheduled to work on Sunday night. Corona's testimony about his alleged discussions with Boltz on 21 May before Vasquez' discharge does not refer to any suspicion that Vasquez' motive for his alleged nonperformance of work was a desire for Admiral to get the contract again.

Regarding the material quoted from Boltz' prehearing statement beginning with the words "Around that time," Boltz testified, "This is inaccurately constructed here. This is not the sequence of events. This is what it says, but it is not what happened." He gave no other version of these events. Boltz testified that he had been unable to read Board agent Bell's handwriting and, in effect, that Boltz signed the statement in reliance on Bell's reading the statement to him. I do not credit Boltz' testimony in this respect, for demeanor reasons, because he admittedly made and initialed some changes in the statement (including a scratch out between the words "What" and "old"), and because I believe it unlikely that a man with Boltz' 31 years of experience as Respondent's president would sign a document that he could not read.[41] In any event, I infer that any reading by Bell to Boltz of his statement was in fact accurate. See F.T.C v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 626 F.2d 966, 975 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

[38] As discussed below, the writeup did not state that Vasquez had refused to do any work. Nor is there any evidence that Vasquez had in fact done so. R. Br. at 21 reads Corona's testimony as attributing to Boltz the statement that Vasquez "refused to do any work."

[39] At one point, Corona testified without objection that at 3 or 4 p.m. on 21 May Boltz told him, in effect, that Boltz had fired Vasquez by telephone in the afternoon of 21 May (see Tr. 398, 441). See American Rubber Products Corp. v. NLRB, 214 F.2d 47, 52-53 (7th Cir. 1954); Alvin J. Bart & Co., 236 NLRB 242, 243 (1978), enf. denied 598 F.2d 1267 (2d Cir. 1979); Today's Man, 263 NLRB 332 (1982).

[40] Boltz' reference at Tr. 251 to "a complaint written up by Steele" describes Boltz' actions and mental processes after Vasquez' discharge.

Because of the foregoing peculiarities in Boltz' statement and testimony about Vasquez' discharge, and for demeanor reasons, I credit Vasquez' testimony about the telephone conversation when he was discharged, and discredit Boltz' version except to the extent that it is corroborated by Vasquez.

F. The Allegedly Unlawful Refusal to Hire Radmila Marsenic, Johnnie King, Francisco Flores, and Josef Skocz

Although the four UPS cleaning contracts that Respondent took over between 29 April and 1 May had been bid for in a bid that included all five of Chemco's UPS locations, Chemco retained its cleaning contract at UPS' Northbrook facility until 24 May. As previously noted, Chemco and the Union executed on an undisclosed date before 13 May a bargaining agreement that covered Chemco's Northbrook employees, among others; and that increased their wages to $13.14 an hour. The execution of this agreement was announced at the union meeting following which Palmowski had said that he heard "everything that goes down in the Union."

About mid-May 1985, Sullivan (Respondent's vice president and sales manager) and Palmowski came over to look at UPS's Northbrook location. When they were asked by Gerhard Lingner, UPS' plant maintenance manager at that location, why they wanted to look over the building, they replied that they were looking into the possibility of taking over the cleaning contract from Chemco. Lingner, who had known Sullivan for several years, asked whether, if Respondent got the contract, Respondent would consider taking over the existing Chemco crew. Sullivan said that Respondent was not sure about it, and had been talking about it. He asked why Lingner was interested. Lingner said that he was getting good work and his job was made very easy by the existing crew.[42]

On 20 May, Sullivan learned that Respondent had obtained the Northbrook contract; like the contracts that UPS had previously had with Chemco and Respondent, the Northbrook contract could be canceled by UPS on 7 days' notice. On the following day, Lingner asked Sullivan whether Respondent was going to hire the Chemco crew. Sullivan said that he did not know, and would let Lingner know later in the week. About 22 May, alleged discriminatee Radmila Marsenic, a Northbrook employee who was the leader of Chemco's Northbrook crew, told Lingner that the crew would like to continue to work at Northbrook and would like to talk to the new contractor. Lingner said that he would make an appointment with the new contractor to meet with the crew.

Boltz testified that on 21 and 22 May, he "diligently attempted" to reach the Union by telephone to find out what was meant by the 20 May "impending strike" telegram, "what do you want to do, we are always ready to sit down and talk"; and that he received "no response." On 23 May, Lingner telephoned Sullivan that the employees were interested in staying on under the new contractor, and that they had asked Lingner to call Respondent and find out if it would come out for a meeting. Sullivan said yes, and that "we" would be out on the following day, 24 May. Lingner said that the crewmembers were good workers and asked Sullivan if he would take the crew over. Sullivan said, "We're not sure about that, but we will talk to them about it."[43] Thereafter, Lingner told Marsenic that he had made an appointment for the crew to meet with Sullivan on Friday, 24 May at 6:30 a.m., the time of day when their shift ended.

When the employees' shift ended at 6:30 a.m. on Friday, 24 May, nobody from Respondent had yet arrived at the facility. The cleaning crew gathered in the cafeteria. Marsenic went to Lingner's office and asked if he could telephone Respondent to find out if anyone from Respondent was going to come to Northbrook that morning. Then, she rejoined the others in the cafeteria. A little later, Lingner came to the cafeteria, told the employees that some Northbrook representatives were coming, and stated that they wanted to talk to Marsenic. Marsenic went to Lingner's office and picked up the telephone. Sullivan, who was on the other end, asked what she wanted. Marsenic said that Lingner had already told him that the employees wanted to talk to him, and he was supposed to be there at 6:30 a.m. He said that he would be there in 40 minutes.[44]

Sullivan and Palmowski arrived at Lingner's office a little before 7:30 a.m.[45] Lingner said that the Chemco cleaning crew was waiting in the cafeteria and wanted to talk to Sullivan. Sullivan said that Respondent had decided to hire new people, and that he had nothing to talk to the employees about. Lingner said that the employees had been waiting for Sullivan for a couple of hours, and asked him to at least talk to them. Sullivan said that he would.

Then, Lingner took Sullivan and Palmowski into the cafeteria and introduced them to the employees, all four of whom were still waiting there. The crew asked Marsenic to serve as spokesman. Marsenic told Sullivan that the employees would like to have the address and telephone number of the new company they were going to work for; would like to have a "company regulation book"; would like to know what their hourly wages, their vacations, and their benefits were going to be; and would like to know "what union we are going to be."[46] Sullivan got up and became red in the face. He said that Respondent was not going to hire the Chemco crew, but was going to start the building with a brand new crew. Marsenic asked him why he was there if he did not want to hire them. He said that "I have my own people," that he wanted to start the building with a fresh crew, and that there was nothing he could do about it. He further said that he did not know what this new crew would be paid. He told the employees to leave their names and telephone numbers, suggested that they take a vacation if they had one coming, and said that Respondent would call them if it had anything for them. After he left, Marsenic translated Sullivan's remarks into Polish for Skocz, whose command of English is very limited.

[41] On the stand, Boltz appeared to have genuine difficulty in reading Bell's handwriting. Boltz, however, testified, that he usually reads with reading glasses, that he had left his reading glasses at the office, that he "can struggle without them," and that he can read "somewhat" without reading glasses if he holds the document far enough away from him. Bell's handwriting is not very good, but neither is it strikingly bad.

[42] My finding in this sentence is based on Lingner's testimony. Sullivan's version was, "they are not doing a bad job."

[43] My findings regarding this conversation are based on a composite of credible parts of Lingner's and Sullivan's testimony. My finding regarding the date of this conversation is based on the testimony of Sullivan who, concerning this matter, appeared to have a recollection superior to Lingner's. For the reasons discussed below, I do not accept Sullivan's testimony that he said he would be at the Northbrook location at 6 a.m. on 24 May if he had anything to talk to the employees about; and that if he was not there, this meant that he had nothing to talk to them about.

[44] My findings as to this call are based on Marsenic's testimony. For demeanor reasons, and for the other reasons discussed below, I do not accept Sullivan's testimony that he had no telephone conversations that day with anyone before coming to the Northbrook facility.

[45] This finding is based on Marsenic's testimony. Because she was waiting to see Sullivan after having completed a full shift, I regard her memory concerning this matter as more reliable than Sullivan's (8 a.m.) or Lingner's (7 a.m.).

My findings in the foregoing paragraph are based on a composite of credible parts of the testimony of Sullivan, Marsenic, King, and (through an interpreter) Skocz. Palmowski did not testify (see above at fn. 6), and Flores (whose native language is Spanish, but who understands English) could not be found. For demeanor reasons and notwithstanding Sullivan's denial, I credit the testimony of Marsenic and Skocz that Marsenic asked what union the employees were "going to be"; such an inquiry would appear to be natural in view of the employees' experience with unions (see above at fn. 46).[47] Respondent does not claim that these witnesses' prehearing affidavits failed to refer to such an inquiry. I do not credit Marsenic's testimony, however, that when she asked, "What union are we going to be," Sullivan replied in terms, "I am not going to be no union"; or King's testimony that she asked Sullivan whether Respondent was going to recognize "the union" and he said no. I so find because these alleged remarks were not referred to in these employees' respective prehearing affidavits, although Marsenic testified that she told the Board investigator about the statement she attributed to Sullivan.

All four of the employees with whom Respondent began operations at Northbrook were paid $5 an hour. Lingner testified that the quality of their work was roughly comparable to that of the Chemco employees. Although one of the four Chemco employees at Northbrook may have filled out a written application for employment by Respondent, Respondent never hired any of them. All four of them had attended the 13 May union meeting. At least three of them (Marsenic, King, and Skocz) were union members; but Marsenic and King were not officers or members of the grievance committee, and there is no evidence that such a position was held by Skocz, who testified through a Polish-English interpreter. Boltz testified that if Respondent had acquired the Northbrook contract on 1 May 1985, Respondent would have hired the former Chemco employees. Corona testified that in early May 1985, Sales Manager Sullivan told him that Respondent had not obtained the Northbrook contract with the other UPS contracts because "right now they were happy with the people that were doing Northbrook, and they just didn't want to make a change." Sullivan testified that when Respondent acquired the cleaning contracts at Jefferson Street, Bedford Park, Franklin Park, and Addison (which four contracts Respondent began to perform on various dates between 29 April and 1 May 1985), UPS told him that one reason why Respondent was not then obtaining the Northbrook contract was that UPS was "not all that upset with" the cleaning there. Corona testified that Steele was named leadman at Franklin Park on 13 May partly because Lingner, UPS plant maintenance manager at Northbrook, had spoken highly of Steele's work there.

Boltz testified that prior union meetings or a possible strike threat had no bearing on his decision not to hire the Chemco employees at Northbrook, and denied that antiunion animus of any kind entered into that decision. He testified that Respondent did not hire Chemco's personnel at Northbrook on 24 May because Respondent had had problems with what he regarded as an unreasonably high proportion of the Chemco employees. At the four UPS facilities that Respondent took over on or before 1 May 1985, Respondent hired a total of 12 employees, not including Vasquez or Hukic. Before starting to work at Northbrook, Respondent had had problems with 5 of these 12. More specifically, about 9 May Respondent terminated two Addison employees because one of them had left early and the other had punched him out for breaks and at the regular quitting hour. Further, on 1 May Respondent issued warning notices to two Bedford Park employees for poor work; one of these employees thereafter worked poorly and only intermittently, and the other punched out early on 2 May and failed to call in for the rest of the month.[48] On 1 and 9 May, a third Bedford Park employee received warning notices.[49] Further, Corona testified that as of 21 May 1985 he was not satisfied with the quality of work being performed at the other locations previously serviced by Chemco,[50] that Palmowski had reported that such work was not "up to standards" there, that Palmowski and Sullivan had told Corona during this period that UPS was not happy with the work at these locations (although company witness Sullivan was not asked about this matter), that UPS' building maintenance supervisor at Addison had pointed out deficiencies in the cleaning of that building, and that other, unnamed UPS personnel had told him that the quality of the work was not up to par. Corona further testified (without corroboration from Boltz) that before Boltz decided not to take over Chemco's employees at Northbrook, the two of them discussed the different problems and the quality of work at different locations and the problems with some of the people.

[46] Of the Northbrook employees, at least three (Marsenic, Skocz, and King) had worked for Admiral, which had bargained with a sister local of the Union.

[47] It is unclear whether Skocz was basing his testimony on what he heard Sullivan say in English or on Marsenic's interpretation to him in Polish. Even assuming that the latter was the sole basis for his testimony in this respect, under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(B), such testimony would be probative to establish what Sullivan said. Nor did Respondent object to the receipt of his testimony for this purpose; cf. above at fn. 32.

[48] Both of them were discharged on 31 May, after Respondent's refusal to hire Chemco's Northbrook employees.

[49] He was discharged on 3 June, after Respondent refused to hire Chemco's Northbrook employees.

[50] As of that date, only 9 of the 14 former Chemco employees were still actively working for Respondent. Hukic and Vasquez, however, had been discharged as recently as 20 and 21 May, respectively.

Corona testified that the decision not to hire the Chemco employees at Northbrook was made "probably the week of the 23rd" of May, a Thursday. There is no evidence that Sullivan was responsible for the selection of employees to be hired at Northbrook. He was not asked who told him about the decision not to take over the Chemco employees there. Although neither was he asked in terms when he learned about this decision, his testimony, if unreservedly accepted, shows that he learned about it between his 23 May telephone conversation with Lingner (when, according to both men, Sullivan said that Respondent had not yet decided whether to take over the Chemco employees) and the time when Sullivan would have had to start for the Northbrook facility to reach it by 6 a.m. on 24 May (see above at fn. 43). Boltz testified that he may have told Sullivan about this decision on the night of Wednesday, 22 May, but "more than likely" told him about it at an undisclosed hour on 23 May. Contrary to Sullivan and Boltz, I find that Sullivan was advised of this decision after his telephone conversation with Marsenic a little after 6:30 a.m. on 24 May (when, according to her credited testimony, he told her that in 40 minutes he would be at Northbrook to talk to the employees), although before the hour when he would have had to start for Northbrook in order to reach it a little before 7:30 a.m. on 24 May. I do not credit Sullivan's denial that he had this telephone call with Marsenic, or his related testimony that on 23 May he told Lingner that if Sullivan did not show up by 6 a.m. on 24 May, he had nothing to talk to the employees about. The credited evidence shows that the employees waited for Sullivan for about an hour after the end of their shift; Sullivan testified, in effect, that they waited for an hour and a half. They would not likely have waited this long if the message testified to by Sullivan had been given them by Lingner, as he likely would have done if he had in fact been so advised. Further, I do not believe that they would have waited so long without making, during this period, some contact with Respondent.

Because of Sullivan's 23 May undertaking to come out to Northbrook to talk to the employees at 6 a.m. on 24 May, I think it likely that he would have been promptly informed of the hiring decision. If that decision had been reached by the end of the business day on 23 May, he would almost certainly have been so informed on that day as a matter of business routine. Further, in order to avoid an unnecessarily early rising on 24 May, Sullivan likely took steps to ascertain before his bedtime on 23 May whether the hiring decision had been made. As of 6:30 a.m. on 24 May, however, he clearly had not been told about it. I find that Respondent's decision not to hire the four Chemco employees at Northbrook was reached no earlier than the night of 23-24 May, and was probably made between 6:30 and 6:50 a.m. on 24 May.

G. Aftermath

On an undisclosed date in June 1985, Respondent began to negotiate with the Union regarding all five UPS locations. By 1 August 1985, an agreement had been reached on wages. A complete agreement was executed on 1 November 1985 calling for a wage scale retroactive to 1 August 1985. The contract called for hourly rates of $8.20 to Jefferson employees and $4.25 to $5.50 to employees at the other four UPS locations. At that time, all of Respondent's employees at UPS became union members.

Thereafter, on undisclosed dates before 19 November 1986, Respondent agreed with the Union to extend the August 1985 contract to locations where Respondent was performing cleaning for two other firms. Corona denied that any of the decisions to fire, discipline, or not to hire former Chemco employees were made because of their union membership or activities or because they attended a union meeting. He went on to deny taking any action against Vasquez because he may have attended a union meeting.[51]

H. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The alleged discrimination

a. Vasquez' alleged demotion and Hukic's discharge

The record shows that Company President Boltz does not oppose unions in principle, and has for many years recognized and contracted with this Union and other labor organizations at a number of Respondent's locations. Further, the instant charges are the only charges ever filed against Respondent during its 34 years of existence.

When Respondent took over the UPS cleaning contracts at Jefferson, Bedford Park, Franklin Park, and Addison, Respondent's ability to retain and profit by the cleaning contracts was diminished by the Union's representative status, which limited Respondent's right to cut the wage scale established by Chemco's expired union contract and which Respondent continued for several weeks to pay at least some of the employees at UPS.[52] Although Respondent's ability to show a profit while continuing to pay this wage scale (which Boltz believed to be about 50 percent higher than prevailing rates for such work in the area) was limited by the size of the fixed-sum monthly payments from UPS, the Union could be reasonably expected to (as it did) resist efforts by Respondent to cut this wage scale. These problems were aggravated by UPS' injunction to Respondent to work in harmony with the Union (an injunction that UPS might deem violated should the Union strike Respondent) and by UPS' right to terminate Respondent's cleaning contracts on 7 days' notice. Cf. NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 229 fn. 8 (1963).

[51] R. Br. at 2-3 seems to suggest that I take judicial notice of Administrative Law Judge William A. Gershuny's action on 12 February 1987 in dismissing on the record, and immediately after the General Counsel had rested, the complaint in Case 13-CB-10989, Service Employees Local 73. The complaint in that case alleged, inter alia, that the Union violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by failing, for arbitrary and capricious reasons, to process the grievances of all the employees alleged as discriminatees in the case before me. The underlying charges in the CB case were filed by Vasquez on 19 June 1985 and 23 May 1986. I perceive nothing in Judge Gershuny's ruling, which is relevant to the instant case.

[52] Cf. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 743 (1962); NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272, 292-296 (1972).

On the very day after Respondent learned that it was being awarded these contracts, and before actually beginning to perform them, Respondent's management evinced their anxiety to relieve Respondent of the pressures that the Union's status could be expected to impose. Thus, on 24 April, while Chemco was still performing the cleaning work at Jefferson under the still-effective union contract, Project Manager Palmowski became "mad" on learning that an employee's absence was warranted by the contractual "personal-day" provisions. Palmowski said that Respondent was going to change "everything" and to replace the incumbent employees at UPS with employees who worked for Respondent elsewhere and who would be paid $3 or $4 an hour. When employee Hukic said that the employees had a union contract, Palmowski said that Respondent was going to change unions, too. On the following day, when Hukic told Palmowski that the union contract prohibited a job change that Palmowski wanted to (and later did) impose on Hukic, Palmowski said that he did not care about "your contract," and Corona said that Hukic had made too much money under Chemco and should quit.

After Hukic had thus relied on, and Palmowski and Corona had deprecated the Union and its contract, Corona had thereupon encouraged Hukic to quit, and 10 days after Respondent had taken over the cleaning contract at Jefferson, Palmowski gave Hukic a written reprimand, ostensibly for poor work ascertained during a walk-through by UPS Manager Strickland, which may not have preceded issuance of the warning notice. The bona fides of this reprimand are rendered questionable not only by Respondent's failure to issue a similar warning notice to Sloan, whose work was equally implicated by Strickland's comments to Palmowski, but also by Palmowski's statement, when giving Hukic the 8 May warning slip, that he would get another one the next day. The suspicion that Palmowski's prescience thus cast on the bona fides of the warning slip that Hukic did get the next day is confirmed by the demonstrated falsity of Corona's claim that he and Palmowksi based this warning on Respondent's Exhibit 1, the purported audit report. I conclude that Palmowski issued both of these warning notices because of Hukic's open espousal of the Union and to provide a paper basis for subsequent personnel action against Hukic should such action prove advantageous to Respondent.

Thereafter, on 13 May, a telegram from the Union advised Respondent that the Union was indeed going to seek a contract that called for the existing, at least supposedly, above-standard wage scale. Further, by 11:30 p.m. that day (as shown by Palmowski's comments to Vasquez), Respondent learned about the union meeting that morning. Palmowski's comments unequivocally establish his knowledge that Vasquez and Hukic had attended that meeting, and that Hukic had there complained about his reprimands. I infer from such comments to Vasquez ("How is your Communist party doing, I hear you're a Communist leader," with the explanation "I hear everything that goes down in the Union") that Palmowski also knew that during that meeting, Vasquez had said that the employees could not hesitate too much longer, working without a contract; that he had played a part in organizing that meeting; and that Hukic had also expressed concern there about working without a contract.

Immediately after the foregoing discussion, Palmowski reproached Vasquez for failing to buff the floors often enough, ignored (so far as the record shows) Vasquez' assertion that he had been following the employees' work schedule, removed him as group leader, and gave the job to Steele instead. Because Palmowski took this action immediately after calling Vasquez a Communist for his part in the union meeting earlier that day, I find that the General Counsel has shown, at least prima facie, that Respondent demoted Vasquez because of his union activity.

Two days later, during the 15 May bargaining conference, Respondent learned that, far from being willing to agree to a wage cut, the Union was seeking a contract with a wage increase. Credible portions of Corona's suspiciously vacillating testimony about when and how much he learned regarding Hukic's union activity establish that, at least by the end of this conference, Corona knew that Hukic had attended the 13 May meeting and had there complained about his reprimands. Moreover, as previously noted, Palmowski had said on 13 May concerning that meeting, where Hukic expressed concern about working without a contract, that Palmowski knew Hukic had complained at that meeting about his reprimands and that Palmowski heard "everything that goes down in the Union." On 18 May, Hukic complained to Company President Boltz that Respondent's proposed pay cut breached the union contract and "You can't destroy union." When Boltz replied that he could indeed destroy it, Hukic said that on 20 May he was going to talk to the Union. On 19 May, when both Hukic and Sloan were on duty, Palmowski selected Hukic to train Zawartka and reminded Hukic that Boltz had tape recorded the telephone conversation during which Hukic had asserted that his pay cut was contrary to the union contract and he was going to complain about it to the Union on 20 May.

True to his word, Hukic went to the 20 May union meeting, during which the Union said that it was about to send out strike notices; as previously noted, Palmowski had said on 13 May that he heard "everything that goes down in the Union." Later that same day, 20 May, Hukic and several other employees advised Respondent that they were going to come to work and that the Union had told them to come to work if they wanted to keep their jobs. Shortly after 4 p.m. that day, Palmowski discharged Hukic without giving him a reason.

The foregoing sequence of events strongly suggests that Hukic was discharged because of his favorable comments in late April about the Union and its contract, his 13 May action in attending a union meeting and there expressing concern about working without a contract, his action on 18 or 19 May in telling Boltz that a union contract forbade Respondent's projected wage cut and on 20 May Hukic would speak to the Union about it, and Hukic's 20 May action in attending a union meeting at which the Union stated that it was sending out strike notices. I do not accept Corona's testimony that the decision to discharge Hukic was made as early as 16 or 17 May. Between 16 May and Hukic's discharge on 20 May, Corona included Hukic among the employees who were sent a mailgram on 17 May telling them to telephone Respondent's office if they wanted to keep their jobs. Moreover, on 18 May, the day before Hukic began his last shift of work for Respondent, Boltz asked him whether he was still coming to work, told him that his pay was being cut, and went to the trouble and expense of recording this conversation; indeed, according to Boltz, he initiated this conversation and (apart from reading Hukic the mailgram) limited his remarks to asking whether Hukic was still coming to work for Respondent.

Corona testified that the decision to discharge Hukic was made by Corona and Palmowski, and that this decision was based on Palmowski's report to Corona that "His work hasn't improved since the job class—since he was changed and the work wasn't getting done properly."[53] As previously found, however, Respondent's claim that it was initially dissatisfied with Hukic's work is impeached by its action on 8 and 9 May, when, in giving him warnings for alleged poor work, Respondent resorted to a demonstrated sham basis. Moreover, there is no evidence that after 9 May, any member of management reproved Hukic for poor work or for any other reason.[54] On the contrary, on 17 May Corona sent him a mailgram telling him to call Respondent's office if he wanted to keep his job, and on 18 May Boltz (according to his testimony) telephoned Hukic to find out whether he would continue to work for Respondent.

For the foregoing reasons, I find that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that Hukic was discharged at least partly because of his protected union activity.

Accordingly, the burden is on Respondent to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that Vasquez would still have been demoted, and Hukic would still have been discharged, even absent their union activity.[55] As to Hukic Respondent's efforts to exaggerate any work deficiencies he may have had by giving him warnings allegedly for poor work, but with a demonstrated sham basis, preclude any finding that on the preponderance of the evidence, Respondent regarded his work as sufficiently poor to call for his discharge irrespective of his union activity. Although Palmowski's remarks when demoting Vasquez suggest that his failure to buff floors often enough may have entered into the decision to demote him, Palmowski ignored Vasquez' assertion that he was following the work schedule, and the record fails preponderantly to show that any such deficiency would have led to his demotion irrespective of his union activity. Indeed, Respondent makes no such contention. Rather, Respondent contends that while in its employ, Vasquez was never a group leader. In support of this contention, Respondent relies on Corona's testimony that because Chemco was terminated for poor work and "that is a direct reflection on the janitors and the group leaders," Respondent decided not to accept any of Chemco's group leaders in that capacity (although it did hire all of Chemco's janitors, including group leaders, at the first four UPS locations), and at the outset not to have any group leaders. However, company witness Steele corroborated Vasquez' uncontradicted testimony that when making Steele a group leader 12 days after Respondent took over the Franklin Park operation, Palmowski told Vasquez that he was "no longer" group leader, and that Steele was the group leader "from now on." Nor did Corona contradict Vasquez' testimony that on 14 May, Corona told Vasquez that Corona would arrange to provide that evening some supplies that Vasquez had previously requested, pursuant to his duties, as a group leader, to order such supplies. I find that before 13 May 1985, Vasquez was a group leader for Respondent.

For the foregoing reasons, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by demoting Vasquez and discharging Hukic.

b. Vasquez' discharge

Although Corona gave suspiciously vacillating testimony regarding when he found out about the 13 May union meeting and the identity and conduct of those present, he admittedly learned about Vasquez' attendance when, on 14 May, he complained to Corona that Palmowski had called Vasquez a Communist for attending a union meeting. Three days later, and four days after Palmowski had demoted Vasquez from group leader because of his union activity, Palmowski gave him a warning notice that stated, inter alia, that he was spending too much time driving the electric cart. Because nobody from Respondent, UPS, or Chemco had ever before told Vasquez not to use the electric cart, which he had been using to shuttle supplies (on one occasion, in Corona's presence) and haul garbage, and because Vasquez had also been using the electric cart to transport Palmowski to his car in the parking lot, I conclude that Palmowski issued this warning notice at least partly in further retaliation for Vasquez' union activity, and in order to provide a paper basis for subsequent personnel action against him should such action prove advantageous to Respondent.

On the following day, 18 May, Boltz asked Vasquez whether he was willing to work for Respondent under the conditions described in Respondent's 17 May mailgram. Boltz at certain points in his testimony attempted to conceal the portions of Vasquez' reply, which gave Boltz reason to fear that Vasquez might join the "impending strike." Boltz' prehearing statement, however, and other portions of his testimony corroborate Vasquez' credible testimony that he replied he had no remarks to make until he spoke to his union representative. Moreover, on 20 May, at a union meeting where the union representative had announced that strike notices would be sent out, Vasquez advocated a strike for a new contract; as previously noted, Palmowski said that he heard "everything that goes down in the Union." Further, on that same day, Boltz was admittedly "shocked" by receiving Vasquez' initial charge.[56]

[53] Similarly, R. Br. at 25 asserts that Respondent "fired Hukic for poor work that did not improve." See also below at fn. 59.

[54] Strickland's adverse report to Respondent about the quality of the Jefferson cleaning work may have been made a few days after 9 May. As previously indicated, however, this report did not name Hukic; it was equally applicable to Sloan, and Sloan was not reprimanded before Hukic's discharge.

[55] NLRB v. Transportation Management Co., 462 U.S. 393, 398–404 (1983); NLRB v. Del Rey Tortilleria, 787 F.2d 1118, 1123 (7th Cir. 1986); NLRB v. Bliss and Laughlin Steel Co., 754 F.2d 229, 234 (7th Cir. 1985); Vought Corp., 273 NLRB 1290, 1292–1293 (1984), enfd. 788 F.2d 1378 (8th Cir. 1986); Schurpack, Inc., 283 NLRB 188 fn. 1 (1987).

On the following day, Boltz telephoned Vasquez that Boltz had received some complaints that the floor had not been buffed. Vasquez truthfully said that Palmowski had told him to follow the schedule of buffing the upstairs on Tuesdays and Thursdays and the downstairs on Mondays and Wednesdays. Boltz said that this was "aside from the point," and that he was going to have to discharge Vasquez anyway.

Even standing alone, this sequence of events strongly points to the conclusion that Vasquez was discharged at least partly because during the union meetings of 13 and 20 May, he advocated a strike; because, on 18 May, he told President Boltz that Vasquez would not commit himself to work under Respondent's unilaterally imposed working conditions until he had checked with the Union; and because he had filed the charges in the instant case. Moreover, this conclusion is reinforced by the incoherence in Respondent's explanations for his discharge and in management's accounts of how the discharge decision was reached.

Respondent's brief at 25 asserts that Respondent fired Vasquez "for poor work and failure to obey an order." This assertion, however, elides the assertion in Boltz' prehearing statement, which is Boltz' only explanation for the discharge, that he discharged Vasquez because certain alleged reports to Boltz led him to believe that Vasquez was failing to do the work because he wanted Admiral to get the contract again. Nor was this motivation testified to by any other member of management or supported by any other substantial evidence.[57] The sincerity of Boltz' stated motivation is further undermined by those portions of his statement that attribute his alleged conclusion to a telephoned complaint that could not have related to Vasquez' Franklin Park location. Boltz' statement and his testimony contain no reference to any belief that Vasquez performed poor work or to any knowledge before Vasquez' discharge of any warning issued to him for that or any other reason; nor does his statement or testimony refer to any contact with Corona about Vasquez. Although Corona testified that he and Boltz discussed Vasquez on the day he was discharged, Corona did not testify that he showed Boltz Palmowski's 17 May written warning to Vasquez, which referred to his work as well as his use of the electric cart, or testify in terms that he told Boltz that Vasquez performed poor work. It is true that Boltz' statement at least implies that he received and acted on a report that Vasquez had failed or refused to comply with buffing instructions, that Corona testified to receiving reports that Vasquez had failed or refused to comply with buffing instructions, and that Corona further gave at least implied testimony that he had discussed these alleged reports with Boltz before he fired Vasquez. Boltz' statement, however, avers that the report he received was given by Palmowski personally and involved instructions given by Steele at Palmowski's behest. On the other hand, Corona testified that the report he received involved instructions to Vasquez from Palmowski and then Steele, and (at certain points) that Corona discussed with Boltz the writeup (signed by Palmowski and Steele), which Boltz' statement does not claim that he saw at any material time, and regarding Respondent's evidence about its alleged 21 May preparation is very fishy indeed (see above, part II,E,2,a–c). Finally, as previously found, Vasquez did not in fact fail or refuse to comply with either Palmowski's or Steele's instructions regarding buffing.

Because of the foregoing, I find that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that Vasquez was discharged at least partly because of his union activity. Further, I find that Respondent has failed to show by a preponderance of the evidence that Vasquez would have been discharged absent his union activity (see above at fn. 55). In this connection, I note that Palmowski and Corona were personally acquainted with the male UPS manager at Franklin Park, and that by the testimony of both Vasquez and Steele, Vasquez did not refuse to comply with any buffing instructions by Steele, and the work involved was performed by Fuentes. Accordingly, I find that by discharging Vasquez, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

c. The four Northbrook employees

As previously noted, no later than 21 May Respondent received a mailgram from the Union threatening strike action to require Respondent to observe the Union's bargaining agreement with Chemco, including the above-standard wage scale. Further, by the end of that day, Respondent had unlawfully demoted and then discharged Franklin Park employee Vasquez, who had urged the employees to strike for a new contract, and Jefferson employee Hukic, who had early and repeatedly invoked the union contract when Respondent took personnel action (including wage cuts), which he disliked. Meanwhile, about 20 May, Respondent was advised that it had obtained the cleaning contract at UPS Northbrook facility. By that time, these employees were covered by a contract with the Union that set a wage scale of $13.14 an hour, 68 cents an hour higher than the wage scale set by the union bargaining agreement when Respondent had taken over the other four facilities. Further, by the time Respondent learned it was receiving the Northbrook cleaning contract, Respondent had reduced the wage scale of the unit employees at the other four UPS locations to $8.20 an hour. Moreover, all four of the Northbrook employees had attended the 13 May union meeting, at which the new Chemco contract was announced and which was followed by Palmowski's remark that he heard "everything that goes down in the Union." Also, on 21 and 22 May Boltz was making diligent and futile attempts to find out from the Union the implications of its "impending strike" telegram. In short, the union-related considerations, presented when Respondent refused on 24 May to hire the four Northbrook employees, were about the same as the union-related considerations that had led to Vasquez' unlawful demotion on 13 May and to Hukic's and Vasquez' unlawful discharge on 20 May and 21 May respectively.[58]

[56] The complaint does not allege that Vasquez' discharge violated Sec. 8(a)(4). The General Counsel's opening statement, however, averred that Vasquez was discharged partly because he filed charges with the Board against Respondent.

[57] In fact, the only evidence regarding this matter shows that Vasquez worked for Admiral for an undisclosed period before May 1984; and resumed work for it, almost a year after Respondent discharged him, at $5 an hour, about 40 percent of his Chemco wages, about 60 percent of his wage scale when Respondent discharged him, and about the same as the wage scale under Respondent's union contract. At the time of the hearing, Respondent was still performing all five of the UPS contracts here at issue.

Moreover, not only did Boltz concede that Respondent would have hired all four of the Chemco employees at Northbrook if Respondent had taken over the Northbrook location on 1 May, but also the considerations that led to Respondent's action in taking over about 1 May all the Chemco employees who worked at the other four locations were present with even greater force at Northbrook on 24 May. Thus, UPS had advised Respondent in early May that the reason the Northbrook contract had not been included with the four contracts at locations where UPS had been dissatisfied with the quality of Chemco's services was that "right now [UPS was] happy with the people that were doing Northbrook," and because UPS was "not all that upset with the cleaning there." As late as 13 May, Respondent promoted Franklin Park employee Steele to group leader because Lingner, the UPS plant maintenance manager at Northbrook, had spoken highly of Steele's work there. Further, in mid-May and before Respondent obtained the Northbrook contract, and also on the day before Respondent advised the four Chemco employees at Northbrook on 24 May that Respondent was not going to rehire them Lingner, whose recommendation regarding Steele had been accepted on 13 May, told Respondent that Lingner thought the Chemco crewmembers were doing good work and should be retained.

Finally, Corona testified, and Respondent's brief at 33–34 avers, that Respondent refused to hire the Chemco's Northbrook employees partly because of the "difficulties that we had with" Hukic and Vasquez. As found above, however, these "difficulties" consisted largely of their union activity. Cf. Crown Cork & Seal Co., 255 NLRB 14, 40–42 (1981), enfd. 691 F.2d 506 (9th Cir. 1982); Birch Run Welding & Fabricating v. NLRB, 761 F.2d 1175, 1180 (6th Cir. 1985), and cases cited.[59]

For the foregoing reasons, I find that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that Respondent refused to hire the Northbrook employees at least partly because Respondent feared that they would participate in the Union's pressures, including a threatened strike, in an effort to obtain a higher contractual wage rate than Respondent wanted to pay. Further, Respondent has failed to discharge its burden (see above at fn. 55) of showing by a preponderance of the evidence that for lawful reasons, it would have refused to hire them anyway. As previously noted, Respondent contends that it refused to hire the Chemco employees at Northbrook because of Respondent's "difficulties" with the former Chemco employees at the other four locations. Respondent, however, did not reach its decision regarding the Northbrook employees until the morning of Friday, 24 May, although an early decision would protect Respondent from the possibility of being hurried in obtaining a new work force. Respondent knew by 20 May that it would be taking over the Northbrook contract on Monday, 27 May, and (except for Respondent's "difficulties" with Vasquez and Hukic owing to their union activity) Respondent's "difficulties" with the former Chemco employees had substantially manifested themselves by 9 May, 4 days before Respondent promoted Steele partly because UPS had commended him for his Northbrook work under Chemco.[60]

For the foregoing reasons, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to hire Marsenic, King, Flores, and Skocz.

2. The alleged independent 8(a)(1) violations

Paragraph V(a) of the complaint in its final form alleges that on or about 13 May 1985, at the UPS Franklin Park facility, Respondent through Palmowski violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by creating an impression among its employees that their union activities were under surveillance. The credible evidence shows that on 13 May (about 15 hours after a union meeting held that day), and at the Franklin Park facility, Palmowski told Vasquez, "I hear everything that goes down in the [58] "[E]vidence of contemporaneous unfair labor practices is highly relevant in establishing motive under Section 8(a)(3)." NLRB v. Sure-Tan, Inc., 672 F.2d 592, 600 (7th Cir. 1982), rehearing denied 677 F.2d 584 (7th Cir. 1982), affirmed in relevant part and remanded in part 467 U.S. 883 (1984), decision on remand 277 NLRB 302 (1985). R. Br. cites only the court of appeals opinion.

[59] Indeed, concerning this argument, R. Br. at 34 goes on to state that Hukic "griped." So far as the record shows, Hukic's only griping consisted of complaints about his unlawfully motivated writeups, and complaints that Respondent was not planning to adhere to perceived requirements in the Union's expired bargaining agreement with Chemco. Plainly, Hukic could not lawfully be discharged for "griping," at a union meeting, about the unlawful writeups; see Vought, above, 273 NLRB at 1295 fn. 13. The record evidence is insufficient to show either whether Respondent was under an obligation to adhere at Hukic's Jefferson location to the wages and working conditions generated by the Chemco contract (which is not in the record) or whether Hukic's discharge for such "griping" would be unlawful on the ground that the real source of such griping was Respondent's announced intention not to comply with such an obligation. Cf. Burns, above, 406 U.S. 272; NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822 (1984), decision on remand 766 F.2d 969 (6th Cir. 1985). Respondent's reliance on such "griping" in justification of Hukic's discharge and the refusal to hire the Northbrook employees constitutes some further evidence that such action was unlawfully motivated.

[60] Because Respondent has failed preponderantly to show that it would in any event have refused to hire Chemco's Northbrook employees because of its difficulties with other former Chemco employees (except Vasquez and Hukic), Respondent's citation to Inland Container Corp., 267 NLRB 1187 (1983), is beside the point. When later reversing this decision (Inland Container Corp., 275 NLRB 378 (1985)), the Board does not appear to have withdrawn from the legal propositions set forth in its 1983 decision. Respondent brief would have shown better form by citations to the history of this case. In addition to the Inland Container Corp., decisions already cited, see 273 NLRB 1856 (1985), and 274 NLRB 887 (1985).

Union"; implied, as was in fact the case, that Vasquez had played a leading role concerning that meeting; and further implied, as was in fact the case, that at that meeting, Hukic and the Guziks had complained about their reprimands. I find that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) in the manner alleged. NLRB v. Gold Standard Enterprises, 679 F.2d 673, 676–677 (7th Cir. 1982); Tomco Carburetor Co., 275 NLRB 1, 4–5 (1985); Union National Bank, 276 NLRB 84 (1985); Eagle Headers, 273 NLRB 1486, 1490 (1985). No different result is suggested by NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, 591 F.2d 110, 113–114 (1st Cir. 1978), cited by Respondent; by calling Vasquez a Communist for his part in this meeting, Palmowski displayed extreme displeasure at it.

Paragraph V(b) of the complaint in its final form alleges that on or about 14 May 1985, at the Franklin Park facility, Respondent through Palmowski violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by impliedly threatening "an employees" with discharge because of his union activities.[61] The General Counsel's posthearing brief does not discuss this allegation, nor do I see anything in the record to support it. That paragraph will be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by giving employees the impression of surveillance.

4. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by demoting and discharging Arthur Vasquez; by discharging Avdo Hukic; and by refusing to hire Radmila Marsenic, Johnnie King, Francisco Flores, and Josef Skocz.

5. The unfair labor practices set forth in Conclusions of Law 3 and 4 affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Respondent has not violated the Act by making an implied threat of discharge for union activities.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom, and from like or related conduct, and to take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act.

As Respondent discharged employee Avdo Hukic in violation of the Act, Respondent will be required to offer him immediate reinstatement to the job of which he was unlawfully deprived or, if such a job no longer exists, a substantially equivalent job. As Respondent unlawfully demoted and thereafter unlawfully discharged Arthur Vasquez, Respondent will be required to offer him reinstatement (1) to the job from which he was unlawfully demoted, and (2) to the job from which he was unlawfully discharged; or, if such job or jobs no longer exist, to a substantially equivalent job or jobs. Such offers of reinstatement to Hukic and Vasquez shall be without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed. Further, Respondent will be required to offer to employ Marsenic, King, Flores, and Skocz in the jobs for which Respondent unlawfully refused to hire them, or, if such jobs no longer exist, substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to the seniority or other rights and privileges they would have enjoyed if they had been hired by Respondent effective 27 May 1985. In addition, Respondent will be required to make all six of these employees whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, less net interim earnings, to be computed in the mannner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as called for in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[62] Also, Respondent will be required to remove from its files any reference to the unlawful demotion, the unlawful discharge, and the unlawful refusals to hire, and to notify the discriminatees that this has been done and that evidence of such unlawful actions will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them. Regarding Hukic, this expunction order will include, without limitation, the warning notices issued to him on 7 and 9 May 1985, in view of my finding that they were issued because of his union activity and in order to provide a paper basis for subsequent personnel action against him. Regarding Vasquez, this expunction order will include, without limitation, the warning notice dated 15 May 1985 and given to him on 17 May 1985, and the warning notice bearing his name and dated 21 May 1985, in view of my finding that the 15 May notice was issued at least partly for the same reasons as the Hukic warnings and the warning notice dated 21 May (which Vasquez never received) was prepared as part of Respondent's efforts to conceal the unlawful motivation for his discharge. Alert Medical Transport, 276 NLRB 631 (1985).

In addition, Respondent will be required to make appropriate notices available to its employees. The record indicates that the employees involved in this case seldom, if ever, go to Respondent's office in Chicago. Moreover, the record fails to show whether the UPS facilities where the employees do work have employee bulletin boards on which Respondent can post notices without the consent of UPS. If Respondent has such bulletin boards, or if UPS consents to posting on bulletin boards controlled by it, Respondent will be required to post notices at the UPS locations where the unfair labor practices occurred. Otherwise, Respondent will be required to mail notices to the employees who work for it at such locations during what would otherwise be the posting period. The record shows that some of Respondent's employees speak Polish, Spanish, or Serbo-Croatian as a native language, and have limited or no knowledge of English. Accordingly, notices will be required in all four of these languages.

The General Counsel contends that the gross backpay of the four employees (Marsenic, King, Flores, and Skocz), whom Respondent unlawfully refused to hire at the Northbrook facility, should not be based on the $5 hourly wage scale of the employees who were in fact hired for those jobs. The General Counsel at least principally contends that the Northbrook employees constituted an accretion to a unit consisting of Respondent's employees at the other four UPS facilities, and that, therefore, the gross backpay of the four Northbrook discriminatees should be calculated at the rate the other employees in the unit were in fact paid, or (under the obligations imposed by Sec. 8(a)(5)) should have been paid when Respondent began to perform the Northbrook cleaning contract on 27 May 1985. As an alternative or supplemental argument, the General Counsel seems to be contending that Respondent is a successor to Chemco regarding Northbrook and, perhaps, regarding all five facilities, and that, therefore, the gross backpay of the Northbrook employees should be calculated at the $12.46 rate they were receiving under Chemco.[63] Because neither the unit nor the successorship issue was fully litigated before me, the merits of the General Counsel's claims in these respects will be deferred to the compliance stage. I note that as of 1 August 1985, the hourly rate for the Northbrook employees, and for the employees at Franklin Park (where Vasquez had worked), was fixed by the union bargaining agreement at $4.25 to $5.50, depending on length of service (see Tr. 155–157). I further note that the complaint contains no 8(a)(5) allegations.

The General Counsel's request for a visitatorial clause will be granted because litigation of the General Counsel's successorship contention would likely require evidence from Chemco and litigation of his unit contention may present some complexity. Hilton Inn North, 279 NLRB 45 (1986); but see *E. [63] See State Distributing Co., 282 NLRB 1048 (1987). The General Counsel, however, stated at the hearing that Vasquez' and Hukic's gross backpay should be calculated at the $8.20 rate they were actually receiving when they were discharged. Further, neither at the hearing nor in the General Counsel's brief does he seek a backpay remedy for Vasquez based on his demotion from his group leader's job, for which Chemco paid a premium but Respondent did not.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On March 17, 1988, Administrative Law Judge Raymond P. Green issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

Gary A. Carlson, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Michael B. Doyle, Esq., for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RAYMOND P. GREEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me on 14 December 1987. The charge and amended charge in Case 2-CA-22327 were filed by Ali Ahmed on 8 July and 24 August 1987. The charge in Case 2-CA-22403 was filed by Ahmed on 24 August 1987. Thereafter a consolidated complaint was issued by the Regional Director for Region 2 of the National Labor Relations Board on 30 September 1987. In substance the complaint alleges:

(1) That the Respondent and Local 32E, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO (Local 32E) have maintained a collective-bargaining agreement, the most recent of which runs from 15 September 1986 to 14 September 1989, which covered certain of Respondent's employees, including Ali Ahmed.

(2) That the Respondent has not provided Ahmed with the benefits provided by the aforesaid contract because Ahmed was not a member of the Union.

(3) That on or about 22 May 1987 Ahmed joined the Union after which, on 10 June 1987, the Respondent discharged him because he joined the Union.

In addition to denying the allegations of the complaint, the Respondent asserts that these cases should be dismissed because a settlement was executed between it, Ahmed, and the Union.

Based on the record as a whole, including my observation of the demeanor of the witness, and after considering the briefs filed, make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is a corporation engaged in the business of managing and renting real estate, including apartment buildings, in New York State. It was stipulated that annually the Respondent has gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and that it purchases goods and supplies from directly outside the State of New York valued in excess of $2000. I therefore find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Mandel Management Co., 229 NLRB 1121 (1977).

I also find that Local 32E is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. OPERATIVE FACTS

The apartment buildings involved in this case (called Skyview) are located at 5700, 5800, and 5900 Arlington Avenue, Riverdale, New York. Together, this complex has 1306 apartments and the Respondent has about 50 employees working at these sites, including 18 porters. In addition to the three apartment buildings, there is also a separate recreation facility located across the street at 5701 Arlington Avenue. Prior to September 1987, there was a swimming pool, a cafeteria, meeting rooms, locker rooms, and a sauna located at this separate building. After the poll closed in September 1987, the building has been undergoing a complete renovation and is currently closed.

Skyview was originally owned and managed by Carol Management, which in 1985 sold property to Coronet Properties. Westcroft Realty Corp., in turn, took over the management functions from Carol on 15 August 1986.

For many years certain of the employees working at Skyview have been represented by Local 32E and the evidence indicates that when the Respondent Westcroft took over from Carol, it retained the services of Carol's employees and supervisors. Among those retained was Sali Rexhepi, the director of maintenance, who had been employed at Skyview for 11 years. The Respondent also entered into a contract with Local 32E for the historical bargaining unit. This contract, which runs from 15 September 1986 to 14 September 1989, covers superintendents, assistant superintendents, utility groundsmen, handymen, doormen, and porters. By the contract's specific terms, in both the first paragraph and Schedule A, it covers the foregoing classifications of employees at 5700, 5800, and 5900 Arlington Avenue. It does not purport to cover any employees at 5701 Arlington Avenue and clearly was not intended to do so.

The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] In affirming the judge's finding that Charging Party Ahmed's job was not included in the bargaining unit, we do not rely on what the judge referred to as the "plain language" of the collective-bargaining agreement because we find the contract to be ambiguous on this question. Rather, we agree with the judge's reliance on the conduct of the contracting parties as demonstrating a mutual intent to exclude Ahmed's position from the bargaining unit.

Ali Ahmed was first hired in January 1984 as a porter to work at 5701 Arlington Avenue (i.e., the recreation facility). He has never been paid the wages and benefits set forth in any agreement with Local 32E.

After Ahmed had worked for a while, he learned from employees in the other buildings that they had a union. He states that at some point in 1986, he told Rexhepi that he wanted to join the Union, but the latter said he could not and changed the subject. According to Ahmed, on an occasion in May 1987 he was told by Rexhepi that he was not in the Union and was not entitled to sick pay. (Ahmed had made an inquiry through another employee about sick pay.)

On 12 March 1987 the Respondent entered into a contract with Iowa Sports Management, which agreed to manage the recreation facility at 5701 Arlington Avenue from 23 May 1987 to 12 September 1987. As part of the agreement, Iowa contracted to furnish its own staff, including one to two porters. Rexhepi testified that he told Ahmed, in early May that Iowa was taking over his job and that he should look for employment elsewhere. Ahmed denies receiving such notice.

According to Ahmed, some of the other employees convinced him to join the Union in May 1987. He states that on 22 May he went with two other porters and met with John Pinto, a union representative. Ahmed, at this meeting, signed a dues-checkoff authorization card for Local 32E and paid an initiation fee.

Ahmed testified that on 10 June 1987 he handed the checkoff authorization card to Rexhepi, not having shown the card to anyone in management before. Ahmed testified:

> I showed [Sali Rexhepi] the card and then he looked, he read. I told him that I joined the union and this is the card. So he looked and then he said: "Ali, you're fired. You're fired because you joined the union."
> I told him: "Mr. Sali, okay, I have three kids, you know. I don't want the union, just let me stay."
> He said: "No, its too late. You did this behind my back."

Rexhepi testified that because of a delay Iowa did not come in to operate the recreation facility until 10 June. He states that on this date, he called Ahmed into his office and told him that because Iowa was taking over, his job was eliminated. Rexhepi testified that:

> He turned around and he says: "Mr. Sali, please, can you help me, because I have kids and I'm in a union?" the first time I hear he's in a union.
> . . . .
> I says: "Ali, got nothing open, job open for you and there's nothing I can do. Please, if you're in a union, you know the time I hire you, job is non-union job. But if you in a union, go back to the union and I hope they help you, they find a job for you."[1]

Later, on 10 June, Ahmed told Pinto of Local 32E that he had been discharged. He states that Pinto said not to worry, that he should register for unemployment benefits and come back in several days to see what was happening.

According to Ahmed, he went back to see Pinto on 17 June On this occasion Pinto told him that the union contract did not cover the building where Ahmed worked. Pinto also told Ahmed that he would try to get him another job.

On 8 July Ahmed filed this charge with Region 2 of the NLRB. Thereafter, on 29 July, the Union asked for an "informal hearing" with the employer to discuss the dismissal of Ahmed. On 5 August, by memo to the Board agent investigating the case, William Archer, on behalf of the Respondent, stated that it would be willing to arbitrate grievance with Local 32E a relating to the discharge of Ahmed. As a result, the Region deferred further proceedings in the case.

On 6 August 1987 a meeting was held at the Union's office. This was attended by Ahmed, Pinto, and Rexhepi. As far as I can determine, the discharge of Ahmed was discussed and there also were discussions whether Ahmed was in the Union. (According to Archer, when he asked Pinto, the latter said, "Well yes and no.") At the conclusion of the discussion, the Company offered to settle the case by giving Ahmed 2 weeks' severance pay plus a favorable letter of reference. Pinto, in turn, urged Ahmed to accept the offer and Ahmed agreed. Accordingly, on 6 August, the following document was executed by Ahmed, Pinto, and Arden:

III. ANALYSIS

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (2), and (3) of the Act by not giving Ahmed the wages and other benefits of the Local 32E contract because he was not a member of the Union.[3]

There is no question but that Ahmed has not been paid the wages and other contractual benefits since the beginning of his employment in 1984. The evidence shows however, that this was not because Ahmed was not a member of the Union, but rather because his position was not encompassed within the bargaining unit. Thus, the contract explicitly covers only certain categories of employees (including porter), employed at 5700, 5800, and 5900 Arlington Avenue. It does not cover any employee at the separate recreation facility located at 5701 Arlington Avenue. That Ahmed's job was not included in the bargaining unit is not merely evidenced by the plain language of the contract, but also by the conduct of the contracting parties in not treating him as part of the bargaining unit for the 3 years that he was employed. Indeed, after Ahmed had been discharged and sought to file a grievance, the Union's representative, Pinto, indicated to him that there might be a problem because the collective-bargaining agreement did not cover the building in which Ahmed worked.[4]

In light of the above, I conclude that the contract did not cover Ahmed's position of employment and therefore the Respondent's failure to pay him the contractual benefits neither violated the Act nor breached the contract.

The contention that Ahmed was discharged because he joined Local 32E rests on what took place on 10 June 1987. Ahmed's version was that about 3 weeks after he joined Local 32E he finally presented his dues-checkoff authorization card to Rexhepi, who fired him on the spot "because you joined the Union."

Rexhepi's more plausible version was that, having contracted with Iowa to manage and staff the recreation facility, he told Ahmed in early May 1987 to look for another job and that on the day that Iowa took over (10 June), he told Ahmed that his services no longer were needed. According to the credited testimony of Rexhepi, after telling Ahmed of his discharge, Ahmed pleaded for his job, saying he was in the Union.

In crediting Rexhepi, I note, in addition to his demeanor, the fact that his version is consistent with other objective evidence in this case, particularly that the contract with Iowa provides for the latter to hire its own porters and that the conversation with Ahmed took place on the day that Iowa commenced operations at the recreation building. Moreover, I note the complete lack of evidence pointing to animus against Local 32E or any other union on the part of the Employer. While it is true that the Respondent only recently took over the management of Skyview, the evidence shows that it hired the predecessor's unionized employees and readily entered into a contract with Local 32E covering about 50 employees at the three buildings. Further, Rexhepi, the director of maintenance, had been continuously employed at Skyview for 11 years, during which time the Union had been the bargaining representative. In this regard, there is no evidence of any animus by Rexhepi toward the Union. I therefore find it implausible that in a situation in which Rexhepi for 11 years had supervised and dealt with about 50 union employees, he would preemptively discharge a single employee who presented him with a union dues-checkoff authorization card.

In short I credit the account given by Rexhepi and conclude that Ahmed was not discharged because he joined Local 32E.[5]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Westcroft Realty Corp. is an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 32E, Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The Respondent has not violated the Act as alleged in the consolidated complaint.

[2] In accordance with the settlement, Ahmed did receive a check, which he cashed.

[3] The General Counsel relies on such cases as F & C Transfer Co., 277 NLRB 591 (1985); Kaufman DeDell Printing, 251 NLRB 78, 79-80 (1980); Narragansett Restaurant, 243 NLRB 125, 128-130 (1979); Schorr Stern Food Corp., 227 NLRB 1650 (1977); *D. [4] The issue here is what, in fact, was the contract bargaining unit and not what the Board would decide, in a representation case, an appropriate bargaining unit should be.

The fact that the Company agreed to arbitrate Ahmed's discharge after the unfair labor practice charge was filed is not viewed by me as an admission that Ahmed's job was part of the contractual bargaining unit. Such a commitment was made as an expedient to have the processing of the unfair labor practice charge deferred.

[5] Having reached this conclusion on the merits, I do not feel that it is necessary for me to decide whether the settlement made on 6 August 1987 should be deferred. In this regard, I note that there are similarities and distinctions from the facts in Independent Stave Co., 287 NLRB 740 (1987). That case discussed some of the criteria the Board would consider when deciding whether to defer to a privately negotiated settlement.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

It is recommended that the consolidated complaint be dismissed.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN STEPHENS AND MEMBERS
BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On September 30, 1982, Administrative Law Judge Michael D. Stevenson issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the Charging Party filed exceptions, supporting briefs, and answering briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

A. The 8(a)(1) Allegations

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by the statements of the Respondent's president, Augustus Zemba, to employee Frank Patton in October 1980 and by the statements of the Respondent's director of safety and training, Flo Ybarra, at a meeting of nonstriking employees in January 1981. We also agree with the judge that Zemba violated Section 8(a)(1) by his November 1980 comments to Thomas Reynolds concerning the Labor Law Journal article about misconduct by strikers. According to Reynolds' credited testimony, Zemba falsely threatened—citing the article as authority—that any employee who was on the picket line at the time any other employee engaged in misconduct would be ineligible to return to work. An employer cannot lawfully make such a threat regardless of whether it invites the employees who hear it to consult attorneys or whether those employees have themselves been reading articles on the general subject of picket line misconduct.

We do not, however, adopt his finding of a violation in Zemba's statement to Reynolds in February 1981 that the former was disappointed that Donald Randall and employee Jan Corona, president of the Union in 1979 and 1980, and chief shop steward, respectively, were still in positions of authority with the Union. The remark occurred during a conversation when Reynolds joined Zemba and Ellen Harrison, the Respondent's comptroller, who were having coffee at a local restaurant, and did not include any threats of reprisals. Inasmuch as the comment was made in the course of an otherwise noncoercive conversation, we find that in light of all the circumstances we cannot agree with the judge that Zemba's February remark reasonably tended to restrain, coerce, or interfere with rights guaranteed by the Act.[1] Accordingly, we shall dismiss this allegation.

B. The 8(a)(5) Allegations

In section III,C,2, of his decision the judge rejected the contention that the Respondent engaged in bad-faith bargaining prior to the onset of the strike. We agree.[2]

The judge also found in section III,D, that on April 3, 1981, the parties agreed on a contract and that the Respondent thereafter unlawfully refused to execute that agreement and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by bad-faith and surface bargaining subsequent to commencement of the strike. We disagree with these conclusions and reverse for the reasons set forth below.[3]

As discussed by the judge, the collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the Respondent expired on June 30, 1980. Negotiations for a new contract had begun on June 12, but were unsuccessful, and the Union struck on August 23, 1980. During the strike there was a hiatus in the parties' bargaining sessions following the Respondent's proposal of November 6, 1980. After an exchange of correspondence, Union President Moore wrote to the Federal mediator on February 23, 1981,[4] asking that a meeting with the Respondent be arranged in order to present a union counterproposal. The parties met on March 12.

Prior to the March 12 meeting, the Respondent's attorney and chief negotiator, Josiah Neeper, sent a letter to Union Counsel Richard Prochazka, who had been designated as the Union's new chief negotiator in Moore's letter. Neeper's letter noted that the original purpose of the meeting had been the Respondent's receipt of a new counterproposal from the Union, but went on to state that in "preparing for the meeting, the Respondent finds that its position has changed since the time of its last

[2] We need not decide here whether the proposal by the Respondent of a clause diminishing the Union's role in the grievance procedure is evidence of bad faith, because we agree with the judge that the Respondent did not insist to impasse on the proposal.

[3] We adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) of the Act by making a unilateral change in its health benefit plan. We shall amend the Order, however, to provide make-whole relief for any losses employees may have suffered as a result of the change in plans.

[4] All dates hereafter are 1981 unless noted otherwise.

proposal because of changed circumstances. Its changed position will be reflected in its response to the Union's proposal."

At the March 12 meeting Neeper referred to the "changed circumstances" mentioned in the letter and stated that at a subsequent meeting the Respondent would present proposals in response to the "changed circumstances."[5] The Union then tendered a proposal that made certain changes in the Respondent's November 6 proposal, rejected the union-security subclause that would have exempted nonstriking employees from the requirement of joining the Union, and accepted the grievance-and-arbitration article contained in the Respondent's November 6 proposal. Neeper asked some questions about certain sections of the Union's counterproposal and again stated that the Respondent would be making a new proposal based on changed circumstances.

At the next meeting held on March 26, Neeper presented the Respondent's counterproposal, which included most of the provisions in the Respondent's proposal of November 6, certain modifications to that proposal in response to matters raised by the Union on March 12, and the Respondent's previously promised response to "changed circumstances." The Respondent's March 26 proposal included section 9.7, which provided that employees who had been off work for more than 3 months would be required to take a physical examination from the Respondent's physician; section 9.8, which required employees who had been off work more than 30 days to be requalified on all equipment for which they had been qualified before being off work; section 9.9, which provided that employees who had been off work more than 3 months must provide a current Department of Motor Vehicles printout of their driving record; and section 17.8, which obligated the Respondent to bear the cost of any required physical examination of employees. In addition, the March 26 proposal stipulated that provisions regarding resolution of the strike and reinstatement of the strikers would be negotiated. Neeper identified sections 9.7 through 9.9 and the provision for negotiation of a strike settlement as the Respondent's response to its perception of changed circumstances. The Respondent informed the Union that, based on the recommendations of an industrywide group, it had substantially instituted the procedures in sections 9.7, 9.8, and 9.9 in October or November 1980 and described the justification for the particular subsections. It is undisputed that Neeper informed the Union that the provisions were to apply to returning strikers, and the Union did not object. With respect to the anticipated negotiation of provisions relating to resolution of the strike and the return to work of the strikers, Neeper—according to testimony specifically credited by the judge—told the Union that the Respondent expected to propose specific language and anticipated that the Union would make demands in the area as part of a final agreement. The judge found that one of the union representatives "nodded" in understanding of what was said, if not in agreement with it.

The parties' next meeting was on April 2. The Union first proposed modifications to sections 9.7, 9.8, and 9.9, which were rejected by the Respondent. Union negotiator Prochazka then wrote out modifications of sections 9.7 and 9.9, which the Respondent accepted. After discussion of the notice-of-termination section of the November 6 proposal, Neeper again referred to specific proposals that the Respondent desired to offer and mentioned that the Respondent expected to receive proposals from the Union regarding strike resolution and striker return.

The parties then broke for lunch prior to the scheduled afternoon session. During the lunchbreak the union representatives met with International Vice President Yelkey; in consequence, Prochazka called Neeper to cancel that afternoon's session, stating that "the International is unhappy with what we've done. They don't want us to meet with you this afternoon." Neeper and Prochazka then arranged for a meeting to be held on April 9.

Meanwhile, the union negotiators conferred during the afternoon of April 2, and called a general membership meeting for the following day. At that meeting, the membership voted both to return to work and to accept the Respondent's proposal as it was explained to them by the bargaining team. The Union then sent the Respondent two letters that had been prepared prior to the membership meeting. One letter purported to make an unconditional offer to return to work, and the other purported to be an acceptance of the Company's contract offer of April 2.[6]

As noted above, the judge found that the parties reached agreement on a collective-bargaining agreement and that the Respondent thereafter violated Section 8(a)(5) by declining to execute it. We disagree. In our view, the record does not support a finding that agreement was reached on strike resolution and striker return. First, the Union's letter of April 3 clearly demonstrates that the Union was accepting not all, but rather only a part of the Respondent's offer. Thus, the record shows that the Union knew—and acknowledged—that the Respondent intended that provisions pertaining to strike resolution and striker return be included in any final agreement. But the Union's letter, after purporting to accept the Respondent's proposal, states that the Union viewed striker return and strike resolution provisions as issues "separate and apart" from a collective-bargaining agreement, although the Union would be willing to discuss those subjects independently of a collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, the Union's purported "acceptance" really amounted to a counteroffer, which the Respondent of course was not obligated to accept. Indeed, given the Union's acknowledgment that it knew that the Respondent meant to include strike resolution and striker return provisions as part of any final agreement, we conclude that the Union, or at least the Union's attorney, could not in fact have held a good-faith belief that the parties had reached a complete agreement along the rather different terms embodied in the Union's letter.[7] Hence, we find it clear from the evidence that there was in fact no meeting of the minds between the parties. Certainly, the Union was free to make an unconditional offer to return to work and end the strike, and to have the Board resolve any issues regarding the return of the strikers. But it was not entitled to insist also that the other remaining portions of the Respondent's proposal constituted the entire, complete, and enforceable collective-bargaining agreement between the parties, in light of the Respondent's clear statements to the contrary.

[5] The changed circumstances referred to picket line misconduct by strikers that might disqualify them from reinstatement, the fact that a large number of replacement drivers had been hired who might wish to retain their jobs after the strike (resulting in an insufficient amount of work for both the replacements and the returning strikers), and the possibility that the replacement drivers might object to a union-security provision that would subject them to union discipline.

[6] The letters are set forth in full in the judge's decision.

The judge further concluded that the Respondent refused to offer bargaining proposals regarding matters of strike resolution and striker return and that, even if such a proposal was made, it was unlawful, citing Georgia Kraft Co.,[8] and Fitzgerald Mills Corp.,[9] respectively. In our view, the former finding is contrary to the judge's own crediting, which we affirm, of Neeper's testimony that the Respondent intended to make proposals regarding strike resolution and the return to work of strikers, and that the Respondent expected also to receive proposals on these issues from the Union. Further, the judge's reliance on Georgia Kraft is misplaced. In that case the Board stated:

> Contrary to the Administrative Law Judge, however, a review of the record plainly reflects that the issue of striker discipline was not, on December 3, presented by Respondent as a bargainable proposal, nor was it put forth on that date as a quid pro quo for agreement on a contract. Thus, it was unnecessary for the Administrative Law Judge to speculate as to what Henson's stipulated testimony "suggests," nor is it "obvious" that the issue of striker reinstatement was a bargainable "proposal" on December 3. Kelly was initially examined on this subject, as an adverse witness called by the General Counsel:
> Q. Whose idea was it, Mr. Kelly, to give Mr. Henson . . . a list of strikers to be fired?
> A. Mine.
> Q. Do you want to explain for us any reason that you had for doing it at that time as opposed to any other?
> A. No, no, just that we had the meeting scheduled with Mr. Henson that particular day, and we thought—I thought we should advise them about the situation with these employees. [Id. at 909.]

Here, by contrast, the Respondent clearly put forth the issues of striker return and strike settlement as matters that it intended should be resolved as part of a final overall agreement. Nor did the Respondent bargain to impassse here. Indeed, the judge seems to have overlooked the factual setting—and its effect—that it was the Union which broke off in the middle of negotiations and, before their scheduled resumption, counteroffered with an acceptance of part of the Respondent's proposal and attempted to assert that that part constituted the entire agreement between the parties.

The judge's alternative finding that if the Respondent made any proposal regarding strike resolution and striker return that proposal was unlawful, is in our view simply erroneous and appears to be based, so far as the record shows, solely on conjecture. In this regard, we conclude that Fitzgerald Mills Corp. is inapposite here. In that case, the respondent's attorney insisted that before any contract could be negotiated, the union would have to agree to the respondent's proposal with respect to the strikers. Thus, respondent there conditioned any bargaining on the union's prior agreement to a specific nonmandatory proposal. It is clear from the discussion above of the relevant facts that a similar situation did not occur in the instant case. Indeed, there is nothing unlawful in the suggestion made by the Respondent, in the course of the negotiations, that those strikers accused of misconduct, together with their union representative, meet with the Respondent regarding those allegations, that the parties negotiate with respect to those individuals, and in those instances where the parties could not reach agreement, that they attempt to arrange some sort of expedited or abbreviated arbitration procedure.[10] [7] For the purposes of our discussion, the same result obtains whether one views the Respondent as proposing only a single integrated agreement, or a separate agreement covering strike resolution and striker return issues, which would be resolved concurrently as part of a package. Either view is consistent with the judge's finding, based on credibility determinations, which we adopt, that Neeper told the Union on March 26 and again on April 2 that there were specific proposals that the Respondent desired to make, and anticipated that the Union would also make demands "as part of a final agreement." However, these same factual findings are not compatible with a conclusion that the parties in fact reached agreement.

[8] 258 NLRB 908 (1981). Subsequent to the judge's decision here, the Board in Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044 (1984), overruled Georgia Kraft on the standards for striker misconduct. (See discussion, infra, under striker reinstatement issues, sec. 3, misconduct.)

[9] 133 NLRB 877 (1961), enfd. 313 F.2d 260 (2d Cir. 1963), cert. denied 375 U.S. 834 (1963).

Unlike the judge, we conclude that the situation here is strikingly similar to that presented in Nordstrom, Inc., 229 NLRB 601 (1977). The Board's summary there is similarly appropriate here: "The issue here, succinctly, is whether one party to collective-bargaining negotiations can effectively conclude negotiations by agreeing only to those demands of the other party which constitute mandatory subjects of bargaining." (279 NLRB at 601) The Board answered the question in the negative. Although it is true that a party may not lawfully insist on inclusion of nonmandatory proposals—a course that we have found the Respondent did not pursue in the instant case—we believe that the judge's decision here, like the General Counsel's case in Nordstrom, goes well beyond that proposition. Thus, to say as here that the proponent of a proposal addressing reinstatement and backpay of former strikers cannot lawfully insist on its inclusion in the final agreement means only that and no more. "It does not mean that once, out of necessity, the nonmandatory proposal is removed from the table, the proponent of the nonmandatory subject is not permitted to alter those proposals which are mandatory in light of the removal of the nonmandatory subject." Nordstrom, supra at 601. In sum, contrary to the judge, we agree with the Respondent that Nordstrom compels the conclusion in the instant case that the Union was not free to disregard or eliminate portions of the Respondent's March 26 offer and, by accepting the remaining Respondent proposals, assert that it had established a complete and binding collective-bargaining agreement that the Respondent was required to execute. Accordingly, we reverse and dismiss those portions of the complaint allegations.

The judge also concluded that the Respondent engaged in bad-faith and surface bargaining after the commencement of the strike. He based that conclusion on his finding, which we have reversed above, that the Respondent unlawfully refused to execute a contract and insisted on nonmandatory subjects; the 8(a)(1) findings discussed above; and his assessment that the Respondent's proposals with respect to resolving strike issues would be "predictably unacceptable" to the Union. The judge provided no basis for his assessment that the striker return and strike resolution proposals were "predictably unacceptable" apart from his findings in support of the refusal to sign an agreed-on contract allegation. The Board has recently reaffirmed its standards for the review of contract proposals in Reichhold Chemicals, 288 NLRB 69 (1988). Although the Board will not make purely subjective assessments of bargaining proposals, it will "continue to examine proposals when appropriate and consider whether, on the basis of objective factors, a demand is clearly designed to frustrate agreement on a collective-bargaining contract." Ibid. In view of the factual and legal analysis underlying our reversal of the judge with respect to the refusal-to-sign-a-contract allegation, we find that the striker return and strike resolution proposals clearly do not support a finding of bad-faith bargaining under the Reichhold Chemicals test. Finally, we do not consider the 8(a)(1) violations found above to be a sufficient ground on which to base a finding that the Respondent engaged in bad-faith or surface bargaining.[11] The judge in his discussion of the prestrike allegations concluded there was no evidence that Zemba's statements regarding the Union or misconduct by individuals were calculated to disrupt the negotiations or that they did so. Contrary to the judge, we believe that the same is true of Zemba's and Ybarra's statements with respect to the allegations of bad faith in the poststrike bargaining.

Accordingly, for all the foregoing reasons, we dismiss the allegations of bad-faith and surface bargaining in the poststrike negotiations.

C. Striker Reinstatement Issues

1. The physical examination and testing requirements

The judge concluded that the strikers listed in "Appendix A" of his decision did not receive a valid offer of reinstatement, premising this conclusion primarily on his finding that the Respondent unlawfully insisted that the returning strikers submit to physical examinations, take tests to requalify as drivers, submit printouts of Department of Motor Vehicles records (which would show any traffic violations), and fill out employment applications. The judge's principal theory for finding a violation was that these conditions amounted to treating the strikers as new employees. If this were so, i.e., if these were conditions not imposed on nonstriking employees, then, under the authorities relied on by the judge, the Respondent would be guilty both of engaging in disparate treatment that penalized employees for striking and of imposing a condition that renders the offer of reinstatement suspect. The Respondent would thereby have violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Standard Materials, 237 NLRB 1136 (1978), enfd. mem. 604 F.2d 449 (5th Cir. 1979); St. Cloud Foundry & Machine Co., 130 NLRB 911, 919 (1961); *NLRB v. [10] We do not suggest that the Respondent was entitled to insist to impasse on those proposals; since we conclude that the Respondent here did not insist to impasse, we need not reach that issue.

[11] The judge dismissed complaint allegations that statements attributed to Tom Ingersol violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. As no exceptions were filed to that finding, we do not consider those allegations.

The judge also concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally implementing the physical examination and testing requirements in October or November 1980, and he reasoned that this was an additional basis for finding that the Respondent had not made valid offers of reinstatement to the strikers.[12]

For the reasons set forth below, we do not agree that, under the circumstances here, the conditions contained in the reinstatement offers violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, or that the Respondent had imposed the physical examination and testing requirements unilaterally, that it, therefore, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, and that including these requirements as a condition to reinstatement invalidated the offers.[13]

The judge's 8(a)(3) and (1) finding is in conflict with his finding that, since October or November 1980, the Respondent had been "using substantially the same procedures" as those outlined in its proposals for sections 9.7, 9.8, and 9.9 of the new collective-bargaining agreement, i.e., requirements that any employee who has been off work for more than 3 months take a physical examination at the Respondent's expense prior to returning to duty and provide a current Department of Motor Vehicles printout of his or her driving record, and that any employee who has been off work for more than 30 days take tests to be requalified on equipment for which he or she was qualified prior to the time off. Because these requirements on their face do not apply only to strikers and because the judge found (with adequate support in the record) that they had in fact been implemented in the fall of 1980, when the Respondent was operating with replacements or nonstriking employees, we cannot agree that the Respondent's attempt to impose them on the returning strikers (all of whom had been off work for more than 3 months) amounted to treating the strikers as if they were new employees.

With respect to the supposed requirement that the strikers fill out complete new job applications, we do not find that the testimony of two employees whom the judge credited is sufficient to carry the General Counsel's burden of showing that the Respondent was treating the strikers as new employees. The Respondent's comptroller, Ellen Harrison, testified without contradiction that in reviewing the Respondent's personnel files in the fall of 1980 she discovered that the files needed updating as to such matters as current addresses, records of on-the-job injuries, and identity of persons to notify in case of emergency. She also testified that in order to secure such information from the returning strikers after the Union made the unconditional offer to return on their behalf, she asked them to fill out certain parts of job application forms in order to make sure all personnel information was current. The judge relied on the testimony of two returning strikers, Mary Mason and Jose Tovar, in concluding that the strikers were required to fill out applications as if they were new employees. But Tovar's testimony was vague—he recalled being told to fill out some forms—"but I don't recall what they were"—and he recalls filling out "the questions"—none of which he described. According to Mason's testimony, the strikers were specifically instructed by Harrison that they did not need to fill out the entire application form, although Flo Ybarra, the Respondent's director of safety and training, later told them to fill out the entire forms. We cannot conclude, on the basis of all the evidence, including the testimony credited by the judge, that the conflicting instructions as to the application forms amounted to an effort to treat the strikers as new employees, especially in view of the fact that Harrison was the one in charge of processing the returning strikers and was Ybarra's superior.

[12] This allegation was not included in the complaint, but counsel for the General Counsel argued in his posthearing brief that the matter had actually been litigated and the judge so found. For the reasons set forth below, we do not agree with the judge that a finding may be made on this allegation.

[13] Nor do we agree with the judge that the Respondent's reference in the offers to strikers who "may be entitled to reinstatement" implied the existence of conditions other than those that we find, infra, were lawfully imposed. Although the offers of reinstatement were therefore valid ones, we agree with the judge that the Respondent failed in its obligation to offer immediate reinstatement to the strikers on their unconditional offer to return to work. Accordingly, we shall provide that the Respondent make whole the srikers listed in App. A of the judge's decision for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from the delay in offering them reinstatement.

This case is therefore unlike the authorities on which the judge relied, in which the evidence showed that strikers were treated in a way that only new employees were treated.[14] The issue here of new conditions applied to strikers resembles instead the physical examination issue in Lone Star Industries, 279 NLRB 550 (1986), affd. in part and vacated in part 813 F.2d 472 (D.C. Cir. 1987), in which the Board found that the employer did not violate Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by imposing a physical examination requirement on returning strikers since the policy applied to all employees. The Board acknowledged that the employer had not yet administered it to all the replacements and early returning strikers, but it concluded that delays and imperfections in accomplishing the full-scale implementation did not mandate a finding that the employer was requiring the examination only of strikers.

Of course, if it is shown that an ostensibly across-the-board policy in fact discriminates against strikers in a significant way and the employer has no counterbalancing substantial business justification, we will find a violation of Section 8(a)(3) under the theory of NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26, 34 (1967). Thus, in Lone Star, the Board found a violation in the employer's new policy of totally eliminating seniority as a basis for assigning work, including overtime. The policy economically injured the strikers, nearly all whom had longer time on the job than any of the replacement employees, and the respondent failed to put on any business justification defense at all for the policy. Under those circumstances, an inference of antiunion motive was permissible. Here, however, the General Counsel has not adduced evidence showing that the conditions in question would significantly disadvantage strikers in comparison with replacements or nonstrikers, and given the evidence of nondiscriminatory business purposes served by the requirements—considerations of safety and completeness of personnel information—we cannot conclude that the balance under Great Dane is properly struck so as to permit an inference of discriminatory motive.[15]

We further find, contrary to the judge, that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally implementing the physical examination and testing requirements in October and November 1980 and imposing these conditions on the strikers following their unconditional offer to return. As noted above at footnote 12, this allegation was not included in the complaint, but the judge, in response to the General Counsel's posthearing brief, found that the matter had been fully litigated. This conclusion does not adequately acknowledge the Respondent's argument that the General Counsel's allegation that the Respondent unlawfully refused to execute the agreement purportedly reached on April 3, 1981, including the conditions contained in sections 9.7, 9.8, and 9.9, conflicts with a theory that these conditions were unilaterally implemented. Moreover, the Respondent presented evidence regarding its application of the conditions to employees as early as the fall of 1980 to rebut the General Counsel's theory that these same conditions were applied discriminatorily to returning strikers. We can assume that, had the Respondent known of the unilateral change allegation, it would have presented its defense differently. Therefore, the Respondent did not receive adequate notice of a material issue, and the parties did not fully and fairly litigate the unilateral change allegation. Castaways Hotel, 284 NLRB 612 (1987). 2. The resignations

We adopt the judge's determination that strikers Carr, Dredden, and Marks resigned their employment; that Banning, Conyer, Doty, Ozgundez, Planje, and Reid did not; and that the Respondent is, therefore, not entitled to deny the latter six employees reinstatement on that ground. We also agree with the judge's conclusion that Umphreys resigned. Contrary to the judge, however, we, therefore, conclude that the Respondent was not obligated to offer her reinstatement, and accordingly find it unnecessary to pass on his findings with respect to her alleged misconduct.

3. The misconduct issues

In considering the circumstances involved with respect to the individual strikers denied reinstatement, the judge properly relied on current Board law at the time of his decision. Thus, in assessing particular types or instances of misconduct, he relied largely on the tests and standards set forth in such cases as Coronet Casuals, 207 NLRB 304 (1973); W. C. McQuaide, Inc., 220 NLRB 593 (1975); A. Duie Pyle, Inc., 263 NLRB 744 (1982); Georgia Kraft Co., 258 NLRB 908 (1981); and MP Industries, 227 NLRB 1709 (1977).

[14] Craw & Son, 244 NLRB 241, 242 (1979); Standard Materials, supra; NLRB v. Robinson Freight Lines, supra.

[15] The judge's factual findings confirm the Respondent's account that the requirements for testing, medical examinations, and provision of Department of Motor Vehicles printouts were instituted around the time that the safety representatative of the United Bus Owners Association visited the Respondent and made recommendations concerning changes in procedures at least 5 months before the strike ended. In addition, the Union apparently regarded the new procedures as acceptable as general conditions of employment, apart from the question of striker return, because (with the exception of the personnel file updates) they were included in the contract that the Union insisted represented the parties' entire agreement. For reasons set out below, however, we do not find that the Union had agreed to them when first implemented or that it had agreed to them if they were not part of a bargaining agreement that the Respondent would be willing to execute.

On February 22, 1984, in Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044, the Board reevaluated the appropriate standard for determining the reinstatement rights of employees who engaged in strike-related misconduct. In so doing, the Board adopted the standard formulated by the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in NLRB v. W. C. McQuaide, Inc., 552 F.2d 519, 527 (1977), and overruled prior Board decisions for the extent they were inconsistent. In Clear Pine, the Board announced that it would apply the following test for determining whether strike misconduct directed at fellow employees justifies an employer's refusal to reinstate a striker: "whether the misconduct is such that, under the circumstances existing, it may reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of rights protected under the Act." (Clear Pine at 1046.) The Board also stated that it would apply an analogous standard to the assessment of strikers' verbal and nonverbal conduct directed against persons who do not enjoy the protection of Section 7 of the Act. Id. at 1046 fn. 14 (plurality opinion). Id. at 1048 (concurring opinion). Thus, misconduct aimed at managers or other nonemployees may also be grounds for denying reinstatement.

The plurality in Clear Pine further rejected the prior practice in cases involving unfair labor practice strikes of balancing the severity of the employer's unfair labor practices (that may have provoked the strike) against the gravity of the striker misconduct.[16] In the instant case, the judge utilized this balancing test in assessing whether the conduct of certain individuals warranted a denial of reinstatement because of his earlier conclusion that the Respondent had bargained in bad faith following the commencement of the strike and that the strikers had thus become unfair labor practice strikers. As set forth above, we have dismissed the main allegations of bad-faith bargaining subsequent to the commencement of the strike, and the violations that we have found came to the strikers' notice only after they had engaged in the misconduct for which they were denied reinstatement. Accordingly, the balancing test referred to above would not be appropriate here.

Were we simply to apply the stricter Clear Pine standard to each contested refusal to reinstate on the ground of strike misconduct, we would find as disqualifying misconduct some types of behavior that the judge believed he could not so find under Board law as it then stood. We cannot resolve the issues simply on that basis, however, because we must also consider the Union's argument, made in its exceptions, that the judge did not correctly analyze the evidence supporting the Union's claim that a comparison of the Respondent's treatment of nonstrikers or replacements who engaged in misconduct with the Respondent's treatment of strikers shows a clear pattern of disparate treatment based on participation in the strike. Although an employer does not violate the Act by refusing to reinstate strikers who have engaged in serious misconduct, it is not free to apply a double standard. It may not knowingly tolerate behavior by nonstrikers or replacements that is at least as serious as, or more serious than, conduct of strikers that the employer is relying on to deny reinstatement to jobs. Garrett Railroad Car & Equipment v. NLRB, 683 F.2d 731, 740 (3d Cir. 1982) (applying the principle but upholding the refusal to reinstate because employer lacked knowledge of nonstriker involvement in misconduct). The Union contends that the Respondent applied such a double standard here and that, as a result, none of the denials of reinstatement is lawful. We agree in part. As our analysis of the evidence below reveals, we find that some of the nonstrikers engaged in misconduct that was at least as serious as some of the striker misconduct; yet, the Respondent did not even suspend those nonstrikers for the actions in question, let alone discharge them. The refusals to reinstate strikers for conduct of comparable or lesser seriousness are discriminatory and therefore violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. We are persuaded, however, that some of the strikers engaged in conduct that was more serious in its totality than the nonstriker conduct at issue. Those refusals to reinstate are not unlawful because they do not represent disparate treatment of comparable cases.

Before detailing the evidence concerning nonstriker misconduct, we should preliminarily note testimony by the Respondent's president, Zemba, and its comptroller, Harrison, regarding the Respondent's method for compiling and reviewing information on which to base decisions whether to deny reinstatement on the basis of strike misconduct. Logs were kept by the Respondent's dispatchers and by security guards employed by [16] Member Babson agrees with the plurality opinion in Clear Pine with respect to its rejection of such a balancing test. Id. at 1047 and fns. 24 and 25. Nevertheless, he would consider immediate provocation in judging whether a particular action amounts to misconduct that would justify denying reinstatement.

Rogers Police Patrol who were working under contract for the Respondent. Harrison reviewed these logs and transferred what she regarded as relevant information into a card index with each striker separately listed. She orally conveyed information from the logs to Zemba (who directly reviewed only selected passages). Based on that information and on direct observation of some strike events, Zemba, Harrison, and the Respondent's counsel made the decisions regarding whom to reinstate.

The logs were not in fact limited to descriptions of striker misconduct. The guards and dispatchers had also recorded some observations of nonstriker misconduct, but Zemba's response to a question whether he ever reviewed the logs' reports of misconduct by striker replacements was "not particularly"; and although Harrison had reviewed the logs in their entirety, she did not indicate that the accounts of nonstriker misconduct were included in her report to Zemba about picket line events relevant to reinstatement decisions.

According to the security police log, on October 24, 1980, nonstriking employee David Smart responded to a female picketer's hitting the side of his car with a sign by stopping his car, getting out, grabbing her by the neck and hair, punching her down to the ground, and then hitting her head against the pavement. (This incident was confirmed at trial by the testimony of the victim, Linda McQueen, who testified that she had swatted the car with her picket sign because it would have hit the picketers had they not stepped quickly back.) According to the dispatch log for September 27, 1980, nonstriking employee George Reese was reported to have responded to the throwing of eggs at his car by making a U-turn, returning to the bus lot driveway, and threatening the picketers with a knife.[17] Finally, an incident on October 5, 1980, concerning nonstriking employee James Lombardi was not only mentioned in the logs but also specifically came to the Respondent's attention because, as the dispatcher, Tom Ingersoll, recorded, the police came to arrest Lombardi for "three counts of assault with a deadly weapon (his van)" and Ingersoll left to go down to jail and bail Lombardi out.[18] The evidence at the hearing shows that Lombardi exited from the bus lot, swerved his van toward the picketers, drove down the street, turned around, came back at a very fast speed, and veered toward the picketers again, barely missing them as he went past.

Zemba was questioned about whether these or any other nonstriker had been disciplined for such misconduct, and although he testified that his supervisors had advised employees not to drive too fast going into or out of the bus lot, he had no definite knowledge of any specific disciplinary measures. Both he and Harrison testified that Smart had been discharged at some time after the beating incident, but they produced no evidence, either testimonial or documentary, that the discharge had anything to do with that incident. Harrison testified that she had been upset by Smart's conduct in that incident and that Transit Coordinator Schultz might have "spoken to" Smart. Harrison and Zemba both testified that Lombardi had been given a disciplinary warning. Zemba, however, conceded that when such warnings were memorialized they were placed in the Respondent's personnel files. Although the Respondent's counsel indicated he would produce evidence of such warnings if it existed, no such evidence was ever proffered. No witness tesified to any investigation by the Respondent of the report concerning Reese's alleged brandishing of the knife.[19]

As noted above, we do not agree with the Union that this evidence of disparate treatment is grounds for finding that all the refusals to reinstate strikers were unlawful. Certainly the Smart and Lombardi incidents were serious, because they represented, in the former case, a direct physical assault on another person and, in the latter, conduct that came perilously and deliberately close to vehicular assault on several people.[20] But it is also the case that some of the strikers not only engaged in assaultive conduct but also engaged in other kinds of misconduct as well, in some cases repeatedly.

Thus, strikers Wallace Leonard, Alan Shelton, Phil Burkhart, Patricia Fowler, Steve Ondrechon, and Agnes Pangilinan either swung at other people with sticks or thrust the sticks at others' faces, and in addition engaged in other acts of misconduct detailed by the judge. (In Pangilinan's case, the stick was jabbed at the driver of a bus while it was in motion; in Ondrechon's case the stick had been sharpened at the end.) Strikers Don Lilly, John Kipple, Valerie Mendoza, and Linda Peckron threw liquids or lighted cigarettes through bus or car windows into the faces of nonstrikers who were driving vehicles at the time and, in addition, engaged in other acts of misconduct.[21] Bob Baker participated in much of Lilly's misconduct, including a dangerous incident in which the two drove their motorcycles on either side of a bus whose driver was taking a driving test in order to harass the driver while he was driving down the highway.

[17] No testimony about this reported incident was given at the hearing below. Reese appeared as a witness but was asked only about an incident in which he stopped his car and responded to a picketer's threatening remark by showing the picketer a tire iron he was carrying in the front seat of his car. There is, therefore, no credible evidence that Reese actually brandished the knife; but the report was in logs compiled and reviewed by the Respondent's agents and, as noted below, there is no evidence that Reese's supervisors even questioned him about the incident.

[18] The record indicates that the Respondent's transit coordinator, David Schultz, put up the $300 for Lombardi's bail, and that this was treated as a loan that Lombardi was expected ultimately to repay to the Respondent.

[19] In considering the disparate treatment issue, we are not relying on testimony that another nonstriking employee, Orville Swadner, sprayed ammonia into the face of at least one picketer. Charges were brought against Swadner for that incident, and his uncontradicted testimony is that he was acquitted on grounds of self-defense.

[20] We recognize that both Smart's and Lombardi's actions were provoked by striker misconduct, but the reactions so exceeded the provocations that these incidents cannot be discounted as self-defense or otherwise justifiable responses. Certainly given the standards the Respondent was applying to the strikers, it is apparent that had these men been strikers the Respondent would have deemed the incidents to be grounds for denying reinstatement.

Striker Barbara McPheron was a prime actor in an incident that the judge aptly described as "one of the most serious and dangerous acts of misconduct in the entire strike"—throwing eggs through a car window at the head of the Respondent's dispatcher while he was driving along a road with his family at a speed of 25–30 miles an hour. A collision with the car ahead of him was barely avoided. Striker Connie Murphy was found by the judge to have engaged in "extensive and significant misconduct," which included egg throwing at moving vehicles so as to impair the drivers' vision, blocking a bus with her van and then, when required by police to move her van, backing it away in a manner so as to come close to running down Zemba and (together with striker Michael Kirkpatrick) engaging in a car chase after a car carrying Zemba, Harrison, and another person and following up that chase the next day with a threat: "We didn't get you that time; we'll get you next time."

Striker Brenda Meyers threw a rock at the head of a nonstriker in addition to damaging vehicles and making threats of violence. Striker Norman Amador, during a fray with two nonstrikers, attempted to choke a female nonstriker while she was trying to radio from her bus for help. The judge found that Amador was one of "the most active strikers . . . committing acts of misconduct," which also included throwing eggs at vehicles, rocking vehicles, and making threats of violence. Striker Michael Kirkpatrick, in addition to participating in the car chase with Murphy, noted above, used a slingshot to launch marbles at the head of the Respondent's transit coordinator, Schultz, and also threw rocks on more than one occasion. Finally the assaultive conduct of striker Roy Stoker, whom the judge correctly described as "guilty of perhaps more major violent incidents than any other striker," amply warrants a finding that he was not entitled to reinstatement. In sum, the totality of the misconduct engaged in by each of the foregoing 17 strikers was such that their cases are not comparable to those of the nonstrikers discussed above whom the Respondent failed to discipline.

In the case of the other strikers, however, even though we would find that many could properly have been denied reinstatement had the Respondent been acting evenhandedly with respect to all employees on both sides of the strike, we cannot conclude that the Respondent can lawfully deny them reinstatement in the face of its failure to discipline Smart or Lombardi or to make thorough inquiries into apparent misconduct by other nonstrikers.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All coach operators, maintenance employees, and student drivers constitute an appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since 1976 the Union has been and continues to be the representative for purposes of collective bargaining of the employees in the above-described unit.

5. By unilaterally changing employees' health and accident insurance plan, without notification to or affording an opportunity to bargain with the Union, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(5) and (1) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. By telling an employee that the Respondent would not negotiate with the Union unless certain union leaders were replaced and picketers stopped harassing the Respondent's employees, by advising an employee that anyone picketing at the time an act of misconduct occurred would not be returned to work after the strike was terminated, and by telling employees that the Union was "finished" and that returning strikers would be offered only part-time jobs, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

[21] Lilly threw a hot liquid on the driver; his other numerous acts of misconduct included blocking vehicles, threats of violence, rocking Zemba's car, spitting on a nonstriker, damaging a bus, and participating with striker Baker in the highway incident described below. Peckron threw a hot liquid on a driver and also slammed a car door on a nonstriker's leg, threw eggs and a rock at vehicles, and blocked vehicles. Mendoza threw lighted cigarettes through windows at drivers while the vehicles were in motion and, in addition, made physical threats and vandalized parked cars.

7. Strikers Dana Banning, Darryl Conyer, Thomas Doty, Suhley Ozgundez, Abraham Planje, and Cheryl Reid did not resign their employment from the Respondent and the Respondent was not entitled to refuse to offer them reinstatement on that ground following the termination of the strike.

8. Strikers Leslie Carr, Bert Dredden, Gerald Marks, and Jean Umphreys resigned their employment with the Respondent and are thus not entitled to an offer of reinstatement.

11. By failing timely to reinstate the strikers listed in Appendix A of the judge's decision, the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

12. The Respondent has not otherwise violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act and has not committed other independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act, including the posting of an appropriate notice to employees. Inasmuch as the Respondent unlawfully refused to reinstate strikers following their unconditional offer to return to work following the strike,[22] we shall order the Respondent to offer these employees immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges. The Respondent shall further be ordered to make these employees (and the employees listed in App. A of the judge's decision) whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them by payment to them of the amount they would have earned from April 4, 1981,[23] until the date of the Respondent's offer of reinstatement, less net interim earnings, in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), to which shall be added interest, to be computed in the manner described in New Horizons for the Retarded.[24] We shall further order the Respondent to remove from its files any reference to its unlawful refusal to reinstate these employees. Additionally, we shall order the Respondent to make whole all its employees for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the unilateral change in health benefits plans.

[22] Some of the strikers were employed by the Respondent primarily or exclusively as schoolbus drivers. The record shows the State of California revised its licensing requirements for driving schoolbuses about June 1980, shortly before the onset of the strike. The evidence further indicates that some striking drivers were not in compliance with the new state requirements and/or lacked renewal certificates even under the old regulations, and that the Respondent notified the Union of these needs. We shall leave to the compliance stage of this proceeding the determination of which, if any, striking drivers were so affected, and the periods of time that the drivers were unavailable to work because of failure to meet these requirements. See Standard Materials, 237 NLRB 1136, 1146 fn. 23 (1978).

[23] The judge recommended that backpay be computed as of April 4, 1981, the day following the delivery by messenger of the letter containing the strikers' unconditional offer to return to work. He relied on several separate grounds for using this date and thus not extending to the Respondent the 5-day grace period normally accorded employers for the reinstatement of unfair labor practice strikers. See Drug Package Co., 228 NLRB 108, 113–114 (1977). We have reversed the judge in his classification of the strike as an unfair labor practice strike, and we have further reversed his finding that the Respondent attached unlawful conditions to its response to the strikers' unconditional offer to return. Nonetheless, we agree that April 4 is the proper date for commencement of the backpay period for the strikers covered by our Order, who were not shown to have been permanently replaced. Even allowing for the fact that an employer does not generally incur backpay liability for not immediately firing a temporary replacement in order to reinstate an economic striker who has offered to return, there is no reason to give the benefit of any "grace period" to an employer which, like the Respondent, (1) made no positive response at all until April 21, more than 2 weeks after the strikers' offer to return, and (2) who, in the case of strikers discussed in secs. C,2, and C,3, of our decision, unlawfully denied reinstatement. See Carpenter Sprinkler Corp., 238 NLRB 974, 976 (1978), enf. denied in part on other grounds 605 F.2d 60, 68 (2d Cir. 1979) (no grace period appropriate for employer who "unduly delays" in accepting or who "rejects" an unfair labor practice striker's unconditional offer to return).

Finally, we note that the judge recommended a broad cease-and-desist provision ordering the Respondent to cease from violating the Act "in any other manner." Inasmuch as we have reversed certain of the judge's findings that the Respondent violated the Act in various respects, we further find that the broad order is not warranted in the circumstances of this case. Accordingly, we shall issue our usual cease-and-desist order requiring the Respondent to refrain from violating the Act in "any like or related" manner.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Aztec Bus Lines, Inc., San Diego, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Unilaterally changing employees' health and accident insurance plan, without notification to or affording an opportunity to bargain with the Union.

(b) Telling employees that the Respondent would not negotiate with the Union unless certain union leaders were replaced and picketers stopped harassing the Respondent's employees, advising employees that anyone picketing at the time an act of misconduct occurred would not be returned to work after the strike was terminated, and telling employees that the Union was "finished" and that returning strikers would be offered only part-time jobs.

(c) Refusing to offer reinstatement to strikers Dana Banning, Darryl Conyer, Thomas Doty, Suhley Ozgundez, Abraham Planje, and Cheryl Reid on grounds that they resigned their employment from the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MICHAEL D. STEVENSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me at San Diego, California, on 43 trial days between October 5, 1981, and February 22, 1982,[1] pursuant to a fourth order consolidating cases, fourth consolidated amended complaint, and notice of hearing issued by the Regional Director for the National Labor Relations Board for Region 21, on September 16, 1981, and that is based on charges filed by San Diego AFL-CIO Bus Drivers Local Division 1309 of the Amalgamated Transit Union (the Union) on September 2 (Case 21-CA-19497); September 11 (Case 21-CA-19542); April 24, 1981 (amended charge Case 21-CA-20162); April 16, 1981 (Case 21-CA-20182); June 23, 1981 (amended charge 21-CA-20214); June 30, 1981 (Case 21-CA-20405); and August 10, 1981 (Case 21-CA-20536). The complaint alleges that Aztec Bus Lines, Inc. (Respondent) has engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

Issues[2]

Did Respondent violate the Act by (a) unilaterally changing its health and accident insurance plan covering unit employees; (b) negotiating with the Union both prior to and after commencement of the strike on a new collective-bargaining agreement in bad faith; (c) reaching agreement with the Union on a new collective-bargaining agreement, but thereafter failing and refusing to execute the agreement; (d) refusing without good reason to reinstate unconditionally strikers who had made an unconditional offer to return to work, to their former, or substantially equivalent, positions of employment; and/or (e) committing the above and other actions, the result of which was to interfere with, restrain, and coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel, the Charging Party, and Respondent.[3]

On the entire record of the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT'S BUSINESS

Respondent admits that it is a California corporation that operates a transit, school, and charter bus and transportation business with its main facility located in San Diego, California. It further admits that during the past year, in the course and conduct of its business that its gross revenues exceeded $500,000, and that annually it purchases and receives goods and products valued in excess of $50,000 from suppliers located within the State of California, each of which, in turn, purchase those same goods and products directly from suppliers located outside the State of California. Accordingly it admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[1] All dates refer to 1980 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] The General Counsel's brief was received by the Division of Judges on June 3, 1982, 2 days late. From markings on the envelope, it was clear that the United States Post Office had misdelivered the brief to another agency. I find that the brief was timely and will give it due consideration.

[3] Two additional issues raised at hearing concern Respondent's motion for a continuance and motion of Respondent's employee, Gerald W. (Bill) Hokstad, a nonstriker, to intervene in the proceedings, on behalf of himself and other nonstrikers. As to the former issue, I denied the motion after extensive argument. As to the latter, I first denied, then later granted the motion of Hokstad to intervene. The General Counsel took a special appeal and the Board reversed me. Hokstad then filed a motion asking for reconsideration. The Board again denied the motion on October 27, 1981, on the grounds that Hokstad lacked standing to intervene and that his petition lacked merit. (ALJ Exhs. 1-5.) I will not further discuss these issues in this case as they present no matters for me to decide.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits, and I find, that San Diego AFL-CIO Bus Drivers Local Division 1309 of the Amalgamated Transit Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES[4]

A. Background

In September 1979, Augustus C. Zemba purchased the stock of Respondent corporation on an installment sales contract basis. Currently the president of Respondent, Zemba, is a central figure in this case. To better understand the complex issues raised, I begin with some brief background on both Zemba and Respondent before September 1979.

At the time of hearing, Zemba was 46 years of age. His prior employment was in the field of transportation and in various business positions with different California school districts. In his prior jobs, Zemba had limited experience with unions involving negotiating contracts, but not with processing grievances to arbitration.

Before Zemba took over, Respondent was owned by Leonard Zlotoff, who even after the sale continued as a director of Respondent and to whom Zemba was making regular payments pursuant to the contract of sale. Zlotoff still owns the real property on which Respondent's bus yard is located and leases the premises to Zemba. Another party owns Respondent's accounting office that is located near the bus yard. This too is leased to Respondent. Zlotoff and members of his family also retain interests in some or all Respondent's rolling stock.

Aztec Bus Lines, Inc. has existed as a business entity at least since 1972 and possibly before that. In late 1976, the Union won an election to represent Respondent's busdrivers and mechanics and was later certified as the employees' collective-bargaining representative. In July 1978, the Union and Respondent, by its then-owner, Zlotoff, negotiated and executed a collective-bargaining agreement, which was effective from May 24, 1978, to June 30. (G.C. Exh. 2.)

Within a day or two after Zemba assumed control of Respondent, he met with Donald Randall, then president of the Local Union and lead negotiator for the prior collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union. Zemba assured Randall that he was aware of the existing collective-bargaining agreement and would honor it. Zemba did, however, request some time to become familiar with Respondent before starting detailed discussions with the Union.

Early on, however, controversy erupted between Zemba and union officials. Some of this controversy concerned the processing of several grievances that had been filed before Zemba became president of Respondent. Zemba was aware of the grievances before he purchased Respondent. These grievances related to discipline for accidents caused by alleged driver negligence and other matters relating to working conditions. Other grievances were filed after Zemba took over. In general, Zemba took a hard line on the entire grievance procedure. For example, Zemba testified that on the very first day he took over, he decided that Chief Shop Steward Jan Corona would no longer have free access to company personnel files as she had had under the prior ownership. Rather, Zemba ordered that she had to request any employee files in writing, then the subject employee had to give his/her consent, then Corona had to review the file in the presence of office personnel.[5]

Besides instituting new procedures for the gathering of information relating to the filing of new grievances, Zemba also refused to accept the decisions on old grievances decided adversely to Respondent. For example, on October 11, 1979, the Union obtained from a U.S. district judge, an order for confirmation of an arbitrator's award reinstating employee Phillip Mulligan, an alleged discriminatee in this case.[6] Zemba also refused to obey the order of the district judge and on November 1, 1979, the Union demanded in writing that Mulligan be reinstated pending appeal to the court of appeals. (C.P. Exh. 2.) On November 8, 1979, Zemba wrote back denying the Union's request and stating in part that "my decision is that I will not sit by and wait until Mr. Mulligan either injures or kills someone." (C.P. Exh. 3.) As a result of Zemba's refusal to obey the district judge's order, the Union, on January 23, obtained an order finding Respondent guilty of civil contempt, fining it $500 a day starting from January 23, and further awarding it attorney fees and costs. (C.P. Exh. 4.)

The union was also forced on December 7, 1979, to file a petition to compel arbitration in U.S. district court. (C.P. Exh. 5.) This matter involved eight separate grievances that Zemba refused to process.[7] On April 1, the court entered an order in favor of the Union and against Respondent directing that the matters be arbitrated. (C.P. Exh. 6.)

On December 26, 1979, the Union filed still another action in U.S. district court: complaint for specific performance of an agreement to arbitrate. (C.P. Exh. 7.) This dispute arose over a grievance filed by the Union as a result of Zemba's breach of the collective-bargaining agreement for failing to arbitrate the eight grievances referred to above. Once again, Respondent lost. On June 10, the U.S. district judge entered an order that Respondent arbitrate the particular matter giving rise to the complaint and a derivative issue, i.e., the Union's claim for attorney's fees. The Union was awarded all costs excluding attorney's fees. (C.P. Exh. 8.) On June 8, 1981, an arbitrator issued his "Award" finding that Respondent acted in bad faith by refusing to submit the eight grievances to arbitration; the arbitrator also directed that the Union be made whole for the expenses caused by Respondent's refusal to arbitrate including attorney fees. (C.P. Exh. 9.)

[4] In reciting the facts and deciding the issues of this case, I will be mindful of the Board's criticism of an administrative law judge for drafting an inordinately long decision in a case similar to the present case. Harowe Servo Controls, 250 NLRB 958, 959 (1980). There, the hearing lasted 46 hearing days and the printed decision extended from p. 967 to p. 1126.

[5] In late January, the Union and Respondent entered into an informal settlement agreement with respect to the alleged burdens on the shop steward's right to discover and obtain information from company files to process grievances. (C.P. Exh. 11.)

[6] The filing of the petition occurred prior to Zemba's purchase of Respondent.

[7] In response to my question, Zemba attempted to explain his position on the eight grievances. In effect, he claimed that the grievants had failed to follow proper procedures in filing the grievances. (R. Tr. 6654-6657.)

I will return to the question of grievances and arbitration in resolving the question of Respondent's alleged bad faith in negotiating a new contract. Specifically, the question of "past practice" in employee discipline and the extent to which Zemba was bound by his predecessor's disciplinary decisions became an important point during negotiations. So too was the question of advisory versus binding arbitration. In order to continue the general background of the case, I turn briefly to other major events.

The parties dispute whether a current collective-bargaining agreement exists between them. All agree, however, that a prior agreement expired on June 30. It is further undisputed that the first formal bargaining sessions between the parties occurred on June 12. There followed a series of bargaining sessions in which the parties were unable to reach agreement. The General Counsel contends that Respondent did not neogitate in good faith during these sessions. On August 23, a strike began and lasted until April 3, 1981, when pickets were removed and the Union allegedly made an unconditional offer to return to work. During the strike, Respondent claims that it refused to take back only those strikers who either were guilty of serious misconduct or had resigned there positions and abanadoned the strike. The Union claims that several nonstrikers were guilty of serious misconduct that the Respondent either never punished or, in some cases, even condoned. All these matters and others remain to be decided below. I turn now to the first substantive dispute between the parties.

B. The Alleged Unilateral Change in the Employees' Health and Accident Insurance Plan[8]

1. The facts

Prior to Zemba's arrival, Respondent's employees were insured for health and accident medical expenses through Employer's Mutual Liability Insurance Company of Wausau, Wisconsin (Wausau).

The Wausau plan had been in effect for about a year beginning in February or March 1979, before coverage was canceled. (R. Tr. 250.) Prior to Wausau, Zlotoff and his general manager, Nickelson, had another carrier. When the change to Wausau occurred, the Union approved, based on the fact that the benefits stayed the same, even though the Union desired greater benefits in the future. (R. Tr. 245–246, 248–249.) A brochure distributed to employees is contained in the record. (G.C. Exh. 43.) According to Zemba, in October or November 1979, he was notified by Wausau representatives that Wausau was no longer interested in insuring Respondent's employees. Zemba testified that Wausau's attitude was based on late premium payments, a high rate of disputed claims, and a too small enrollment. The group insurance policy covered not only Aztec employees, but employees of two other companies. Zemba allegedly had several meetings with a Wausau representative, but he nevertheless received written notice of cancellation in December 1979, effective in February or March. After unsuccessfully attempting to obtain coverage from other insurance companies—the names of which Zemba could not recall—he finally obtained a group plan from Pacific Guardian. Another company named Dataramics and an individual named Ava Nawrey acted as cobrokers putting Respondent together with Pacific Guardian. Under this plan, employee claimants submit claims to a third company called San Diego Medical Foundation whose sole function is administration of the claims.[9]

According to Zemba, he told Randall, president of the Union, in November or December of the pending cancellation by Wausau. At this meeting and later meetings prior to the effective date of the new insurance coverage, Randall's attitude was allegedly one of studied indifference. According to Zemba, Randall did not care what company handled the insurance as long as there were no "take-aways." Supposedly, this attitude was also reflected by Gordon Hall, another union officer, who told Zemba, simply, "it's your company." Moreover, according to Zemba, Randall at one point looked through the then-current agreement and found support for Zemba's unilateral move in that the agreement covered only level of coverage, but not the carrier.

To ensure that the new plan equaled the old plan, according to Zemba, two things were done. First, the attorney for Dataramics reviewed the then-current agreement with Wausau to ascertain the level of coverage. Then, clause 1.6 was added to the new health benefit plan:

> It is the intent of this Plan to provide coverage equal to or superior to benefits under the immediately previous plan or policy. This plan shall be interpreted and construed with that intent in mind, and shall be deemed to provide at least the level of [8] All parties recognize that credibility resolutions in this case as in most will be critical. I will find for all major witnesses that portions of testimony will be discredited. Nothing is more common than to believe some but not all of what a witness says. Edwards Transportation Co., 187 NLRB 3, 3–4 (1970), enfd. 437 F.2d 502 (5th Cir. 1971). In deciding who is telling the truth in a given instance, I will attempt to state the factors on which I rely. Some witnesses have financial interests beyond that which is apparent. For example, there are some civil lawsuits in progress involving witnesses in this case both as plaintiffs and defendants and concerns matters that are the subject of my inquiry here. Further, I will look to the specificity of testimony as a legitimate factor in deciding credibility. Teamsters Local 959 (Northland Maintenance), 248 NLRB 693 at fn. 2 (1980). Of course, I will look to the demeanor of the witness and a host of other factors not all that will apply in every instance. Where applicable, these factors influencing credibility will be pointed out.

[9] To further complicate the arrangement, I note that Zemba and Harrison are trustees of a trust administered through Security Pacific Bank, acting as administrator. Claims of $5000 or less are paid out of the trust assets, but over $5000 are paid by Pacific Guardian. Respondent makes payments into the trust on a regular basis. The plan also covers Palisade Wholesale and Viewland Construction, two companies formerly insured by Wausau with Respondent. Zlotoff, former owner of Respondent, is an officer of Palisade and Robert Zlotoff, his brother, is an officer of Viewland.

> benefits provided in the prior plan or policy. [R. Exh. 47.]

Not surprisingly, union representatives give a substantially different version of events on this topic. Randall, for example, testified that the first knowledge of Zemba's change was at a meeting in March, when Zemba stated that he was looking for a new insurance company. Dataramics was mentioned. Randall told Zemba to let him know so he could get the change approved as required by the contract.[10]

The next notice to the Union that a change in Respondent's health benefit plan was made occurred early in negotiations when someone on Respondent's side stated there was a new health plan.[11] To this, Randall replied that we may have another one before negotiations are over with, because the Union had proposed different plans.

Randall's account is contradicted to a certain extent by the testimony of Jan Corona, the chief shop steward and alleged discriminatee. She testified that in October or November 1979, she attended an informal meeting with Zemba in the union offices. Randall and possibly Hall were there for the Union. At this time, she recalls Zemba saying that he was looking into other insurance companies and he would get back to them on that point. Corona continued that although this subject did not come up again in her presence until negotiations began, she did obtain additional information in the first or second week of May. At this time she heard two drivers talking about a new company health plan and she interrupted them, asking for additional information. When told there was in fact a new plan, the witness went to the office where she talked with a clerical employee named Cheryl, who handled employee insurance matters. Cheryl confirmed the change in plan and gave the witness some forms to fill out and a medical identification card. Corona also received at this time a summary of benefits under the plan. (G.C. Exh. 59.) This notice reads in part:

> Following is a summary of the benefits as they were under the prior Insurance Co. and as they will continue to be.

Corona never saw this notice posted at Respondent and, according to a statement of Respondent's attorney, neither Zemba nor Harrison was familiar with it. (R. Tr. 616.) The document was undated but was apparently prepared subsequent to March. Corona went on to testify that the notice was never distributed to employees through their message drops.

During negotiations, the subject of health insurance came up again. Zemba, Harrison, and Schultz were examining union proposals when they saw a page on health and welfare. Zemba stated that it was not necessary to negotiate this part of the package as he had new insurance that was adequate.[12] Randall then asked Corona whether the Respondent had a new insurance plan and Corona confirmed it and showed Randall her card. Zemba stated that the change had been made in March. Later in a private conversation between Randall and Corona, the former scolded Corona for not notifying him about the new insurance plan. She stated that she had only found out about it in early May.[13]

Randall was asked about two meetings with members on July 3 and on August 18 wherein Respondent's proposals were discussed. According to Randall, the majority of members previously had indicated a desire for a Kaiser medical plan (HMO). However, the Union's initial proposal submitted on June 23, contains no reference to a Kaiser medical plan. (R. Tr. 7253-7254.) Moreover, in addressing members on July 30, Randall testified that he told members there were no improvements in the health and welfare. (R. Tr. 239-240.) Then he stated that the Union did not know about the new plan at that time. (R. Tr. 240.) As of the Union's ratification meeting on August 18, according to Randall, the Union thought that the Wausau plan was still in effect. (R. Tr. 240.) This, despite the fact that during an early negotiating session, someone in management stated to Randall that Respondent had a new carrier. (R. Tr. 24.) Although Randall never asked who the new carrier was (R. Tr. 242) nor ever requested a copy of the new plan (R. Tr. 251), he believed Corona had asked someone who the new carrier was. (R. Tr. 242.) Someone at the ratification meeting told employees that there had been a change in carriers, but Randall does not think it was he. (R. Tr. 242.) Randall also testified that he believes at the August 18 ratification meeting, Corona told the membership there had been a change in membership. (R. Exh. 242-243.)

2. Analysis and conclusions

There is obvious conflict in the testimony between the witnesses referred to above, and even within the testimony of a single witness, Randall. Before resolving these conflicts to the extent possible, I begin with relevant principles of law.

Unilateral changes of "wages, hours and terms and conditions of employment" by an employer obligated to bargain with the representative of its employees in an appropriate unit violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[14] As of

---

[10] On the final page of G.C. Exh. 2, the prior contract, there is a letter of agreement regarding "Health and Life Insurance." This agreement states in part "that whatever Health and Insurance plan is agreed to, that the Company will pay premium for three (3) months for an employee who is incapable of working due to illness." (Emphasis added.) This choice of language indicates to me that the parties intended for the Union to have an opportunity to bargain on the carrier as well as the benefit levels.

[11] Randall could not recall the name of the alleged speaker, nor the exact date, and he did not record the comment on his personal notes. However, the first formal bargaining session occurred on June 12.

[12] This statement of Zemba's is inconsistent with his claim that the Union had prior knowledge of the change in health and accident insurance.

[13] Although Corona never testified to the exact date that these conversations occurred, it was between June 12, the first negotiating session, and August 18, the ratification meeting of union members. It appears to have been toward the beginning of this period, probably on June 23, when a first meeting was held to discuss the union proposal tendered to Respondent on June 12.

[14] Master Slack Corp., 230 NLRB 1054 (1977), enfd. 618 F.2d 6 (6th Cir. 1980); Amsterdam Printing & Litho Corp., 223 NLRB 370 (1976); and NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962).

March, Respondent was an employer obligated to bargain with the Union. This is so because Respondent was a successor employer. Although Respondent had no obligation to assume the predecessor's labor agreement, Zemba voluntarily agreed to do so.[15]

The next question is whether the implementation of a health insurance plan is a mandatory subject of bargaining. I find that it is.[16] In this respect, I find that the carrier of a health benefit plan is as much of a "component" of a health and welfare plan as are the levels of coverage.[17] It is no more than common sense that a union's interest in a health and welfare plan would extend to the carrier's identity. With this knowledge, the Union is able to investigate the carrier's financial condition and reputation for prompt and fair payment of claims.

The General Counsel contends (Br. 8) that "Where an employer unilaterally, without notice to, or bargaining with the union, changes insurance plans, it violates [the Act] even if the benefits under the new plan are identical to those in the old plan." For this proposition of law, the General Counsel cites "Clear Pine Moldings, Inc., 238 NLRB 69 (1978)." First, the case does not stand for that principle at all. In Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, 729–730 (7th Cir. 1980), enforcing the Board's decision cited by the General Counsel, the court specifically stated there was no showing that the new plan unilaterally instituted by the employer was identical to the old plan. Had there been such a showing, the court stated, it may well have followed a precedent found in Connecticut Light & Power Co. v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 1079 (2d Cir. 1973), where the court excused an employer who changed plans, where the evidence showed that the plans were identical.[18]

In this case, I find no convincing evidence that the two plans were identical in coverage. I am aware that clause 1.6 of the new health plan (quoted above) states (R. Exh. 47) the intent of the new plan is to equal the coverage of the old plan. However, Harrison testified that due to Wausau's refusal to cooperate, she and Zemba were never able to get a copy of the detailed medical plan. (R. Tr. 2419.) Thus, she relied on pamphlets generally describing the level of benefits under Wausau, "but not in total detail for the legal language of the certificate." (R. Tr. 2419.) Because a copy of the Wausau plan was never offered nor received into evidence, a meaningful comparison cannot be made. Moreover, I find Harrison's testimony that the plans were identical is self-serving, conclusionary, and without apparent legal basis. Harrison's further testimony that an attorney for the cobroker, Dataramics, who never testified, nor was even fully identified, gave Respondent assurances that the plans were identical is entitled to little or no weight. Even the apparent impression of Randall and other union officers that the plans were identical is not convincing.

In addition to the paucity of evidence to show the identical nature of the plans, there is other evidence to show that the plans were not identical in significant details:[19]

(1) Wausau administered its own claims, but under the Pacific Guardian-San Diego Medical Foundation a third party administered claims.[20]

(2) The new plan was, in part, a self-insurance plan, which would raise issues of viability under the best of circumstances, but particularly with new corporate management.

(3) Under the old policy, an employee's coverage terminates on the last day of the month in which employment terminates; under the new plan, coverage ceased on the date the employee's active employment terminated.[21]

In sum, I find that the General Counsel has proven a prima facie case of a violation of Section 8(a)(5). That is, even where the new plan is identical to the old plan, which is not true in the present case, an employer is not free to change carriers, without notice to the certified bargaining representative and an opportunity to bargain on the issue.[22] Now I must decide whether the Union here received timely notices and, if so, whether the Union demanded bargaining on the issue, unless the demand would have been futile.

All agree that the new plan began in March. I cannot credit Zemba's testimony that prior to this effective date of the new plan, he was repeatedly assured by Randall and other union officers that they had no interest other than to see there were no "take-aways." (Even if Zemba's testimony were credited, I find that the changes in the two plans as described above were "take-aways." Accordingly, even under Respondent's theory of credibility, I would construe Randall's statements as a demand for bargaining because the new plan was changing the status quo on a substantive basis.)

[17] Cf. Golconda Corp. v. NLRB., 474 F.2d 49 (6th Cir. 1973).

[18] In Connecticut Light & Power Co. v. NLRB, id., the court refused to enforce the Board's Order, 196 NLRB 967 (1972). Of course, I am bound by the Board's decision and it is on the basis of this authority that I find, even where the level of benefits stay the same, the Employer is required to bargain with the Union as to the identity of the carrier. Furthermore, even the Second Circuit, in Connecticut Light & Power Co., leaves open the possibility that at least in some cases, an employer must bargain over the identity of the carrier:

> Our holding as stated above, however, should not be construed to mean that in all cases may the selection of a carrier be divorced from the elements of employee health insurance that traditionally have been held to be mandatory subjects of bargaining. [476 F.2d at 1083.]

Accordingly, for the reasons I state in the text, I find that the facts in the instant case may be distinguished from the court's decision in Connecticut Light & Power Co. v. NLRB.

[19] At hearing, the General Counsel disavowed any reliance on a theory involving a change of benefit levels or of any detrimental impact on employees as a result of coverage being reduced. He stated, "it's our understanding . . . the levels of benefits, did in fact remain the same." (R. Tr. 2423–2424.) In his Br. 9, the General Counsel retreats from the above statement and contends there were differences in the two plans.

[20] Indeed, Harrison admitted that at first there had been some employee complaints relative to slow payments by the San Diego Medical Foundations. (R. Tr. 2728.)

[21] Thus on September 5, Zemba sent a memo to all striking employees that read as follows:

> Date: September 5, 1980
> Memo to: All Striking Employees
> From: A. C. Zemba [s] A. C. Zemba 9/5/80
> Subject: Insurance Coverage
> This notice is to inform you that our insurance plan states, that eligibility of an employee will terminate on the day the employee's active employment terminates and to be eligible must be regularly scheduled to work at least twenty five (25) hours per week for Drivers and thirty two (32) hours per week for Maintenance employees.
> As you have not been on the job since August 22, 1980, we have notified our Insurance Company to that effect.
>
> cc: Joe Neeper, Atty.
> Don Randall, Union
> [G.C. Exh. 45.]

[22] See also Wisconsin Southern Gas Co., 173 NLRB 480 (1968); Wabana, Inc., 146 NLRB 1162 (1964).

Another factor that makes it unlikely that Zemba was receiving the indifferent response that he described was the series of court battles raging between Respondent and the Union at approximately the same time. Zemba's stubborn refusal to follow the rules of grievance and arbitration would have caused the Union to be guarded in its relationship with him. In this respect, I agree with Respondent (Br. 654–655) where it adverts to a prior change in carrier before Zemba assumed control of the Company. In that case, the Union apparently did not object because the benefits stayed the same.[23]

In this case it was not proven that benefits stayed the same; further, other differences were apparent. Moreover, the Union was not enjoying the same cordial relationship with Zemba as it enjoyed with Zlotoff. Accordingly, I must reject Respondent's contention that these prior events enhanced Zemba's credibility on this issue.

To reject Zemba's testimony is not to find Randall's testimony a model of clarity or even believable in and of itself. However, looking to the testimony of Randall and Corona, I find that Zemba did tell union officials in October or November that he was looking into other insurance companies and that he would get back to the Union on that point. There is no credible evidence of any further notice to the Union prior to March when the fait accompli occurred.[24] Subsequently Corona found out in May that the change had already occurred. I find that notice to her, even inadvertent notice, was notice to the Union since she was chief shop steward. However, the violation of the Act occurred on or about March 1, and the Union's reaction subsequently, although not easily ascertainable because of the contradictory nature of Randall's testimony, is also not relevant.

The union negotiators were under a mandate for Kaiser (HMO) once negotiations began in June. However, Zemba had just changed carriers as of March and was assuring union officials that no benefit levels had changed. I do not find any clear and unmistakable waiver under the circumstances, since the Union was faced with several other matters to be negotiated and the health insurance was no longer an immediate concern.[25] In addition, there is evidence to suggest that Kaiser was not even available as of the summer. In sum, I find that as of May, when Corona discovered the change in insurance plans, it would have been futile for the Union to demand bargaining on the matter, and may well have damaged their bargaining position on the other issues waiting resolution.[26]

Respondent also contends (Br. 655) that the then current agreement contained no provision limiting its right to make the unilateral change in issue. This argument lacks merit: the issue is always whether the current agreement contains language clearly and unmistakably waiving the Union's right to bargain on a proposed unilateral change.[27] If the contract is silent on the matter, as it essentially is here, then it is the Act and Board law that imposes the prohibition.

For all the reasons stated above, I find that by making a unilateral change in its health benefit plan as of March 1, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[28]

C. The Alleged Bad-Faith Bargaining (Prestrike)[29]

1. The facts

Prior to the strike of August 23, the parties to this case participated in approximately 15 bargaining sessions. There was some variance in bargaining representatives on both sides, but generally Respondent was represented by Zemba as lead negotiator, Harrison, Schultz, and Thomas Ingersoll.[30] Toward the end of the negotiating period, a man named Puffer replaced Zemba as lead negotiator. Puffer, a management labor consultant, was never called as a witness.

---

[23] However, even past failure to assert a statutory right does not estop subsequent assertion of that right. Rockwell International Corp., 260 NLRB 1346 fn. 6 (1982).

[24] Zemba and Harrison were both under the mistaken impression that they had every right to change carriers without consultation or bargaining with the Union. Under these circumstances, it is more likely that timely notice was never sent nor ever received by the Union. Moreover, I do not believe that the notice given to Corona (G.C. Exh. 59) was ever posted.

[25] Allied Mills, Inc., 218 NLRB 281 (1975); Universal Security Instrument, 250 NLRB 661 (1980).

[26] See Merrill & Ring, Inc., 262 NLRB 392 (1982); Carpenter Sprinkler Corp., 238 NLRB 974, 983 (1978), enfd. 605 F.2d 60 (2d Cir. 1979). I have read Citizens National Bank of Willmar, 245 NLRB 389 (1979), which at first reading could be described as supporting Respondent's position here. However, the union in that case never attempted to excuse its failure to demand bargaining on the grounds of futility nor was the issue even raised. Accordingly, I distinguish Citizens National Bank of Willmar from the instant case and find it does not apply.

[27] Rockwell International Corp., 260 NLRB 1346 (1982).

[28] In its brief (Br. 10), the General Counsel anticipates an issue never raised at hearing relating to the 10(b) period. I see no bona fide issue on that point. However, to preclude the issue from being raised, I specifically find that the first notice to the Union of the change in health plans occurred in May when Corona inadvertently discovered the change that was effective on March 1. Case 21–CA–19497 was filed on September 2, well within the 10(b) period.

[29] On the second day of hearing, the question arose whether the General Counsel was claiming bad-faith bargaining both before and after the strike begin on August 23. The General Counsel stated:

> The subsequent negotiations are not alleged as being bad faith bargaining [sic] is because we have alleged that there was an agreement reached, and therefore, if the company has an obligation to sign that agreement, that erases the effect of any bad faith bargaining that occurred getting to that agreement. [R. Tr. 19.]

The General Counsel went on to urge that this alternative theory, though not then pleaded in the complaint, was that if an agreement had not been reached in April 1981, then it was due to Respondent's additional bad-faith bargaining. After discussion of the mechanics of setting forth this alternative theory, the General Counsel finally decided to amend the complaint: Original par. 11 of the fourth consolidated amended complaint became 11a and the General Counsel added 11b:

> During the period of time from November 6, through April 9, 1981, Respondent did engage in surface and bad-faith bargaining, including, but not limited to, making proposals calculated to be unacceptable to the Union and failing to make a reasonable effort to compromise differences. [R. Tr. 205–207, 212.]

The motion to amend was granted over Respondent's objection.

[30] The supervisory status of Ingersoll is in issue due to certain statements he is alleged to have made in early 1981, concerning Respondent's strategy during the bargaining sessions. I will address this issue below.

The Union was usually represented by Randall, Gordon Hall, Gene Napier, and Corona.[31] Later in the negotiations, the union team was joined by Charles Yelkey, an International vice president of the Union. He then became lead negotiator. Although a major figure here and in the events leading up to and during the strike, Yelkey was never called as a witness.

I turn now to the events of the individual bargaining sessions.

a. June 12

The first negotiating session was held in the union office. Previously, the Union had held one or more meetings with members to get a sense of what the membership wanted in the new contract. After these meetings, the union proposals were prepared and tendered to Respondent's negotiators at this meeting. (G.C. Exh. 3.) Zemba had nothing for the Union at this time, but did state that he did not want to be responsible for past practices of prior management and previous grievances.

b. June 23

Pursuant to agreement reached at the last meeting, the parties met again on June 23 at the office of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.[32] At this meeting, the parties reviewed the Union's proposals with the union negotiators, explaining their reasons for the changes they wanted. Zemba again reiterated his desire not to be bound by past practices of prior management. Without completing review of the Union's proposals, the parties agreed to meet again on June 25.

c. June 25[33]

Zemba tendered to the Union his proposal for "Management Rights."[34] Later at that meeting, Zemba tendered other proposals relative to grievances, arbitration, leaves of absences, and reaching an agreement.[35] More employer proposals were promised for the next meeting. Some desultory conversation between the parties also occurred, such as Randall's observations that the management rights had very broad subcontracting language and that under this proposal one driver could be paid more than another driver. To this latter comment, Zemba voiced agreement. Once again Zemba raised the subject of "past practice" and asked the Union for a side letter on this subject, to the effect that he would not be bound. Zemba also talked about 13 prior accidents at Respondent and the fact that he desired to be consistent on discipline.

During the session, Zemba accused Randall of bargaining in bad faith. Randall denied the charge and no further details appear of record. This meeting concluded when Randall gave Zemba a copy of a letter to extend the contract on a day-to-day basis. Zemba promised to bring the letter back for the next meeting on Friday. He saw no problem with it. Zemba also requested a meeting on Saturday for one-half day.

d. June 27

Zemba began by stating that he would not sign the day-to-day letter, but would continue to bargain in good faith. When asked by Randall what would happen on June 30 when the contract expired, Zemba stated he would be there to negotiate.

After a union caucus, the parties reached agreement on certain items taken from the Union's and Employer's proposals. Then Randall reached Yelkey by telephone to inform him what Zemba had said relative to the day-to-day letter. After talking to Yelkey, Randall asked Zemba to talk to Yelkey at the latter's request. Zemba agreed and told Yelkey that he would continue on the same criteria that he was presently going. Then Randall asked Zemba to restate his verbal assurances to continue the contract on a day-to-day basis in front of the Federal mediator. Zemba refused on the grounds that the mediator present was not the mediator assigned to the case.

e. June 30

Notwithstanding Respondent's position on the day-to-day letter expressed at the prior meeting, Zemba tendered an agreement to the Union extending the old contract on a day-to-day basis and executed same. (G.C. Exh. 7.) In addition to this agreement, Respondent also tendered a 64-page document entitled "Aztec Bus Lines, Company Proposal to San Diego Bus Drivers Union,

---

[31] Unless otherwise specified, the negotiators for both sides will be as indicated above. At this meeting Corona was not present.

[32] All subsequent meetings were held at this location unless otherwise indicated.

[33] Ingersoll did not attend this meeting.

[34] This proposal reads as follows:

> AZTEC BUS LINES
> MANAGEMENT RIGHTS
> The Company retains and shall continue to have the complete and exclusive right and power to manage its operations and direct its working force, except as expressly limited by specific obligations of the Company set forth in this Agreement. Among such retained rights and powers are included the following: to hire; to promote, demote, transfer, layoff, and recall; to assign and reassign to duties, hours of work and shifts; to compensate employees in excess of minimum hourly wage rates; to maintain good order and efficiency; to discharge, suspend, and discipline employees; to establish rules and regulations not in conflict with the Agreement governing the conduct of employees on Company time or Company property; to determine the type and quality of service in the functions of transportation methods, processes, and means of transportation service, including trips, routes and schedules of service, and of administration and sales; to determine the size and composition of the working force; to locate work within the site; to discontinue all or any part of its operations; to transfer to other locations and there to perform all or any part of its operations; to subcontract any part of its operations; to determine whether to purchase or lease equipment and service; to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of or permit the use by others of all or any part of its facility and equipment.
> All matters not specifically enumerated in this Agreement are reserved to the employer and may not be a subject of meeting and negotiation, grievances or restriction on the right of the company to manage the company and direct it's [sic] employees and operations. [G.C. Exh. 4.]

[35] The proposals were never offered or received into evidence.

Local 1309." (G.C. Exh. 6.)[36] Zemba presented still a third document to the Union at this time, a "Letter of Understanding" to the effect that Respondent would not be bound by past practices. (G.C. Exh. 5.) Zemba stated that he did not wish to be bound by past stupidity, hence, the side letter. Zemba also stated that Respondent's negotiators had not had adequate time to review the union proposals.

Before the meeting ended, Randall reviewed Zemba's proposals and rejected the sections on grievance and arbitration, medical leave, maternity leave, leave of absence for union business, sick leave, and seniority determination. In rejecting these provisions, Randall sometimes stated "no" without elaboration and sometimes made comments. He also questioned several other provisions that were contained in the proposal as well as others that the Union considered important but were omitted.

f. July 2

Zemba began this meeting by stating that he wanted only employees who were loyal to the Company, but since he had purchased the Company in September 1979, he had noted that employees were loyal to the Union and not to the Company. Zemba also stated that Respondent had been losing money and that the union proposal was large, expensive, and late. Zemba concluded his preliminary remarks by stating he was turning over negotiations to Harrison. Zemba added, however, that any agreement she made was tentative only, subject to approval by Zemba. At this point, the parties resumed substantive negotiations concerning affirmative action, arbitration, and other matters, but no agreement was reached.

g. July 3

In Zemba's absence, Harrison led negotiations for Respondent. Respondent made a concession on the assigned successor and heir's clause agreeing to the language of the prior contract. The Company made further concessions. It agreed to language that nothing in an employee's record regarding discipline could be used after 1 year had expired. It also agreed to language from the prior contract regarding shift differential for the mechanics, and there was apparent agreement relative to pay for jury duty. Finally, Harrison stated that Zemba was holding on the grievance procedure, but would consider removing the word "advisory" from the arbitration proposal.

h. July 7

The parties discussed sick leave, vacation pay, the charter board (i.e., those drivers assigned to bus charters), and how to define part-time employees. Zemba stated there was a 4-hour guarantee that had not been included in the Company's proposals. Management rights were again discussed. Zemba concluded by stating although there was movement by the Union on noneconomic issues, the Company wanted movement on economic issues.

i. July 11[37]

Discussion began with past practice and Zemba stated that in order to manage the Company, he could not be bound by this. Accordingly, Zemba wanted a side letter of agreement that he would not be bound. Then Zemba announced that he was retaining the services of Tom Puffer, a management labor consultant. The session concluded with a review of the contract for the benefit of Yelkey and there was a brief discussion of benefits for mechanics. No agreement was reached on any subject.

Harrison returned to the session in the afternoon of July 11. She testified that Yelkey stated in her presence that he had been in Las Vegas and that Randall had no authority to make decisions in his absence. Zemba confirmed this conversation and he further stated that, prior to this time, no one on Respondent's side was aware of Randall's lack of authority. To be more specific, Yelkey told Harrison that nothing could have been accomplished in his absence. I credit the testimony of Harrison and Zemba on this point.[38]

j. July 14[39]

The Union had previously requested a list of people in the various categories in maintenance. This list was tendered by Zemba. Then both sides went through the contract and agreement was reached on certain items. Randall, however, could not recall what these items were.

k. July 21[40]

At this meeting, Yelkey presented Respondent with a handwritten proposal on grievance-and-arbitration procedures as a counterproposal to the Company's proposal. The Employer's representatives objected to the counterproposal claiming it was too wide open. After a company caucus, the Respondent's representatives asked Yelkey what the intent of the language was. Yelkey replied that he wished to make the grievance-and-arbitration procedure less one-sided. Then Yelkey withdrew the proposal.

Both sides went through various other articles of the proposals, but no agreements were reached. Later that day, the Company asked that the Federal mediator be present for the next meeting.

[36] At Br. 13-15, the General Counsel has quoted selectively from G.C. Exh. 6, quoting sec. A, "Management Rights, Article V, Grievance Procedure, and Article VI, Advisory Arbitration." Although these sections are relevant within the scheme of the present issue, I will consider them within the context of the entire document and the entire document within the context of all the evidence.

[37] At this session, Harrison was absent from the morning session only. The union team was joined by Charles Yelkey, International vice president of the Union.

[38] Yelkey was never called as a witness and I find the failure of the Charging Party to call its International vice president on this and other matters or to explain his absence raises and adverse inference. Martin Luther King Sr. Nursing Center, 231 NLRB 15 (1977); Earle Industries, 260 NLRB 1128 (1982); but see Wayne Construction, 259 NLRB 571 (1981). Randall did not testify about the conversation between Yelkey and Harrison, but it is not clear he would have heard it or, if he heard it, he would have recalled it. He had virtually no independent recollection save what was on his notes and this exchange was not contained therein.

[39] Harrison was absent from this session. Yelkey was present for this session and succeeding sessions except where indicated.

[40] Harrison and Napier were absent from this session.

l. July 22[41]

Both sides went through their proposals for the benefit of the mediators. Respondent stressed that past practice was out and that management will manage. Those employees that produce can stay, and those that do not, go. The mediators then met with both sides privately. No agreement was reached on any provision.

m. July 24[42]

First, the parties exchanged some language for certain items and proposals. Then, after the Company held a caucus, it informed the Union that it had sent for Puffer. A short time later, Puffer arrived and stated that he was presenting a settlement offer and not a final offer on behalf of Respondent. (G.C. Exh. 8.) Puffer then stated that he was giving 24-hour notice to cancel the day-to-day letter and that everything was open for negotiation. Randall further stated that Respondent would give certain guarantees on retroactivity back to the expiration date of the contract, if it was accepted by a certain date. Although Puffer asked that the settlement offer be presented to the membership for ratification, Randall did not do this.

n. August 5[43]

At this meeting, the Union presented its counterproposals (G.C. Exh. 9), prepared in response to the July 24 settlement offer. The Union had rejected Respondent's settlement offer and Respondent rejected the Union's counterproposal. Puffer stated that the retroactivity part of the settlement offer for pay was withdrawn, and the Company would attempt to operate under the present contract.

Both sides agree that the mediator then asked if the Union desired a final offer from the Company. Randall testified to Yelkey's alleged response: "There was a lot of questions to be asked first."

According to Respondent's evidence, the two sides were dealing with the mediator in separate rooms. The mediator told Zemba and Harrison that the Union was asking for a final offer. At the mediator's request, both sides reassembled in the same room. Yelkey then stated:

> Gus, I'm not asking for a first final. I'm not asking for a second final, third or fourth final. I am asking for your final, final, final.

As Yelkey, a large man, made this statement, he banged his hand on the table for emphasis. Harrison's account of Yelkey's statement was corroborated by Zemba. I credit Harrison and Zemba here. Again, I note that Yelkey was never called as a witness and Harrison's recollection of the bargaining session seemed to be better than Randall's. It also seems to me unlikely that the mediator would not press Yelkey to ask the questions that needed to be asked if Yelkey had made the statement attributed to him by Randall. Yet Randall's narrative stops exactly at that point. In any event, as Puffer thanked the Union for the time they put in, the meeting ended.[44]

o. August 12

In response to Yelkey's request made at the prior meeting, Puffer presented Respondent's final offer to the Union. (G.C. Exh. 10.) Puffer stated the offer was on the table until Sunday, August 16, at midnight. Yelkey stated that it had to be reviewed and presented to the membership. The following day, company representatives met only with Randall to answer the Union's question about the offer.[45]

p. Union ratification meetings

The last formal bargaining session was on August 12; on August 18, about 90–110 union members met to consider Respondent's final offer. Randall addressed the assembly on behalf of the union leadership. He compared the pending offer to the previous contract and found the former lacking. Specifically, Randall told the members they would not have job security because due to the wording of the management-rights clause and the wording of the grievance-and-arbitration clause, they would be unable to grieve, discipline, or discharge. Randall also told members that under Respondent's pending offer they would have fewer sick and vacation days, no jury duty pay, and no provisions for doubletime on holidays nor for over-the-road charter pay. These were all benefits that employees currently had. Finally, Randall told members that the money or economic package was okay and the Union could live with it. Members of the Union's executive board addressed the members and unanimously recommended that the Company's offer be rejected. The membership did vote to reject and subsequently voted overwhelmingly to strike. The following day Randall called the Federal mediator and informed him of the strike vote and a strike deadline.

At 12:01 a.m. on August 23, the Union went on strike. On August 25, Zemba sent a letter to Randall, which the latter received. It reads as follows:

> Mr. Donald R. Randall, President
> San Diego Bus Driver Union, Local 1309
> AFL–CIO
> Amalgamated Transit Union
> 7851 Mission Center Court, Suite 115
> San Diego, CA 92108
> Dear Mr. Randall:

---

[41] Napier was absent. Federal Mediators Taylor and Brown were present.

[42] Napier was absent.

[43] Puffer was present here and at future sessions unless otherwise indicated.

[44] Another reason I believe Harrison and Zemba on this point relates to the union ratification meeting on August 18. Of all the Union's objections to the offer, there was no claim that management was trying to terminate bargaining by submitting a premature final offer. It is probable that Yelkey asked for a final offer because he was under pressure from members who were impatient working under a day-to-day extension of the contract.

[45] What occurred at this meeting does not appear of record.

> Since you went on strike 12:01 AM August 23, 1980, we are obviously at an impasse. Since we have said impasse be advised that we plan to institute our last best offer on September 1, 1980.
> If you wish to discuss the implementation of said last best offer please advise the Federal Mediator who will arrange for a meeting and we will be happy to do so.
>
> Sincerely,
> /s/ A.C. Zemba
> President
> cc: John Taylor, Federal Mediator
> [G.C. Exh. 11.]

2. Analysis and conclusions

The General Counsel's theory of prestrike bad-faith bargaining is based on two primary contentions (Br. 23–25): (a) that Respondent bargained to impasse on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining: to wit, the Union's statutory right to file grievances with management on behalf of bargaining unit employees; and (b) that Respondent's position on management rights and arbitration, prior to August 12 when Respondent changed its position in part, was designed to permit management to make unilateral changes in employee basic rights and protected activities without recourse. Before considering these contentions further, I turn briefly to the relevant legal principles for guidance.

In Chevron Chemical Co., 261 NLRB 44, 45 (1982), the Board stated that:

> Determining whether parties have complied with the duty to bargain in good faith usually requires examination of their motive or state of mind during the bargaining process, and is generally based on circumstantial evidence, since a charged party is unlikely to admit overtly having acted with bad intent. Hence, in determining whether the duty to bargain in good faith has been breached, particularly in the context of a "surface bargaining" allegation, we look to whether the parties' conduct evidence a real desire to reach an agreement—a determination made by examination of the record as a whole, including the course of negotiations as well as contract proposals. . . .[46]

> [I]t must be remembered that Section 8(d) does not "compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession . . . ." Thus, the Board does not, "either directly or indirectly, compel concessions or otherwise sit in judgment upon the substantive terms of collective bargaining agreements." N.L.R.B. v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 404 (1952). On the other hand, as stated by the Supreme Court, "[T]he Board has been afforded flexiibility to determine . . . whether a party's conduct at the bargaining table evidences a real desire to come into agreement . . . . And specifically we do not mean to question in any way the Board's powers to determine the latter question, drawing inferences from the conduct of the parties as a whole." N.L.R.B. v. Insurance Agents' International Union, AFL–CIO [Prudential Insurance Co.], 361 U.S. 477, 498 (1960). The Board does, of course, with court sanction, consider the content of bargaining proposals as part of its review when making a determination as to the good faith of parties negotiating a contract.

In its brief at 529–534, Respondent cites several cases for the proposition that when evaluating the totality of an employer's conduct, the Board has found it relevant to examine the conduct of the union as well.[47] It is unnecessary in this case to decide to what extent, if any, the Union's conduct might immunize otherwise unlawful conduct of Respondent.[48] The Union's conduct here does not indicate bad faith at the bargaining table nor in the negotiating process. I reject Respondent's claim (Br. 545) that the Union acted in bad faith during negotiations by ignoring the contents of company proposals, by making misrepresentations to union membership, by recommending rejection of the Company's final offer, and by recommending a strike because of personal dislikes for Zemba. These claims are completely unsupported by the record. In sum, I decide the question of good and bad faith of Respondent by looking to the totality of its conduct alone.

As noted above, "totality of conduct" includes both conduct at and away from the bargaining tables[49] and content of bargaining proposals. Looking to Respondent's conduct first, I note Respondent's practice beginning in October 1979 of failing to process grievances and arbitration in accord with past practice. I need not repeat the Union's various favorable court decisions that I have related above. Next, I note Zemba's occasional disparagement of the Union, its officers, and its members during negotiations. For example, on June 25, Zemba accused Randall of negotiating in bad faith. There is no evidence in the record to support this accusation. Also, on July 2, Zemba stated that his employees were more loyal to the Union than to the Company and he wanted only employees who were loyal to the Company. Then Zemba attacked Corona, a member of the Union's negotiating team, who was present. He called her a "troublemaker" and accused her of being the cause of much of the problems between Zemba and his employees. On

See Marines Memorial Club, 261 NLRB 1357 fn. 2 (1982), and the cases cited in fn. 47, above. Moreover, there is some reason to believe that the cases cited in fn. 47, above, are no longer good law. In NLRB v. Hiatt Electric, mem. 685 F.2d 444 (9th Cir. 1982), the court stated its present view, "even if the Union had engaged in an unfair labor practice [failure to bargain in good faith], its conduct would not be a defense to a charge of unfair bargaining against the Company . . . ."

July 14, Zemba again attacked Corona, accusing her of being a "troublemaker" and of filing grievances that were not really true.[50]

Of course, not all Respondent's conduct during negotiations was negative. Prior to the strike, Respondent participated in 15 bargaining sessions with the Union, the first of which was at the union office and the rest of which were at the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service. Some agreement was reached on certain matters and Respondent made several concessions on matters of interest. For example, Respondent first refused, then agreed to sign, the day-to-day letter extending the contract. In addition, on July 14, Respondent had furnished certain information to the Union as requested. Representatives of Respondent met with the Union to answer questions relative to its final offer.[51]

I turn next to the content of the bargaining proposals since, as noted above, the Board may examine these proposals as part of its review of all the circumstances in evaluating an employer's good faith.[52] I review these with the understanding that the Act does not command the parties to agree—it explicitly states they need not. But the right not to agree or concede, or to refuse a particular proposal or make a concession, may not be utilized as a "cloak . . . to conceal a purposeful strategy to make bargaining futile or fail."[53]

In looking at Respondent's final proposal (G.C. Exh. 10), I note that Respondent modified its "Management Rights" clause so that it read in pertinent part,

> Among such retained rights and powers are included the following:
> . . . to discharge, suspend, and discipline employees for just cause . . . [p. 4].

The addition of the "for just cause" standard was a significant concession by Respondent based on its previously announced position. It becomes more significant when considered with a second modification of the arbitration clause (art. VII):

> The decision of the Chairman [Arbitrator] within the limits herein prescribed shall be final and binding on all parties to the dispute. [Par. 7.7, pp. 18–19.]

Here again, Respondent had previously contended that arbitration should be "advisory" only, and this change is a significant concession.[54]

The General Counsel recognizes these concessions, but also points out (Br. 21) that Respondent also offered language in the clause on grievance procedure (art. VI) that continued to restrict the Union's right to file a grievance on behalf of an employee or employees. More specifically, the language at issue reads as follows:

> The right of the Union to submit a grievance is limited to provisions delineating rights of the Union which are not appropriate topics for a grievance by an individual bargaining unit member . . . .

There appears little question that this language in Respondent's final offer would, if implemented, unlawfully restrict the Union's role in the filing of grievances.[55]

Looking finally to what was perhaps Respondent's most adamant position, "past practice," note that the parties do not address this in the briefs as it relates to the issue at hand. At 559 of its brief, Respondent opines that there was little or no dispute between the testimony of Randall and Zemba on this subject. Both agreed that Zemba repeatedly objected to it and that he did not want to be bound by his predecessor's past practices. The evidence does not reflect that Respondent retreated from this position in submitting its final proposal.

In reviewing all the evidence relating to this difficult issue, I find that although the matter is not free from doubt, the General Counsel has not proven by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent bargained in bad faith. I find that this case reflects hard bargaining on both sides.[56]

Although Zemba's attacks on the Union and Corona cannot be condoned, there is no evidence that such attacks were calculated to disrupt the negotiations or that they did so. Corona was not an active member of the Union's team and Randall and Yelkey did not testify, nor does the other evidence so indicate that such attacks prevented the negotiations from going forward. Moreover, Zemba was replaced by Puffer as the Respondent's lead negotiator toward the latter half of the negotiations. I also note the positive factors of the negotiations as reviewed above

As to the bargaining proposals, I am impressed by the 11th hour modifications made by the Respondent in its final proposal. These changes seem to me consistent with Respondent's desire to reach an agreement.[57] Although I agree with the General Counsel that Respondent's attempt to curtail the role of the Union in the grievance article bespeaks of bad-faith bargaining.[58] The General

[50] These attacks on Corona because she presented grievances pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement are themselves violations of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. See Cooper-Jarrett, Inc., 260 NLRB 1123 (1982). However, because they are not alleged in the complaint, nor urged as violations in the briefs, I consider Zemba's statements only as factors in determining whether Respondent bargained in good faith.

[57] In reviewing all the evidence on a good-faith bargaining issue, I weigh Respondent's latter actions more heavily than earlier actions. As the Supreme Court has stated, "An employer is not required to lead with his best offer; he is free to bargain." NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 745 (1962). Based on this authority, I reject any claim by the General Counsel (Br. 24–25) that even though modified later, Respondent's management rights and advisory arbitration proposals as originally constituted are evidence of Respondent's bad faith.

[58] Adhering to an untenable legal position during the course of negotiations is inconsistent with the obligation to bargain in good faith. NLRB v. Mar-Len Cabinets, 659 F.2d 995 (9th Cir. 1981).

Counsel forgets a key factor that, on balance, saves the day for Respondent.

I have found as a matter of credibility that it was Yelkey on behalf of the Union who demanded Respondent's final offer. But for this condition, and the subsequent strike, there is every reason to believe, in light of two other significant modifications, that Respondent would have modified its position with respect to the Union's role in the filing of grievances if bargaining had continued.

My conclusion that Respondent has not bargained in bad faith is not affected by Zemba's purported declaration of an impasse on August 25 (G.C. Exh. 11). Here the Union made no effort to test the finality of the Union's position before going out on strike. Under the circumstances present here, the Respondent was justified in believing that the Union was not interested in any further negotiations. Use of words like "impasse" by the parties even relating to overall issues do not necessarily imply that future bargaining would be futile, and are not necessarily binding legal conclusions.[59] Indeed, subsequent to the strike, bargaining did occur here. In sum, merely because Zemba purported to declare an impasse, I do not find that the objective evidence supports that conclusion.

The facts of the instant case should be compared to those in Shipbuilders v. NLRB, 320 F.2d 615 (3d Cir. 1963), cert. denied 375 U.S. 984 (1964). The employer in the above-cited case offered a proposal that would have restricted the Union's role in the prosecution of grievances to those complaints which had been signed by individual employees. The Board's decision in this case[60] found several aspects of Respondent's behavior to have been unlawful, but also found that the totality of Respondent's conduct did not show guilt of bad-faith bargaining.[61] The court never specifically reviewed this aspect of the Board's ruling. However, the court did uphold the Board's position in finding certain violations of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by the Employer. Some of the court's statements are helpful to the present case. For example, the court stated:

> Non-mandatory subjects [of bargaining] may lawfully be included in collective-bargaining contracts if the parties agree.

Thus, the mere proposal of the grievance-and-arbitration system is not unlawful. The court also held that modification of the grievance system in that case, very similar to that proposed here, was a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. Finally, the court held that insistance on a nonmandatory sbject of bargaining was a per se violation of the duty to bargain. Again, this finding is not inconsistent with an overall finding of good-faith bargaining—such as made by the Board and such as I have made here. I note further that Respondent is charged with bad-faith bargaining by insisting to impasse on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. However, I have found that Respondent did not insist to impasse on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining.

D. The Alleged Unlawful Refusal to Execute a Collective-Bargaining Agreement and Alleged Bad-Faith Bargaining (Postcommencement of Strike)[62]

1. The facts

As noted above, the strike began at 12:01 a.m., on August 23. According to Randall, there were two to three subsequent negotiating sessions called by the Federal mediator. Because Randall had no notes to refresh his recollection—it is not clear if he or anyone else took notes—Randall was somewhat vague. The first meeting occurred in late September or October and only strike-related events were discussed. Then in November, another meeting was held. At this meeting, Puffer on behalf of Respondent, presented a proposal to the Union (G.C. Exh. 12). This proposal raised questions regarding the Company's position on grievances. The Company also made another change that was not subject to interpretation. Respondent proposed that only employees hired after the effective date of the agreement would have to become union members as a condition of employment. A current employee not in the Union on the effective date of the agreement was given the option to join the Union. Randall testified to Puffer's explanation for this change: because of the activities of the strikers, the nonstrikers would never want to work with them or want to be part of their union any longer.

On December 23, the Union sent a letter to Puffer asking him to clarify Respondent's position as to whether it concedes "the arbitrability of grievances dealing with discipline and discharge or not." (G.C. Exh. 14.)[63] In response to this letter, Puffer called Prochazka to say that the letter was being referred to Josiah Neeper, Respondent's attorney.[64] Subsequently, Neeper called Prochazka to say that he would be responding in writing to the December 23 letter.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively in good faith with the SAN DIEGO AFL-CIO BUS DRIVERS LOCAL DIVISION 1309 OF THE AMALGAMATED TRANSIT UNION in the following appropriate unit:

All employees of the Employer; excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, guards, watchmen and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally, without giving the Union an opportunity to bargain, change our health insurance plan.

WE WILL NOT threaten to deprive our employees of their right to Union representation because they engaged in a strike, or other protected concerted activities.

WE WILL immediately bargain collectively in good faith with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the above bargaining unit and if an agreement is reached will embody such agreement in a written, signed contract.

WE WILL make whole, with interest, any employee who suffered any losses as a result of our unilateral adoption of the new health plan.

WE WILL, upon an unconditional offer to return to work, offer all of our employees who went on strike on or after August 23, 1980, immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions, dismissing, if necessary, any person hired on or after that date.

AZTEC BUS LINES, INC.
[Employer]
[G.C. Exh. 13]

On January 7, 1981, Neeper wrote to Prochazka stating in part that subsequent to the effective date of a new agreement, discipline and discharge would be subject to arbitration under the "just cause" standard. (G.C. Exh. 15.)

On February 23, 1981, David Moore, president of the Union, wrote to the Federal mediator asking that a meeting with Respondent be arranged for the purpose of presenting a union counterproposal. The letter also represented that from that time forward, the Union would be represented by counsel, Prochazka. (G.C. Exh. 16.) A meeting for March 12, 1981, at 2 p.m. was scheduled for the office of the Federal mediator. That morning of March 12, Prochazka received a letter from Neeper. It reads as follows:

> Richard D. Prochazka, Esq.
> Domnitz & Prochazka
> 3061 Fourth Avenue
> San Diego, CA 92103
> Re: Aztec Bus Lines
> Dear Mr. Prochazka:

> Aztec Bus Lines will be meeting with Local 1309 tomorrow at FMCS at 2:00 P.M. for the purpose of further bargaining.
> The purpose of the meeting originally was for the Employer to receive a new proposal from the Union. In preparing for the meeting the Employer finds that its position has changed since the time of its last proposal because of changed circumstances. Its changed position will be reflected in its response to the Union's proposal.

> For GRAY, CARY, AMES & FRYE

In his testimony, Neeper explained that by "changed circumstances," he referred to picket line misconduct of strikers that might disqualify them from returning to work on termination of the strike. He also meant that a large number of replacement drivers had been hired and they might wish to retain their jobs after the strike, so there might not be enough work for them and the returning strikers. Finally, Neeper meant that the replacement drivers might be required by a union-security provision to join the Union, thereby subjecting themselves to union discipline.

At this meeting, March 12, 1981, the union representatives were Prochazka, David Moore, by then president of the Local, and Ed Reed, then vice president. Representing the Employer was Neeper, who stated he would be the spokesman for the Company, Puffer, and Harrison. Federal Mediator Taylor was also present.

Neeper began by acknowledging that the original purpose of the meeting had been to receive the union proposal. However, Neeper then referred to the "changed circumstances" as mentioned in the letter and stated that at a subsequent meeting, Respondent would be presenting proposals consistent with the "changed circumstances." At this point, the Union tendered a proposal, dated February 20, 1981, which Prochazka had not participated in preparing (G.C. Exh. 18). In this proposal, the Union made certain minor changes in the Company's November 6 proposal (G.C. Exh. 12), rejected the union-security subclause that would have exempted nonstriking employees from becoming members of the Union, and essentially accepted the proposed grievance-and-arbitration article of the General Counsel's Exhibit 12. On many articles, the Union proposed that language from the old contract (G.C. Exh. 2) be used in the new.

After receiving the Union's proposal, the Company's team caucused to review the contents thereof; on returning, Neeper had a few questions about certain sections. Neeper again stated that the Company would be making a counterproposal based on changed circumstances. After another short caucus, Neeper stated that the present members of the Company's team would constitute its negotiating committee for the foreseeable future and Neeper specifically stated that Zemba would not be participating.

Neeper and Prochazka arranged for another meeting, which was held on March 26, 1981, and further agreed that the Federal mediator would not attend any further meetings. Subsequent meetings were held at the mediator's office, however. Present for the Union at this meeting were Prochazka, Moore, Reed, and two other union officials named King and Pedegrew. The Company was represented by Neeper, Harrison, and Puffer. Neeper presented the Company's proposal, dated March 26, 1981. (G.C. Exh. 19.)

Among other provisions of the General Counsel's Exhibit 19 were "Sections 9.7, 9.8, 9.9, and 17.8 per attachment. Strike resolution and striker return provisions to be negotiated." According to Neeper, only these sections were a response to the "changed circumstances" referred to in the General Counsel's Exhibit 17. All other provisions were added as a result of union concern or questions expressed at the prior meeting. These sections read as follows:

> When time off exceeds three months, at the expense of the company, before an employee resumes normal duties, the company will require a physical examination by the company physician in accordance with 391.1(a) of the Federal Motor Carriers

---

[63] This letter was drafted by Attorney Richard D. Prochazka, a witness at hearing, and cocounsel for the Charging Party Union during the hearing.

[64] Like Prochazka, Neeper testified at the hearing on the subject of poststrike negotiations. He is a law partner of Respondent's counsel at hearing.

> Safety Regulations, and 82.7 of Calif. Highway Patrol Manual. The employee must pass this physical in order to resume work;
> When time off exceeds thirty (30) days, before an employee resumes normal duties he/she must requalify on all types of equipment for which he/she was qualified prior to time off. Requalification requirements will conform with the qualification requirements set forth in company training schedules. Requalification will be done according to the availability of instructors and the company work load.
> 9.9
> When time off exceeds three (3) months, before an employee resumes normal duties he/she must submit a current updated Dept. of Motor Vehicles print out.
> The foregoing requirements can be found covered in detail, in the Driver's Manual.
> 17.8
> The Company shall bear the entire cost of any DOT renewal physical or any other examination required by company to which any employee is required to submit, in accordance with 391.1(a) of the Federal Motor Carriers Manual, and 82.7 of the Calif. Highway Patrol Manual. These examinations are to be performed by the company physician.

According to Prochazka, the Union caucused after receiving the Company's proposal. Both sides agree that after the caucus, a discussion ensued, but there are certain conflicts as to what was said.

a. As to sections 9.7, 9.8, and 9.9

These proposals were newly mentioned by the Company. Prochazka testified that Neeper stated that the U.S. Department of Transportation (DOT) required them to be put in. Neeper testified that the purpose of the sections as related to him by company officials was, as to section 9.7, the result of a recommendation by the Company's medical expert as a way to keep the Company's workman's compensation and accident insurance costs down; as to section 9.8, to ensure that an individual off the job for any extended period had not lost necessary driving skills; as to section 9.9, to preclude employees with bad driving or criminal records. All these reasons were communicated in substance to the Union. In light of other testimony by Harrison and Flo Ybarra, a supervisory employee of Aztec that, pursuant to recommendations of consultants employed by an industry trade group, Respondent had been using substantially the same procedures in sections 9.7, 9.8, and 9.9 since October or November, I find that someone on Respondent's side told the Union that the DOT required these changes. This is not to discredit Neeper necessarily, as his additional rationale may well have also been related to union officials. All agree that the Company intended these provisions to apply to returning strikers and Neeper so stated to the Union. As to whether Neeper also added, "[W]e're sure the Union will have counterproposals in that regard," as testified to by Prochazka, I do not believe that an experienced labor negotiator would have made such a remark and I find that he did not. Not only was it impolitic, but inconsistent with the stated purpose of the proposals.

b. As to the reference after section 9.9 to a driver's manual

All agree that Prochazka asked about the manual. He recalls Neeper deferring to Harrison who answered that the manual did not then exist, but was being worked on with the nonstriking drivers. When it was ready, the Union would receive a copy. Harrison denied making any such statements to Prochazka, testifying that she answered the latter's inquiry by replying that certain supervisory personnel were working on it, such as Schultz, herself, and others. Neeper also recalls that either he or Harrison answered the question posed by stating that supervisory personnel were working on the manual. I credit the testimony of Neeper and Harrison here as it makes no sense that replacement drivers, many of whom were of short tenure, would be working on a driver's manual, nor do I believe that Neeper would have acquiesced in such an imprudent statement, at least not without further clarification.

c. As to the striker return and strike resolution provisions

Prochazka made little or no reference to this subject as a topic of conversation. Neeper testified that in his experience in a strike situation while the Company continues to operate, the Union commonly has substantial contract demands with respect to taking strikers back and resolving the strike, as an aspect of reaching agreement. As to the specific language in question, Neeper testified that he stated the Company anticipates that the Union will make demands in this area and the Company expects to do the same as part of a final agreement. Then, either Randall or Prochazka nodded in understanding of what was said, if not agreement with it. Harrison's account of this conversation generally corroborated Neeper's; moreover, Harrison's notes (R. Br. 50, last page) reads:

> Neeper . . . further states the intent for strike return and other provisions that he has presented are to be neg. Other words bet N and Pr exchanged on lawyer level.

In light of the above circumstances, I credit Neeper's account of this conversation and find that the matter was indeed discussed as indicated above. I further believe Prochazka would have made inquiry about a matter of critical importance to the Union whose members had been on strike since August 23.

On April 2, 1981, the parties met and the Union presented its proposed modifications of sections 9.7, 9.8, and 9.9 (G.C. Exh. 20); Respondent caucused and Neeper informed the union representatives that the proposed modifications were rejected. Then Prochazka wrote out modifications of sections 9.7 and 9.9 that Neeper accepted.

(G.C. Exhs. 21, 22.) This was signified by Prochazka's notation "OK 4/2/81" on the lower right corner of each document. The Company refused to change its position as section 9.8.

Next, the Union caucused and, on return, referred to their November 6 proposal (G.C. Exh. 12). On page 23 of that document, section 19.2, "Notice of Termination," the document read:

> If either the Union or the Company desires to change or terminate this Agreement on [June 30, 1983, is written in; Prochazka testified that his copy was blank as to the date]. . . . If the parties have failed to reach a settlement by [June 30, 1983 again is written in; Prochazka's copy was blank] . . . .

Prochazka asked Neeper what date should be inserted into the two blanks. Neeper responded, "the date of contract termination," without reference to a specific date.

Again there is a conflict between the testimony of the lawyers. Neeper, supported by Harrison, stated he referred to specific proposals that the Company desired to receive from the Union and desired to make on its own with respect to striker return and striker resolution. I again credit this testimony for the reasons previously stated regarding conflicts in testimony between Prochazka and Neeper.

The parties broke for lunch with the intention of reassembling for an afternoon session. During lunch the union representatives met with Yelkey to discuss negotiations. Later Prochazka called Neeper and canceled the afternoon session, stating, "The International is unhappy with what we've done. They don't want us to met [sic] with you this afternoon." The two lawyers then agreed on another meeting for April 9, 1981, at 8:30 a.m., and Neeper confirmed this date with Puffer and Harrison.

Meanwhile, the union team spent the afternoon of April 2 conferring with Yelkey. After this, a meeting of the general membership was called for the evening of April 3, 1981. At this meeting, Prochazka and the union team presented to the membership the Aztec proposal of November 6, as modified by subsequent negotiations. After discussion, the membership took two votes. First, the membership voted to offer to return to work; second, the membership voted to accept the proposal as it was explained by the bargaining team. In anticipation of the vote results, two letters had been prepared prior to the meeting. One of these letters purported to make an unconditional offer to return to work, and the other purported to accept Respondent's offer. (G.C. Exhs. 23, 24.) Only the second need be recited here and it reads as follows:

On April 6, 1981, David Geerdes, an attorney for Respondent, sent a letter to Prochazka acknowledging receipt of the Union's April 3 letter referred to above. The final paragraph of Geerdes' letter reads:

> There is currently scheduled a negotiating session for Thursday, April 9, 1981 at 8:30 A.M. We would appreciate being provided at that time with a complete copy, ready for signature, of the agreement which Local 1309 has purportedly accepted. [G.C. Exh. 25.]

On the same date, Geerdes sent a letter to the Union requesting the names of all Aztec employees who the Union contends were still on strike. (G.C. Exh. 26.) This letter was answered on April 7 by a letter from the Union to Geerdes with the names of approximately 114 employees who were "presently engaged in the Aztec strike." On April 8, 1981, Prochazka caused delivery of a document that the Union contended was the contract that they had accepted (G.C. Exh. 28). Through inadvertence, a side letter regarding past practice was omitted, but was provided to Geerdes at the meeting on April 9. (G.C. Exh. 28a.)[85]

On April 9, 1981, the Union and Respondent negotiating teams headed by Prochazka and Neeper respectively conferred at the office of the Federal mediator. After receiving the missing side agreement on past practice, the [85] In this side letter, the Union basically accepted Zemba's position that he would not be bound by past practices of prior management except to the extent specifically set forth in the basic agreement.

Company took the position that there had been no agreement reached previously because the matters of strike resolution and striker return had not been resolved. Neeper also indicated that although he had not had a full opportunity to review the proffered contract, he did note that the blanks in section 19.2 on page 63 of the November 6 Aztec proposal had been filled in.

The Union's position was that the matter of strike resolution and striker return were resolved by the Union's letter offering to return to work unconditionally and by charges already filed with the NLRB by that time. That is, the Union desired the Board to decide which employee would return to work. As to the insertion of the dates, Prochazka admitted doing this, saying the dates coincided with the printed dates in section 19.1 as to the date of termination, June 30. Prochazka did indicate a willingness to listen to company proposals with respect to striker return and striker resolution, but the Union still thought the NLRB was the proper body to resolve those issues. To the extent the Union might entertain proposals on the two strike issues, its position was that any agreement reached would be separate and distinct from the purported agreement.

Neeper refused to sign the proposed collective-bargaining agreement, but indicated that at a future meeting the Company would have proposals to make with respect to the two strike issues. The parties ended the meeting agreeing to meet again at the same place on April 14.

The parties met again on April 14, 1981, with Harrison and Puffer arriving late. At this time, Neeper handed Prochazka a one-page document purporting to summarize each side's position. The document reads as follows:

> Presentation of > AZTEC BUS LINES of > April 14, 1981
> ABL made a proposal on March 26, 1981. Part of that proposal was
>
> > Strike resolution and striker return provisions to be negotiated.
> The Union has since informed us that the Union claims that a collective bargaining agreement now exists between ABL and the Union. The Union has further informed us that any proposals by ABL relating to strike resolution or striker return as contemplated by the employer when it made such proposal would not be mandatory subjects of bargaining and would unlawfully interfere with consummating the collective bargaining agreement.
> ABL disputes both assertions by the Union, and finds that the Union's position places the employer in a difficult if not impossible position as to further negotiations as it contemplated.
> ABL made proposals relating to employees who had been away from active work for the company for prolonged periods of time. These proposals related to such things as notice, print-out, physical examination to meet physical requirements, requalification and what work individuals would be brought back to and when.
>
> The company indicated that such provisions would apply to strikers as well as others, but that striker return in a group would present special problems so calling for special discussion.
> All this was heard by the Union without objection.
> Also the employer had in mind the matter of resolving amicably who was entitled to return to work and who was not. Reasons for not being entitled to return to work would include resignation, abandonment of the strike for other employment, lack of physical or other qualification, conduct by individuals constituting cause to prohibit their return to work, among others.
> The employer is willing and desirous of bargaining to agreement on these matters as it originally, and obviously, contemplated.
> If the Union is willing to bargain on these matters similarly, then the Employer is willing to consider Union proposals in the areas. The Employer would be willing to proceed to make proposals in all those areas originally contemplated by it on March 26. Those areas it has pointed out here, would appear to be those most pressing. [G.C. Exh. 29.]

After reviewing this document, Prochazka reiterated union policy, that it would bargain over strike issues only with the understanding that any agreement would be separate and apart from the basic agreement. After a caucus, Neeper furnished a written proposal to the Union that suggested a series of meetings to consider groups of strikers from the Union's list of April 7, 1981, and possible agreement on which of the strikers was eligible to return to work. (G.C. Exh. 30.)

The Union rejected this proposal, since it again contended the NLRB should decide who is eligible to return to work. The Company then caucused again and returned with another proposal asking that the Union make available each returning striker to company representatives so the Company could properly investigate that person's eligibility to return to work. (G.C. Exh. 31.) To this proposal, the Union countered with one of its own. As to each returning striker, the Company would submit written requests for information and the Company would make replies it considered appropriate. (G.C. Exh. 32.) After some additional dialogue, in which Neeper again refused to sign the agreement, and said there were no mechanical or clerical errors other than those indicated at the last meeting, the meeting ended.

No further bargaining sessions were scheduled nor held. However, some subsequent correspondence is relevant. On April 14, an Aztec attorney asked the Union for certain employment information about the strikers who desired to return to work. (G.C. Exh. 33.) On April 21, Respondent offered in writing to reinstate 28 striking employees on condition that they comply with company requirements dealing with physical examinations, job requalification examinations, and motor vehicle driving records. (G.C. Exh. 34.) These requirements were taken from sections 9.7, 9.8, and 9.9 of the contract documents. (G.C. Exh. 34.)[66]

2. Analysis and conclusions (alleged unlawful refusal to execute the contract)

The first question to be resolved is whether Respondent reached agreement with the Union and unlawfully refused to execute the contract. I begin with basic principles which are not subject to dispute. In Pacific Coast Metal Trades Council (Foss Shipyard), 260 NLRB 1117 (1982), Administrative Law Judge Pollack, in a Board-approved decision, stated the following:

> Section 8(d) of the Act explicitly requires the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party. H. F. Heinz Co. v. N.L.R.B., 311 U.S. 514, 523 (1941); Retail Clerks International Association, and Retail Store Employees Local 322, Jack Gray and Glen Conyers their agents (Roswil, Inc., d/b/a Ramey Supermarkets), 226 NLRB 80, 87 (1976). However, neither party is required to sign a bargaining agreement containing terms not previously agreed upon. The General Counsel must show not only that an agreement was reached, but that the document which Respondents have refused to execute accurately reflected that contract. Oil Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union and its Local 7-507 (Capitol Packaging Company), 212 NLRB 98, 108 (1974).

When an oral agreement is reached as to the terms of a collective-bargaining contract, each party is obligated, at the request of the other, to execute that contract when reduced to writing, and failure or refusal to do so constitutes an unfair labor practice. Oil Workers Local 7-507 (Capitol Packaging), 212 NLRB 98, 107-108 (1974). But where there is no meeting of the minds as to essential terms of an agreement that may be traced to ambiguity for which neither party is to blame, there is in effect no contract which the parties can be directed to execute. Id. at 107-108, quoting from Restatement, Contracts, § 501 (1932).

In this case, the issue turns on a fair construction of the language, "Strike resolution and striker return provisions to be negotiated," which was first proposed by the Company on March 26, 1981.[67] In its brief at 570-574 and 600-605, Respondent seems to recognize this issue as central to the basic question as to whether Respondent reached agreement with the Union.

All agree that the issues of striker discipline and strike resolution not only were not resolved, but were barely discussed. The General Counsel and the Charging Party contend that the Union desired the issue to be left to the Board as a result of charges filed on April 9, 1981 (G.C. Exh. 1e, original charge in Case 21-CA-20162), 1 day after the General Counsel's Exhibit 28 was tendered to the Company for execution. Respondent desired the issue to be settled by negotiations before a final proposal was agreed to.

I find for the reasons stated below, that on April 3, 1981, the Union and the Respondent reached agreement on all substantive issues. In support of this conclusion, I begin with the case of Georgia Kraft Co., 258 NLRB 908 (1981). In that case, the Board reversed the administrative law judge's finding that no agreement had been reached between the employer and the union because the union did not intend to accept the respondent's "proposal" on striker discipline even though the judge assumed that "proposal as to striker discipline was part and parcel of the ongoing contract negotiations." Contrary to the judge, the Board held that the issue of striker discipline was not presented by the respondent as a bargainable proposal nor was it put forth as a quid pro quo for agreement on a contract.

I find in this case that Respondent never proferred as a bargainable proposal the issues of striker discipline nor strike resolution. Respondent anticipates this holding in its brief at 590 and attempts to refute it by reciting Neeper's rationale given at hearing. Although I recognize the reasons given by Neeper for desiring the Union to make the first substantive proposals,[68] neither party can force the other to be the first to make substantive proposals. Indeed, if Respondent had succeeded, it might well be arguing that the Union had waived the right to make the argument it makes in its brief, i.e., that the strike issues were for the Board to determine. A party's subjective notion of the most efficient and convenient method of bargaining for that party cannot determine whether a contract has been reached. Indeed, it is hard to see how this concept is relevant at all.

[66] Certain other correspondence was exchanged between April 23 and 27, 1981, dealing with notice to returning employees or preservation of legal theories. (G.C. Exhs. 35, 36, and 37.)

[67] I agree with the General Cousnel that inclusion of the date, "June 30, 1983," into two blank spaces is of little or no significance in this case. First, I find that Neeper, in effect, agreed on that date by telling Prochazka that the date to be inserted should be the date of contract termination. Even without this agreement, I look to sec. 19.1, p. 63, of G.C. Exh. 12 (Aztec proposal of November 6):

Effective Date & Expiration

> This agreement and all letters of understanding (covering this agreement period) shall be in force and effect from (Date of ratification by the Union) through June 30, 1983 subject to 19.2. I next compare Sec. 19.1 with Sec. 19.2 which reads as follows:

19.2 Notice of Termination

> If either the Union or the Company desires to change or terminate this Agreement on June 30, 1983 written notice by registered mail must be given to the other party not later than sixty days prior to the termination date, date of postmark to govern. If such notice is given the parties shall meet as necssary for the purpose of negotiating or any proposed amendments or modifications. If the parties have failed to reach a settlement by June 30, 1983 or any subsequent expiration date, this Agreement shall continue in full force and effect, subject to termination by either party upon two weeks prior written notice. Upon the expiration of any such notice period the Union shall have the right to strike and the Company shall have the right to lock out, and this Agreement and all rights and claims hereunder shall thereupon be of no further force or effect.
> AZTEC BUS LINES
> A. C. ZEMBA, President
> AMALGAMATED TRANSIT UNION
> Donald R. Randall, President

From this comparison, I find that the Union was merely making explicit what was implicit from Sec. 19.1. In any event, minor discrepancies as to dates are not substantive differences that will preclude a finding that an agreement has been reached. Trojan Steel Corp., 222 NLRB 478, 483 (1976), enfd. 551 F.2d 308 (4th Cir. 1977).

[68] Neeper's reasons are as follows: so as not to take a final position and eliminate flexibility or movement in position; (2) bargaining goes better if the Union takes a position and the Company responds; (3) so that the Company did not give away anything in the subject area where the Union generally makes the initial demands.

Another helpful case is Fitzgerald Mills Corp., 133 NLRB 877 (1961), enfd. 313 F.2d 260 (2d Cir. 1963), cert. denied 375 U.S. 834 (1963). There, the employer's attorney insisted that before any contract could be negotiated, the union would have to agree to the respondent's proposal with respect to strikers. The proposal would have required the union to waive the reinstatement rights of the strikers and was tantamount to insistence that the union abandon its unfair labor practice charges in order to finalize a bargaining agreement. In holding that a union cannot waive the reinstatement rights of its members, the Board held that such a demand constituted bad-faith bargaining, an issue I will discuss further below. Unlike Fitzgernld Mills, where there was no claim that the parties had in fact reached agreement, there is such a claim here. Accordingly, because Respondent never presented a valid bargainable proposal and because, if a bargainable proposal was presented, it was an unlawful attempt to coerce the Union into abandoning its right to petition the Board, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act on April 9, 1981, and thereafter, when it failed and refused to execute the agreed-upon contract.[69]

Finally, I note that the Charging Party and Respondent discuss the instant issue in terms of whether the Respondent insisted to impasse on a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. In light of the analysis above, it is not essential to consider this dispute in that context. However, certain elements are beyond contention. I agree with the Charging Party (Br. 22-23) that any attempt to require a union to waive its members' right to reinstatement, or to waive the Union's right to the Board's processes, is an unlawful subject of bargaining. I further agree that an employer may not bargain to impasse over an illegal subject.[70] In this case, the Respondent's position is even weaker than it might appear at first blush, for not only did Respondent bargain to impasse over an unlawful subject, but it furthermore insisted to impasse that the Union make the first substantive proposals, after Respondent merely put the subject on the table. I have reviewed the cases cited by Respondent and find they are neither relevant nor helpful to its position.

3. Analysis and conclusions

Alleged bad-faith bargaining after strike began: As noted in footnote 29, supra, the General Counsel amended the complaint at the hearing to allege bad-faith and surface bargaining from November 6 through April 9, 1981. An allegation of bad-faith surface bargaining is neither negated nor mooted by the fact that the parties have reached an agreement, as I have found above.[71] However, I note as factors supporting the allegations of bad-faith bargaining, the refusal of Respondent, on April 9, 1981, to execute a contract embodying the agreement reached with the Union.[72]

In further analysis of this issue, I turn now to the evidence regarding Thomas Ingersoll. Ingersoll was a member of Respondent's prestrike negotiating team, although not an active participant. The General Counsel and the Union contend that in January and February 1981 Ingersoll was a statutory supervisor or otherwise an agent of Respondent. It is important to resolve the issue regarding the employment status of Ingersoll, because of certain remarks he is alleged to have made during the time in question.

Dewey Bandy had been a student worker with San Diego Transit Systems during January and February 1981. Bandy and Ingersoll worked together, making time checks on buses, reviewing bus routes, and monitoring compliance of Respondent with the contract it had at this time to supply public transit services to a section of San Diego County. According to Bandy, the two engaged in several conversations over the weeks they worked together. In five of these covnersations Ingersoll made remarks damaging to Respondent in this case.

In February 1981, the witness and Ingersoll were having a general conversation in a local coffeeshop. Ingersoll stated to Bandy that no way would the strikers come back. The Company had structured its contract negotiations so as to prevent the Union from reaching agreement with the Company. The open-shop provision was something the Union could never accept and it had been put into negotiations specifically to keep the Union from negotiating a settlement. For the same reason, the Company had proposed splitting itself into three components: charter, transit, and schoolbus. Other proposals were also made for the same purpose.

A second conversation occurred in February 1981, at a local restaurant, where the witness had lunch with Ingersoll. There, Ingersoll stated the Company felt it needed to get rid of the Union to operate the Company efficiently. Then Ingersoll restated his earlier remarks that no strikers would be taken back and that the Company had structured its negotiations to prevent the Union from reaching agreement. Finally, Ingersoll again referred to the open-shop proposal and the change in the Company's structure into three divisions—both of these remarks in the same context as before.

In early March 1981, the witness and Ingersoll were driving to a nearby suburb where the third conversation occurred. At this time, Ingersoll said that negotiations with the Union had fallen through in 1980. When this occurred, the Company made a decision to get rid of the Union and go with the employees it had. Ingersoll concluded his remarks by saying that the Union should have accepted the Company's offer back then, "because there's sure as hell no way they're going to come back now."

The fourth conversation also occurred in March 1981, this time at San Diego County Operations Center where Ingersoll had gone to pick up some schedules and transfers. While there he met Bandy who sought to confirm a rumor he had heard that negotiations with the Union had resumed. Ingersoll answered that Bandy was correct, but then added, "But there's no way that any of those strikers are going to be coming back."

Finally, in late March 1981, at a bus monitoring point called Parkway Plaza, Ingersoll again talked to the witness. This was after a nonunion Aztec driver had expressed concern about his job tenure in light of rumors that the Company was again negotiating with the Union. Ingersoll took Bandy aside and said that the Company had assured the nonunion drivers that neither the Union nor any of the strikers were coming back.

Ingersoll testified at the hearing and denied making the above statements. In rebuttal, the General Counsel called another student employee named Jerry Kehoe. He could recall a certain conversation with Ingersoll relative to the strike and negotiations and with the exception of Ingersoll's statement about the Company being divided into three segments, could recall no other specifics of the conversation. Kehoe had very limited value as a corroborating witness. On balance, however, the credibility issue is not difficult. I find that Ingersoll made all statements attributed to him by Bandy. The latter was a disinterested witness with no motive to fabricate. Also, the remarks of Ingersoll are consistent with other evidence regarding similar statements to be recited below.

A closer question concerns the employment status of Ingersoll between January and March 1981. During this period, Ingersoll held a position as traffic coordinator, and sometimes referred to himself as transit supervisor. As of July 1981, Ingersoll became Chula Vista's traffic coordinator. In this role, Ingersoll was an admitted statutory supervisor responsible for operations of Aztec's transit operations in Chula Vista, a suburb of San Diego.

Ingersoll was hired as director of maintenance, also an admitted supervisor. This job ended in June about the time negotiations with the Union started. Between June and January 1981, Ingersoll described his job as doing everything under the sun: night dispatcher, running errands, and assorted odd jobs that needed to be done, including guard duty. This job ended in January 1981, when Ingersoll became transit coordinator. In this position, Ingersoll reported to Schultz, director of operations. Ingersoll's duties were to check bus schedules, make time checks of busdrivers' performance, review bus routes, and all this was done on San Diego County transit operations. When a driver was late on his route, Ingersoll would sometimes request an explanation. This would be reported to Schultz on a daily basis, usually by written notes. Ingersoll was paid a salary, slightly more than he received as director of maintenance, and worked up to 60 hours per week. Ingersoll denied that he had power to hire, fire, or discipline employees. Nor did he make recommendations to Schultz. He merely reported the facts of a given incident to Schultz and, where discipline might be indicated, Schultz usually made his own investigation.

In assessing whether supervisory status exists[73] the specific job title of the employee is not in itself controlling. Here, Ingersoll's title was "transit coordinator." He occasionally described himself as "transit supervisor."[74] Supervisory power exists only if the power is exercised with independent judgment on behalf of management and not in a routine or clerical manner.[75] The mere fact that Ingersoll's wages had been raised to a higher level does not suffice to establish supervisory status.[76] In this case, I cannot find that Ingersoll possessed supervisory powers himself nor could he effectively recommend[77] to Schultz or anyone else that certain action be undertaken. I must conclude that during the relevant period of time, the evidence presented does not show Ingersoll to have been a statutory supervisor.[78] His duties consisted of making routine time and schedule checks and submitting reports to Schultz. I see no evidence of independent judgment. These duties were much like those that Bandy was performing. Surely, it could not be argued that Bandy, as a student intern, was performing work equivalent to that of an Aztec supervisor.

Having decided that Ingersoll was not a statutory supervisor at the time in question, I must also decide whether the statements he made could be imputed to Respondent on any other theory. An employee's actions (or statements) may be imputed to his company regardless of supervisory status where the company places an employee in a position that reasonably fosters the appearance and belief that he acts (or speaks) for management.[79] In this case, the statements in question were made not to an employee of Aztec, but to Bandy, a third party. Accordingly, it does not appear that the many Board decisions holding an employer responsible for statements of nonsupervisory employees apply to this case.[80] But for the fact that the statements in question were made to a nonemployee, I would find Ingersoll to be an agent of management on this record.[81]

[73] Sec. 2(11) of the Act defined "supervisor" as follows:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

[74] It is the actual duties and authority of the employee, not his formal title that is important. NLRB v. Quincy Steel Casting Co., 200 F.2d 293, 296 (1st Cir. 1952).

[75] Hydro Conduit Corp., 254 NLRB 433 (1981).

[76] Victory Electric Corp. Assn., 230 NLRB 1201, 1202 (1977).

[77] To satisfy the statutory requirement that the power of recommendation be "effective," there must be a showing that recommendations would have been in fact followed. A. Barton Hepburn Hospital, 238 NLRB 95, 96 (1978). No such showing was made here.

[78] At the hearing, much was made of Ingersoll's duties as a night dispatcher, a position he held prior to the period in question. His duties there, as those in direct issue, were essentially routine in nature. See Spector Freight Systems, 216 NLRB 551, 554 (1975). Of course, I also question the relevancy of Ingersoll's prior status as a dispatcher.

[79] NLRB v. Berger Transfer & Storage Co., 678 F.2d 679 (7th Cir. 1982).

[80] See, e.g., River Manor Health Related Facility, 224 NLRB 227, 235 (1976), enfd. 562 F.2d 38 (2d Cir. 1977); Wm. Chalson Co., 252 NLRB 25 (1980); Jules V. Lane, D.D.S., P.C., 262 NLRB 118 (1982).

Notwithstanding the fact that the statements of Ingersoll cannot be imputed to Respondent, I nevertheless find that Respondent was guilty of bad-faith bargaining and surface bargaining. In making this finding, I rely on the refusal of Respondent to execute a contract, after agreeing to terms, and the position of Respondent taken during poststrike bargaining that not only would the Union have to agree to terms on strike resolution and striker return, thereby waiving their right to file charges with the Board, but the Union would also be required to make the first substantive proposal on the strike issues. To these findings that I have made above, I also note that Respondent's proposals on resolving strike issues were designed and calculated to be unacceptable to the Union. The tendering of predictably unacceptable proposals by one party to another in contract negotiations is strong evidence of surface bargaining.[82]

Finally, I also rely on certain findings made below wherein Respondent is found to have violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by having made certain statements to employees. For all the reasons stated, I find that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by bad-faith and surface bargaining subsequent to commencement of the strike.

E. The Alleged Violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act

The General Counsel has alleged in the complaint that during the course of the strike, Zemba and Flo Ybarra, a statutory supervisor, made certain statements to strikers that violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Both Zemba and Ybarra have denied making the remarks attributed to them.

Any statement of an employer or its agent to employees that interferes with, restrains, or coerces employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. A finding that a violation has occurred is not determined by intent or actual effect; rather, the test is whether the particular conduct in question has a tendency to interfere with the free exercise of employee rights.[83] With this standard in mind, I turn to the particular statements alleged.

(1) Striker Frank Patton testified that on October 14, he was in a restaurant with Zemba and Dave Schultz in the morning hours. At this time, Zemba was upset due to strike violence that was occurring. I find that, as Patton testified, Zemba stated he would not negotiate with the Union as long as Corona, Yelkey, and Randall were leading the Union. Later in the same conversation, Zemba also stated he would not negotiate with the Union until everyone on the picket line stopped harassing Respondent's employees.

In finding that Zemba made the statements, I note that although Schultz was called to testify about other matters, he was never asked to deny the Patton conversations. Moreover, as Respondent recognizes in its brief at 608–609, there was intense personal animosity between Zemba and the union officials. I have cited an example above, where Zemba attacked and disparaged Corona at a bargaining session before the strike started. Finally, I find that Patton was a credible witness. While he was a picket captain during part of the strike, he did not provoke in management the intense hostility that other strikers did. The sharing of a coffebreak on October 14 between Patton and Zemba and Schultz is an example of this.

Under Board law, an employer has no right to coerce employees in the selection of their collective-bargaining representatives.[84] Randall, Yelkey, and Corona were all on the Union's negotiating team and were not subject to removal by Zemba. In addition, an employer's duty to negotiate during a strike is not suspended. Even where picket line misconduct is occurring, an employer may not stop negotiating with the union. The appropriate remedy is to file charges with the Board[85] or to seek other administrative or legal remedies.[86]
